As long as the descendants of Ruric were considered as aliens and conquerors, they ruled by the sword of the Varangians, distributed estates and subjects to their faithful captains, and supplied their numbers with fresh streams of adventurers from the Baltic coast.<sup>47</sup> But when the Scandinavian chiefs had struck a deep and permanent root into the soil, they mingled with the Russians in blood, religion, and language, and the first Waladimir had the merit of delivering his country from these foreign mercenaries. They had seated him on the throne; his riches were insufficient to satisfy their demands; but they listened to his pleasing advice, that they should seek, not a more grateful, but a more wealthy, master; that they should embark for Greece, where, instead of the skins of squirrels, silk and gold would be the recompense of their service. At the same time the Russian prince admonished his Byzantine ally to disperse and employ, to recompense and restrain, these impetuous children of the North. Contemporary writers have recorded the introduction, name, and character, of the Varangians: each day they rose in confidence and esteem; the whole body was assembled at Constantinople to perform the duty of guards; and their strength was recruited by a numerous band of their countrymen from the island of Thule. On this occasion, the vague appellation of Thule is applied to England; and the new Varangians were a colony of English and Danes who fled from the yoke of the Norman conqueror. The habits of pilgrimage and piety had approximated the countries of the earth; their exiles were entertained in the Byzantine court; and they preserved, till the last age of the empire, the inheritance of spotless loyalty, and the use of the Danish or English tongue. With their broad and double-edged battle-axes on their shoulders, they attended the Greek emperor to the temple, the senate, and the hippodrome; he slept and feasted under their trusty guard; and the keys of the palace, the treasury, and the capital, were held by the firm and faithful hands of the Varangians.<sup>48</sup>

In the tenth century, the geography of Scythia was extended far beyond the limits of ancient knowledge; and the monarchy of the Russians obtains a vast and conspicuous place in the map of Constantine.<sup>49</sup> The sons of Ruric were masters of the spacious province of Wolodomer, or Moscow;

[illegible][illegible]

and, if they were confined on that side by the hordes of the East, their western frontier in those early days was enlarged to the Baltic Sea and the country of the Prussians. Their northern reign ascended above the sixtieth degree of latitude, over the Hyperborean regions, which fancy had peopled with monsters, or clouded with eternal darkness. To the south they followed the course of the Borysthenes, and approached with that river the neighbourhood of the Euxine Sea. The tribes that dwelt, or wandered, in this ample circuit were obedient to the same conqueror, and insensibly blended into the same nation. The language of Russia is a dialect of the Slavonian; but, in the tenth century, these two modes of speech were different from each other; and, as the Slavonian prevailed in the South, it may be presumed that the original Russians of the North, the primitive subjects of the Varangian chief, were a portion of the Fenic race. With the emigration, union, or dissolution, of the wandering tribes, the loose and indefinite picture of the Scythian desert has continually shifted. But the most ancient map of Russia affords some places which still retain their name and position; and the two capitals, Novogorod<sup>50</sup> and Kiow,<sup>51</sup> are coeval with the first age of the monarchy. Novogorod had not yet deserved the epithet of Great, nor the alliance of the Hanseatic league, which diffused the streams of opulence and the principles of freedom. Kiow could not yet boast of three hundred churches, an innumerable people, and a degree of greatness and splendour, which was compared with Constantinople by those who had never seen the residence of the Cæsars. In their origin, the two cities were no more than camps or fairs, the most convenient stations in which the barbarians might assemble for the occasional business of war or trade. Yet even these assemblies announce some progress in the arts of society; a new breed of cattle was imported from the southern provinces; and the spirit of commercial enterprise pervaded the sea and land from the Baltic to the Euxine, from the mouth of the Oder to the port of Constantinople. In the days of idolatry and barbarism, the Slavonic city of Julin was frequented and enriched by the Normans, who had prudently secured a free mart of purchase and exchange.<sup>52</sup> From this harbour, at the entrance of the Oder, the corsair, or merchant, sailed in forty-three days to the eastern shores of the Baltic; the most distant nations were intermingled, and the holy groves of Cur-land are said to have been decorated with Grunum and Spanish gold.<sup>53</sup> Between the sea and Novogorod an easy intercourse was discovered; in the summer, through a gulf, a lake, and a navigable river; in the winter season, over the hard and level surface of boundless snows. From the neighbourhood of that city, the Russians descended the streams that fall into the Borysthenes; their canoes, of a single tree, were laden with slaves of every age, furs of every species, the spoil of their bee-hives, and the hides of their cattle; and the whole produce of the North was collected and discharged in the magazines of Kiow. The month of June was the ordinary season of the departure of the fleet: the timber of the canoes was framed into the oars and benches of more solid and capacious boats; and they proceeded without obstacle down the Borysthenes, as far as the seven or thirteen ridges of rocks, which traverse the bed, and precipitate the waters, of the river. At the more shallow falls it was sufficient to lighten the vessels; but the deeper cataracts were impassable; and the mariners, who dragged their vessels and their slaves six miles over-land, were exposed in this toilsome journey to the robbers of the desert.<sup>54</sup> At the first island below the falls, the Russians celebrated the festival of their escape; at a second, near the mouth of the river, they repaired their shattered vessels for the longer and more perilous voyage of the Black Sea. If they steered along the coast, the Danube was accessible; with a fair wind, they could reach in thirty-six or forty hours the opposite shores of Anatolia; and Constantinople admitted the annual visit of the strangers of the North. They returned at the stated season with a rich cargo of corn, wine, and oil, the manufactures of Greece, and the spices of India. Some of their countrymen resided in the capital and provinces; and the national treaties protected the person, effects, and privileges, of the Russian merchant.<sup>55</sup>

But the same communication which had been opened for the benefit, was soon abused for the injury, of mankind. In a period of one hundred and ninety years, the Russians made four attempts to plunder the treasures of Constantinople. The event was various, but the motive, the means, and the object, were the same in these naval expeditions.<sup>56</sup> The Russian traders had

<sup>50</sup> The heughty proverb, "Who can resist God and the great Novogorod?" is applied by M. Lescoupe (Hist. de Russie, tom. i. p. 50) even to the times that preceded the reign of Rurik. In the course of his history he frequently celebrates this republic, which was suppressed A. D. 1475 (tom. ii. p. 222-226). That accurate traveller, Adam Olearius, describes (in 1655) the remains of Novogorod, and the route by sea and land of the Russian ambassadors, tom. i. p. 125-129.

<sup>51</sup> In hæc magna civitate, quæ est caput regni, plus trecentis ecclesiis, habentur et mundicie octo, populæ etiam ignota minus (Ecclesiis, &c. A. D. 1018, apud Rurik, tom. i. p. 412). He likewise quotes (tom. i. p. 397) the words of the Saxon annalist, Cujus (Russie) metropolis est Chive, annalis scriptor Constantinopolitanus, quæ est clarissima decus Græciæ. The fame of Kiow, especially in the tenth century, had reached the German and the Arabian geographers.

<sup>52</sup> In Odore ostio quæ Scythiæ aluit paludes, noliisima civitas Julinum, celeberrima; barbari et Græci qui sunt in circuitu, præstant stationem, est sane maxima omnium quæ Europæ claudat civitatem (Adam Bremensis, Hist. Eccl., p. 19). A stronger description even in the sixth century. The trade of the Baltic, and the Hanseatic league, are carefully treated in Anderson's Historical Pe-

tena, lurescu (p. 68. A. D. 1786). Mémel is defined as the common fr. of arct. Russia, a ur land, and Memel, Aurum (or platinum says Adam) divinus, augustinus, atque neomundus est omnes, domus sunt perme . . . a totius ibi re posita petuntur, maxime ibi habitant ibi in Zapadni, ad est regalis Levante et Græciæ. The name of Græci was applied to the Russians even before their conversion; and may their conversion, if it is still consulted the words of Olearius (Itiner., tom. i. p. 258. 102, 300. Groen., Prælegomena ad Hist. Goth., p. 100).

<sup>53</sup> Constantinople only reckons seven cataracts, of which he gives the Russian and Slavonic names; but thirteen are enumerated by the Sieur de Beuplan, a French engineer, who had survey, and made a map, of a navigat. in the of the Dnieper or Borysthenes (Descript. d'Ukraine, Rouen, 1661, a third quarto), but the map is unluckily wanting in my copy. Nestor, apud Lescoupe, Hist. de Russie, tom. i. p. 78-80. From the Dnieper or Borysthenes, the Russians went to Black Bulgaria, Chazaria, and Syria. To Syria, how? where? when? May we not, instead of Zapadni, read Zavania (de Administrat. Imp. c. 42. p. 115)? The alteration is slight; the position of Suana, between Charma and Lazica, is perfectly suitable; and the name was still nd rich

house of
in the
Russia in Turkey, Journal de p. 309-1044.

seen the magnificence and tasted the luxury of the city of the Cæsars. A marvellous tale, and a scanty supply, excited the desires of their savage countrymen; they envied the gifts of nature which their climate denied; they coveted the works of art which they were too lazy to imitate and too indigent to purchase: the Varangian princes unfurled the banners of piratical adventure, and their bravest soldiers were drawn from the nations that dwelt in the northern isles of the ocean.<sup>57</sup> The image of their naval armaments was revived in the last century, in the fleets of the Cosacks, which issued from the Borysthenes, to navigate the same seas, for a similar purpose.<sup>58</sup> The Greek appellation of monaxyla, or single canoes, might be justly applied to the bottom of their vessels. It was scooped out of the long stem of a beech or willow, but the slight and narrow foundation was raised and continued on either side with planks, till it attained the length of sixty, and the height of about twelve, feet. These boats were built without a deck, but with two rudders and a mast; to move with sails and oars; and to contain from forty to seventy men, with their arms, and provisions of fresh water and salt fish. The first trial of the Russians was made with two hundred boats; but when the national force was exerted, they might arm against Constantinople a thousand or twelve hundred vessels. Their fleet was not much inferior to the royal navy of Agamemnon, but it was magnified in the eyes of fear to ten or fifteen times the real proportion of its strength and numbers. Had the Greek emperors been endowed with foresight to discern, and vigour to prevent, perhaps they might have sealed with a maritime force the mouth of the Borysthenes. Their indolence abandoned the coast of Anatolia to the calamities of a piratical war, which, after an interval of six hundred years, again infested the Euxine; but as long as the capital was respected, the sufferings of a distant province excited the notice both of the prince and the historian. The storm which had swept along from the Phasis and Trebizond, at length burst on the Bosphorus of Thrace; a strait of fifteen miles, in which the rude vessels of the Russian might have been stopped and destroyed by a more skilful ad-

The first.
A.D. 905.

sary. In their first enterprise<sup>59</sup> under the princes of Kiow, they passed without opposition, and occupied the port of Constantinople in the absence of the emperor Michael, the son of Theophilus. Through a crowd of perils, he landed at the palace stairs, and immediately repaired to a church of the Virgin Mary.<sup>60</sup> By the advice of the patriarch, her garment, a precious relic, was drawn from the sanctuary and dipped in the sea; and a seasonable tempest, which determined the retreat of the Russians was devoutly ascribed to the mother of God.<sup>61</sup> The silence of the Greeks may inspire The second.

some doubt of the truth, or at least of A.D. 904.
the importance, of the second attempt by Oleg, the guardian of the sons of Ruric.<sup>62</sup> A strong barrier of arms and fortifications defended the Bosphorus: they were eluded by the usual expedient of drawing the boats over the isthmus; and this simple operation is described in the national chronicles, as if the Russian fleet had sailed over dry land with a brisk and favourable gale. The leader of the third arma- The third.
ment, Igor, the son of Ruric, had A.D. 941.
chosen a moment of weakness and decay, when the naval powers of the empire were employed against the Saracens. But if courage be not wanting, the instruments of defence are seldom deficient. Fifteen broken and decayed galleys were boldly launched against the enemy; but instead of the single tube of Greek fire usually planted on the prow, the sides and stern of each vessel were abundantly supplied with that liquid combustible. The engineers were dexterous; the weather was propitious; many thousand Russians, who chose rather to be drowned than burnt, leaped into the sea, and those who escaped to the Thracian shore were inhumanly slaughtered by the peasants and soldiers. Yet one third of the canoes escaped into shallow water; and the next spring Igor was again prepared to retrieve his disgrace and claim his revenge.<sup>63</sup> After a long peace, Jaroslans, the great-grandson of Igor, resumed the same project of a naval invasion. A fleet, under the command The fourth.
of his son, was repulsed at the en- A.D. 1043.
trance of the Bosphorus by the same artificial flames. But in the rashness of pursuit, the vanguard of the Greeks was encompassed by an irresistible multitude of boats and men; their provision of fire was probably exhausted; and twenty-four galleys were either taken, sunk, or destroyed.<sup>64</sup>

Yet the threats or calamities of a Negotiations Russian war were more frequently and prophecy.
diverted by treaty than by arms. In these naval hostilities, every disadvantage was on the side of the Greeks; their savage enemy afforded no mercy; his poverty promised no spoil; his impenetrable retreat deprived the conqueror of the hopes of revenge; and the pride or weakness of empire indulged an opinion, that no honour could be gained or lost in the intercourse with barbarians. At first their demands were high and inadmissible, three pounds of gold for each soldier or mariner of the fleet. the Russian youth adhered to the design of conquest and glory; but the counsels of moderation were re-

<sup>57</sup> Н. В. Голубинский, Славянская археология, т. I, стр. 122. См. также: Историческое описание древностей Российских, т. I, стр. 122. См. также: Историческое описание древностей Российских, т. I, стр. 122.

<sup>58</sup> См. также: Историческое описание древностей Российских, т. I, стр. 122. См. также: Историческое описание древностей Российских, т. I, стр. 122.

<sup>59</sup> См. также: Историческое описание древностей Российских, т. I, стр. 122. См. также: Историческое описание древностей Российских, т. I, стр. 122.

<sup>60</sup> См. также: Историческое описание древностей Российских, т. I, стр. 122. См. также: Историческое описание древностей Российских, т. I, стр. 122.

Sept. post Theophanem, p. 141, 122. Simon Logothet. p. 445, 446. Georg. Morch. p. 75, 76. Cedrenus, tom. u. p. 501. Zonaras, tom. u. p. 12.

<sup>62</sup> См. также: Историческое описание древностей Российских, т. I, стр. 122. См. также: Историческое описание древностей Российских, т. I, стр. 122.

<sup>63</sup> См. также: Историческое описание древностей Российских, т. I, стр. 122. См. также: Историческое описание древностей Российских, т. I, стр. 122.

<sup>64</sup> См. также: Историческое описание древностей Российских, т. I, стр. 122. См. также: Историческое описание древностей Российских, т. I, стр. 122.

commended by the hoary sages. "Be content," they said, "with the liberal offers of Cæsar; is it not far better to obtain without a combat, the possession of gold, silver, silks, and all the objects of our desires? Are we sure of victory? Can we conclude a treaty with the sea? We do not tread on the land; we float on the abyss of water, and a common death hangs over our heads."<sup>65</sup> The memory of these Arctic fleets that seemed to descend from the polar circle, left a deep impression of terror on the Imperial city. By the vulgar of every rank, it was asserted and believed, that an equestrian statue in the square of Taurus, was secretly inscribed with a prophecy, how the Russians, in the last days, should become masters of Constantinople.<sup>66</sup> In our own time, a Russian armament, instead of sailing from the Borysthènes, has circumnavigated the continent of Europe; and the Turkish capital has been threatened by a squadron of strong and lofty ships of war, each of which, with its naval science and thundering artillery, could have sunk or scattered an hundred canoes, such as those of their ancestors. Perhaps the present generation may yet behold the accomplishment of the prediction, of a rare prediction, of which the style is unambiguous and the date unquestionable.

By land the Russians were less formidable than by sea; and as they fought for the most part on foot, their irregular legions must often have been broken and overthrown by the cavalry of the Scythian hordes. Yet their growing towns, however slight and imperfect, presented a shelter to the subject, and a barrier to the enemy: the monarchy of Kiow, till a fatal partition, assumed the dominion of the North; and the nations from the Volga to the Danube were subdued or repelled by the arms of Swatoslaus,<sup>67</sup> the son of Igor, the son of Oleg, the son of Ruric. The vigour of his mind and body was fortified by the hardships of a military and savage life. Wrapt in a bear-skin, Swatoslaus usually slept on the ground, his head reclining on a saddle; his diet was coarse and frugal, and, like the heroes of Homer,<sup>68</sup> his meat (it was often horse-flesh) was broiled or roasted on the coals. The exercise of war gave stability and discipline to his army; and it may be presumed, that no soldier was permitted to transcend the luxury of his chief. By an embassy from Nicéphorus, the Greek emperor, he was moved to undertake the conquest of Bulgaria, and a gift of fifteen hundred pounds of gold was laid at his feet to defray the expense, or reward the toils, of the expedition. An army of sixty thousand men was assembled and embarked; they sailed from the Borysthènes to the Danube; their landing was effected on the Mæsan shore; and, after a sharp encounter, the swords of the Russians prevailed against the arrows of the Bulgarian horse. The vanquished king sunk into the grave; his children were made captive; and his dominions, as far as Mount Hæmus, were subdued or ravaged by the northern invaders. But instead of relinquishing his prey, and performing his engagements, the Varangian prince was more disposed to advance than to retire; and, had his ambition been crowned with success, the seat of empire in that early period might have been transferred to a more temperate and fruitful climate. Swatoslaus enjoyed and acknowledged the advantages of his new position, in which he could unite, by exchange or rapine, the various productions of the earth. By an easy navigation he might draw from Russia the native commodities of furs, wax, and hydromel: Hungary supplied him with a breed of horses and the spoils of the West; and Greece abounded with gold, silver, and the foreign luxuries, which his poverty had affected to disdain. The bands of Patzinacites, Chozars, and Turks, repaired to the standard of victory; and the ambassador of Nicéphorus betrayed his trust, assumed the purple, and promised to share with his new allies the treasures of the Eastern world. From the banks of the Danube the Russian prince pursued his march as far as Adrianople; a formal summons to evacuate the Roman province was dismissed with contempt; and Swatoslaus fiercely replied, that Constantinople might soon expect the presence of an enemy and a master.

Nicéphorus could no longer expel the mischief which he had introduced; but his throne and wife were inherited by John Zimisces,<sup>69</sup> who, in a diminutive body, possessed the spirit and abilities of an hero. The first victory of his lieutenants deprived the Russians of their foreign allies, twenty thousand of whom were either destroyed by the sword, or provoked to revolt, or tempted to desert. Thrace was delivered, but seventy thousand barbarians were still in arms: and the legions that had been recalled from the new conquests of Syria, prepared, with the return of the spring, to march under the banners of a wakeful prince, who declared himself the friend and avenger of the injured Bulgaria. The passes of Mount Hæmus had been left unguarded; they were instantly occupied; the Roman vanguard was formed of the immortals (a proud imitation of the Persian style); the emperor led the main body of ten thousand five hundred foot; and the rest of his forces followed in slow and cautious array, with the baggage and military engines. The first exploit

Return of Swatoslaus, A. D. 955-973.

His defeat by John Zimisces, A. D. 970-973.

<sup>65</sup> Nestor, apud Levesque, Hist. de Russie, tom. i. p. 57.

<sup>66</sup> This broken statue, which had been brought from Antioch, and was melted down by the Tartars, has supposed to represent either Julius or Augustus, an old German. See Nicetas Chonates in 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

<sup>67</sup> The life of Swatoslaus, or Swatosl, or Swatoslath, is extracted from the Russian chronicles by M. Levesque, Hist. de Russie, tom. i. p. 94-107 &c.

<sup>68</sup> This resemblance may be clearly seen in the ninth book of the

P. at 205-221.) in the minute detail of the cookery of Achilles. By such a pretence, a modern epic poet would disgrace his work, and distract his reader, but the Greek verses are heroic, not a dead language on solemn apparatus of funereal, and at the distance of two thousand years, a hundred years, are almost as the primitive images of humanity.

<sup>69</sup> This epithet is rather derived from the Armenian language, and is so interpreted in Greek by the word κατακτατής. As I prefer to use a word, which signifies a conqueror, I am induced in the question to the phrase. This, which is not a word, is the conqueror. From the context it is clear, that it is the conqueror (Lao Diacot, l'ave-Mes, apud Balgare, glossa, Græc. p. 1576).

of Zimiscees was the reduction of Marciopolis, or Peristhlaba,<sup>70</sup> in two days: the trumpets sounded; the walls were scaled; eight thousand five hundred Russians were put to the sword; and the sons of the Bulgarian king were rescued from an ignominious prison, and invested with a nominal diadem. After these repeated losses, Swatoslaus retired to the strong post of Dristra, on the banks of the Danube, and was pursued by an enemy who alternately employed the arms of celerity and delay. The Byzantine galleys ascended the river; the legions completed a line of circumvallation; and the Russian prince was encompassed, assaulted, and famished, in the fortifications of the camp and city. Many deeds of valour were performed; several desperate sallies were attempted; nor was it till after a siege of sixty-five days that Swatoslaus yielded to his adverse fortune. The liberal terms which he obtained announce the prudence of the victor, who respected the valour, and apprehended the despair, of an unconquered mind. The great duke of Russia bound himself, by solemn imprecations, to relinquish all hostile designs; a safe passage was opened for his return; the liberty of trade and navigation was restored; a measure of corn was distributed to each of his soldiers; and the allowance of twenty-two thousand measures attests the loss and the remnant of the barbarians. After a painful voyage, they again reached the mouth of the Borysthenes; but their provisions were exhausted, the season was unfavourable; they passed the winter on the ice; and, before they could prosecute their march, Swatoslaus was surprised and oppressed by the neighbouring tribes, with whom the Greeks entertained a perpetual and useful correspondence.<sup>71</sup> Far different was the return of Zimiscees, who was received in his capital like Camillus or Marius, the saviours of ancient Rome. But the merit of the victory was attributed by the pious emperor to the mother of God; and the image of the Virgin Mary, with the divine infant in her arms, was placed on a triumphal car, adorned with the spoils of war, and the ensigns of Bulgarian royalty. Zimiscees made his public entry on horseback; the diadem on his head, a crown of laurel in his hand; and Constantinople was astonished to applaud the martial virtues of her sovereign.<sup>72</sup>

Photius of Constantinople, a patriarch whose ambition was equal to his curiosity, congratulates himself and the Greek church on the conversion of the Russians.<sup>73</sup> Those fierce and bloody barbarians had been persuaded by the voice of reason and religion, to acknowledge Jesus for their God, the Christian missionaries for their teachers, and the Romans for their friends and brethren. His triumph was transient and premature. In the various fortune of their piratical adventures, some Russian chiefs might allow themselves to be sprinkled with the waters of baptism; and a Greek bishop, with the name of metropolitan, might administer the sacraments in the church of Kiow, to a congregation of slaves and natives. But the seed of the Gospel was sown on a barren soil: many were the apostates, the converts were few; and the baptism of Olga may be fixed at the era of Russian Christianity.<sup>74</sup> A female, perhaps of the basest origin, who could revenge the death, and assume the sceptre, of her husband Igor, must have been endowed with those active virtues which command the fear and obedience of barbarians. In a moment of foreign and domestic peace, she sailed from Kiow to Constantinople; and the emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus has described, with minute diligence, the ceremonial of her reception in his capital and palace. The steps, the titles, the salutations, the banquet, the presents, were exquisitely adjusted, to gratify the vanity of the stranger, with due reverence to the superior majesty of the purple.<sup>75</sup> In the sacrament of baptism, she received the venerable name of the empress Helena; and her conversion might be preceded or followed by her uncle, two interpreters, sixteen damsels of an higher, and eighteen of a lower rank, twenty-two domestics or ministers, and forty-four Russian merchants, who composed the retinue of the great princess Olga. After her return to Kiow and Novogorod, she firmly persisted in her new religion; but her labours in the propagation of the Gospel were not crowned with success; and both her family and nation adhered with obstinacy or indifference to the gods of their fathers. Her son Swatoslaw was apprehensive of the scorn and ridicule of his companions; and her grandson Wolodomir devoted his youthful zeal to multiply and decorate the monuments of ancient worship. The savage deities of the North were still propitiated with human sacrifices: in the choice of the victim, a citizen was preferred to a stranger, a Christian to an idolater; and the father, who defended his son from the sacerdotal knife, was involved in the same doom by the rage of a fanatic tumult. Yet the lessons and example of the pious Olga had made a deep, though secret, impression on the minds of the prince and people: the Greek missionaries continued to preach, to dispute, and to baptize; and the ambassadors or merchants of Russia compared the idolatry of the woods with the elegant superstition of Constantinople. They had gazed with admiration on the dome of St. Sophia; the lively pictures of saints and martyrs, the riches of the altar, the number and vestments of the priests, the pomp and order of the ceremonies; they were edified by the alternate succession of devout silence and harmonious song; nor was it difficult to persuade them, that a choir of angels descended each day from heaven to join in the devotion of the Christians.<sup>76</sup> But the conversion of Wolodomir, A. D. 988. Wolodomir was determined, or hastened, by his desire of a Roman bride. At the same time, and in the city of Cherson, the rites of baptism and marriage were celebrated by the Christian pontiff: the city he restored to the emperor Basil, the brother of his spouse; but the brazen gates were transported, as it is said, to Novogorod, and erected before the first church as a trophy of his victory and faith.<sup>77</sup> At his despotic command, Peroun, the god of thunder, whom he had so long adored, was dragged through the streets of Kiow; and twelve sturdy barbarians battered with clubs the misshapen image, which was indignantly cast into the waters of the Borysthenes. The edict of Wolodomir had proclaimed, that all who should refuse the rites of baptism would be treated as the enemies of God and their prince; and the rivers were instantly filled with many thousands of obedient Russians, who acquiesced in the truth and excellence of a doctrine which had been embraced by the great duke and his boyars. In the next generation, the relics of Paganism were finally extirpated; but as the two brothers of Wolodomir had died without baptism, their bones were taken from the grave, and sanctified by an irregular and posthumous sacrament.

[illegible][illegible]

In the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries of the Christian æra, the reign of the Gospel and of the church was extended over Bulgaria, Hungary, Bohemia, Saxony, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Poland, and Russia.<sup>78</sup> The triumphs of apostolic zeal were repeated in the iron age of Christianity; and the northern and eastern regions of Europe submitted to a religion, more different in theory than in practice, from the worship of their native idols. A humble ambition excited the monks, both of Germany and Greece, to visit the tents and huts of the barbarians: poverty, hardships, and dangers, were the lot of the first missionaries: their courage was active and patient; their motive pure and meritorious: their present reward consisted in the testimony of their conscience and the respect of a grateful people; but the fruitful harvest of their toils was inherited and enjoyed by the proud and wealthy prelates of succeeding times. The first conversions were free and spontaneous: an holy life and an eloquent tongue were the only arms of the missionaries; but the domestic fables of the Pagans were silenced by the miracles and visions of the strangers; and the favourable temper of the chiefs was accelerated by the dictates of vanity and interest. The leaders of nations, who were saluted with the titles of kings and saints,<sup>79</sup> held it lawful and pious to impose the Catholic faith on their subjects and neighbours: the coast of the Baltic, from Holstein to the Gulf of Finland, was invaded under the standard of the cross; and the reign of idolatry was closed by the conversion of Lithuania in the fourteenth century. Yet truth and candour must acknowledge, that the conversion of the North imparted many temporal benefits both to the old and the new Christians. The rage of war, inherent to the human species, could not be healed by the evangelic precepts of charity and peace; and the ambition of Catholic princes has renewed in every age the calamities of hostile contention. But the admission of the barbarians into the pale of civil and ecclesiastical society delivered Europe from the depredations, by sea and land, of the Normans, the Hungarians, and the Russians, who learned to spare their brethren and cultivate their possessions.<sup>80</sup> The establishment of law and order was promoted by the influence of the clergy; and the rudiments of art and science were introduced into the savage countries of the globe. The liberal piety of the Russian princes engaged in their service the most skilful of the Greeks, to decorate the cities and instruct the inhabitants: the dome and the paintings of St. Sophia were rudely copied in the churches of Kiow and Novogorod: the writings of the fathers were translated into the Slavonic idiom; and three hundred noble youths were invited or compelled to attend the lessons of the college of Jaroslaus. It should appear that Russia might have derived an early and rapid improvement from her peculiar connection with the church and state of Constantinople, which in that age so justly despised the ignorance of the Latins. But the Byzantine nation was servile, solitary, and verging to an hasty decline: after the fall of Kiow, the navigation of the Borysthenes was forgotten; the great princes of Wolodomir and Moscov were separated from the sea and Christendom; and the divided monarchy was oppressed by the ignominy and blindness of Tartar servitude.<sup>81</sup> The Slavonic and Scandinavian kingdoms, which had been converted by the Latin missionaries, were exposed, it is

<sup>76</sup> See an anonymous fragment published by Rindler (Imperium Orientale, tom. ii. p. 113, 114), de Convers. in Rusviam.

<sup>77</sup> Cherson, or Korsun, is mentioned to Herberstein (Spud Pagu, tom. ii. p. 36) as the place of Wolodomir's baptism and marriage; and both the tradition and the letters are still preserved at Novogorod.

<sup>78</sup> An observing traveller tran. pers. the brazen gates from Metzgerbach in Germany (Cox's Travels into Russia, &c. vol. i. p. 132); and quotes an inscription, which seems to justify his opinion. The German reader must not confound this with the fable of the Four or Russian peninsula, with a view of the place name, which has arisen near the mouth of the Borysthenes, and was lately honoured by the memorable interview of the emperor of Russia with the emperor of the West.

<sup>79</sup> Consult the Latin text, or Lit. History, of Moscov's excellent history of the church, under the first head or section of each of these centuries.

<sup>80</sup> In the year 1600, the emperor of Russia, St. Stephen, received from pope Sylvester the title of king of the Romans, with a grant of Greek

workmanship. It had been designed for the duke of Poland; but the Pope, to their own confusion, was set too barbarous to deserve an angelic and apostolic crown (Katon's Hist. Critic. Regum Stirps Angulana, tom. i. p. 120).

<sup>81</sup> Listen to the exultations of Adam of Bremen (A. D. 1080), of which the substance is agreeable to truth. Pro illa ferocissima Danorum, &c. ratio . . . pmdum merit in Dei laudibus Alleluia resonare . . . Ecce populus ille piraticus . . . suis mure bulis contentis est. Ecce pars barbaris semper innoxia propter cultum adorum . . . per creatores veritatis ubique cunctis aditit. &c. (de Scythia, p. 10, 11, and before a curious and original prospect of the north of Europe, and the introduction of Christianity).

<sup>82</sup> The archbishops removed in 1156 from Kiow, which was ruined by the Tartars in 1240. Moscow has since the said of its rise in the 13th century. See the Lit. and 2d volumes of Levesque's History, and Mr. Cox's Travels into the North, tom. i. p. 213, &c.

true, to the spiritual jurisdiction and temporal claims of the popes;<sup>82</sup> but they were united, in language and religious worship, with each other, and with Rome; they imbibed the free and generous spirit of the European republic, and gradually shared the light of knowledge which arose on the Western world.

CHAP. LVI.

The Saracens, Franks, and Greeks, in Italy. — First Adventures and Settlement of the Normans. — Character and Conquests of Robert Guiscard, Duke of Apulia. — Deliverance of Sicily by his Brother Roger. — Victories of Robert over the Emperors of the East and West. — Roger, King of Sicily, invades Africa and Greece. — The Emperor Manuel Comnenus. — Wars of the Greeks and Normans. — Extinction of the Normans.

THE three great nations of the world, the Greeks, the Saracens, and the Franks, encountered each other on the theatre of Italy.<sup>1</sup> The southern provinces, which now compose the kingdom of Naples, were subject, for the most part, to the Lombard dukes and princes of Beneventum;<sup>2</sup> so powerful in war, that they checked for a moment the genius of Charlemagne; so liberal in peace, that they maintained in their capital an academy of thirty-two philosophers and grammarians. The division of this flourishing state produced the rival principalities of Benevento, Salerno, and Capua; and the thoughtless ambition or revenge of the competitors invited the Saracens to the ruin of their common inheritance. During a calamitous period of two hundred years, Italy was exposed to a repetition of wounds, which the invaders were not capable of healing by the union and tranquillity of a perfect conquest. Their frequent and almost annual squadrons issued from the port of Palermo, and were entertained with too much indulgence by the Christians of Naples: the more formidable fleets were prepared on the African coast; and even the Arabs of Andalusia were sometimes tempted to assist or oppose the Moslems of an adverse sect. In the revolution of human events, a new ambuscade was concealed in the Cauline forks, the fields of Cannæ were bedewed a second time with the blood of the Africans, and the sovereign of Rome again attacked or defended the walls of Capua and Tarentum. A colony of Saracens had been planted at Bari, which commands the entrance of the Adriatic Gulf; and their impartial depreciations provoked the resentment, and conciliated

the union, of the two emperors. An offensive alliance was concluded between Basil the Macedonian, the first of his race, and Lewis the great-grandson of Charlemagne;<sup>3</sup> and each party supplied the deficiencies of his associate. It would have been imprudent in the Byzantine monarch to transport his stationary troops of Asia to an Italian campaign; and the Latin arms would have been insufficient if his superior navy had not occupied the mouth of the Gulf. The fortress of Bari was invested by the infantry of the Franks, and by the cavalry and galleys of the Greeks: and, after a defence of four years, the Arabian emir submitted to the clemency of Lewis, who commanded in person the operations of the siege. This important conquest had been achieved by the concord of the East and West; but their recent amity was soon embittered by the mutual complaints of jealousy and pride. The Greeks assumed as their own the merit of the conquest and the pomp of the triumph; extolled the greatness of their powers, and affected to deride the intemperance and sloth of the haughty barbarians who appeared under the banners of the Carlovingian prince. His reply is expressed with the eloquence of indignation and truth: "We confess the magnitude of your preparations," says the great-grandson of Charlemagne. "Your armies were indeed as numerous as a cloud of summer locusts, who darken the day, flap their wings, and, after a short flight, tumble weary and breathless to the ground. Like them, ye sunk after a feeble effort; ye were vanquished by your own cowardice; and withdrew from the scene of action to injure and despoil our Christian subjects of the Selavolian coast. We were few in number, and why were we few? because, after a tedious expectation of your arrival, I had dismissed my host, and retained only a chosen band of warriors to continue the blockade of the city. If they indulged their hospitable feasts in the face of danger and death, did these feasts abate the vigour of their enterprise? Is it by your fasting that the walls of Bari have been overturned? Did not these valiant Franks, diminished as they were by languor and fatigue, intercept and vanquish the three most powerful emirs of the Saracens? and did not their defeat precipitate the fall of the city? Bari is now fallen; Tarentum trembles; Calabria will be delivered; and, if we command the sea, the island of Sicily may be rescued from the hands of the infidels. My brother (a name most offensive to the vanity of the Greek), accelerate your naval succours, respect your allies, and distrust your flatterers."<sup>4</sup>

<sup>82</sup> The ambassadors of St Stephen had used the expression, regni additum, ubi non debet additum, which was afterwards interpreted by Gregory VII. and the Hungarian Catholics as divided between the saints of the East and the universal lord of the crown (Katona, Hist. Critica, tom. i. p. 202, tom. ii. p. 701, tom. iii. p. 324).

<sup>1</sup> For the general history of Italy in the sixth and seventh centuries, I must properly refer to the sixth, sixth, and seventh books of St. Isidore's Reces Historiarum in the second volume of his works, Milan, 1777; the Annals of Baronius, with the continuation, the sixth and seventh books of the Historia Ecclesiastica of Bede, the Chronicon of Bede, and the sixth and seventh volumes of the Annales of Gregory of Tours, a work which, under a variety of circumstances, has been the source learning and industry. But no book is so generally read as the Historia Ecclesiastica of Bede, which I myself have resorted to the many times. It is not to be read as a whole, but rather as a series of books, each of which has its own merits and defects.

<sup>2</sup> The Historia Ecclesiastica of Bede, which I myself have resorted to the many times. It is not to be read as a whole, but rather as a series of books, each of which has its own merits and defects.

<sup>3</sup> The Historia Ecclesiastica of Bede, which I myself have resorted to the many times. It is not to be read as a whole, but rather as a series of books, each of which has its own merits and defects.

New province of the Greeks
in Italy.
A. D. 890.

These lofty hopes were soon extinguished by the death of Lewis, and the decay of the Carolingian house; and whoever might deserve the honour, the Greek emperors, Basil, and his son Leo, secured the advantage, of the reduction of Bari. The Italians of Apulia and Calabria were persuaded or compelled to acknowledge their supremacy, and an ideal line from Mount Garganus to the Bay of Salerno leaves the far greater part of the kingdom of Naples under the dominion of the Eastern empire. Beyond that line, the dukes or republics of Amalfi<sup>5</sup> and Naples, who had never forfeited their voluntary allegiance, rejoiced in the neighbourhood of their lawful sovereign; and Amalfi was enriched by supplying Europe with the produce and manufactures of Asia. But the Lombard princes of Benevento, Salerno, and Capua,<sup>6</sup> were reluctantly torn from the communion of the Latin world, and too often violated their oaths of servitude and tribute. The city of Bari rose to dignity and wealth, as the metropolis of the new theme or province of Lombardy; the title of patrician, and afterwards the singular name of Catapan,<sup>7</sup> was assigned to the supreme governor; and the policy both of the church and state was modelled in exact subordination to the throne of Constantinople. As long as the sceptre was disputed by the princes of Italy, their efforts were feeble and adverse; and the Greeks resisted or eluded the forces of Germany, which descended from the Alps under the Imperial standard of the Othos. The first and greatest of those Saxon princes was compelled to relinquish the siege of Bari: the second, after the loss of his stoutest bishops and barons, escaped with honour from the bloody field of Crotona.

On that day the scale of war was turned against the Franks by the valour of the Saracens.<sup>8</sup> These corsairs had indeed been driven by the Byzantine fleets from the fortresses and coasts of Italy; but a sense of interest was more prevalent than superstition or resentment, and the caliph of Egypt had transported forty thousand Moslems to the aid of his Christian ally. The successors of Basil amused themselves with the belief, that the conquest of Lombardy had been achieved, and was still preserved, by the justice of their laws, the virtues of their ministers, and the gratitude of a people whom they had rescued from anarchy and oppression. A series of rebellions might dart a ray of truth into the palace of Constantinople; and the illusions of flattery were dispelled by the easy and rapid success of the Norman adventurers.

The revolution of human affairs had produced in Apulia and Calabria, a melancholy contrast between the age of Pythagoras and the tenth century of the Christian era. At the former period, the coast of Great Greece (as it was then styled) was planted with free and opulent cities: these cities were peopled with soldiers, artists, and philosophers; and the military strength of Tarentum, Sybaris, or Crotona, was not inferior to that of a powerful kingdom. At the second era, these once flourishing provinces were clouded with ignorance, impoverished by tyranny, and depopulated by barbarian war; nor can we severely accuse the exaggeration of a contemporary, that a fair and ample district was reduced to the same desolation which had covered the earth after the general deluge.<sup>9</sup> Among the hostilities of the Arabs, the Franks, and the Greeks, in the southern Italy, I shall select two or three anecdotes expressive of their national manners. 1. It was the amusement of the Saracens to profane, as well as to pillage, the monasteries and churches. At the siege of Salerno, a Musulman chief spread his couch on the communion-table, and on that altar sacrificed each night the virginity of a Christian nun. As he wrestled with a reluctant maid, a beam in the roof was accidentally or dexterously thrown down on his head; and the death of the lustful emir was imputed to the wrath of Christ, which was at length awakened to the defence of his faithful spouse.<sup>10</sup> 2. The Saracens besieged the cities of Beneventum and Capua: after a vain appeal to the successors of Charlemagne, the Lombards implored the clemency and aid of the Greek emperor.<sup>11</sup> A fearless citizen dropped from the walls, passed the intrenchments, accomplished his commission, and fell into the hands of the barbarians, as he was returning with the welcome news. They commanded him to assist their enterprise, and deceive his countrymen, with the assurance that wealth and honours should be the reward of his falsehood, and that his sincerity would be punished with immediate death. He affected to yield, but as soon as he was conducted within hearing of the Christians on the rampart, "Friends and brethren," he cried with a loud voice, "be bold and patient, maintain the city; your sovereign is informed of your distress, and your deliverers are at hand. I know my doom, and commit my wife and children to your

<sup>5</sup> See an excellent Dissertation by Ponsard, Ac. d'hist. vi. l. 1. p. 112, of the Revue des Deux Mondes (Historical and Literary Review) for 1817, p. 112.

<sup>6</sup> The Ymagines of Leo VI. and the Historia of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, c. 31, p. 112, give a list of the cities of the kingdom of Naples, and the names of the dukes and princes who were subject to the Greek emperor. The Ymagines also give a list of the cities of the kingdom of Salerno, and the names of the dukes and princes who were subject to the Greek emperor. The Ymagines also give a list of the cities of the kingdom of Benevento, and the names of the dukes and princes who were subject to the Greek emperor. The Ymagines also give a list of the cities of the kingdom of Capua, and the names of the dukes and princes who were subject to the Greek emperor.

<sup>7</sup> The Ymagines of Leo VI. and the Historia of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, c. 31, p. 112, give a list of the cities of the kingdom of Naples, and the names of the dukes and princes who were subject to the Greek emperor.

<sup>8</sup> The Ymagines of Leo VI. and the Historia of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, c. 31, p. 112, give a list of the cities of the kingdom of Naples, and the names of the dukes and princes who were subject to the Greek emperor.

<sup>9</sup> The Ymagines of Leo VI. and the Historia of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, c. 31, p. 112, give a list of the cities of the kingdom of Naples, and the names of the dukes and princes who were subject to the Greek emperor.

<sup>10</sup> The Ymagines of Leo VI. and the Historia of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, c. 31, p. 112, give a list of the cities of the kingdom of Naples, and the names of the dukes and princes who were subject to the Greek emperor.

<sup>11</sup> The Ymagines of Leo VI. and the Historia of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, c. 31, p. 112, give a list of the cities of the kingdom of Naples, and the names of the dukes and princes who were subject to the Greek emperor.

“gratitude.” The rage of the Arabs confirmed his evidence; and the self-devoted patriot was transpierced with an hundred spears. He deserves to live in the memory of the virtuous, but the repetition of the same story in ancient and modern times, may sprinkle some doubts on the reality of this generous deed.<sup>12</sup>

A. D. 930.

A D. 950. 3. The recital of a third incident may provoke a smile amidst the horrors of war. Theobald, marquis of Camerino and Spoleto,<sup>13</sup> supported the rebels of Beneventum; and his wanton cruelty was not incompatible in that age with the character of an hero. His captives of the Greek nation or party were castrated without mercy, and the outrage was aggravated by a cruel jest, that he wished to present the emperor with a supply of eunuchs, the most precious ornaments of the Byzantine court. The garrison of a castle had been defeated in a sally, and the prisoners were sentenced to the customary operation. But the sacrifice was disturbed by the intrusion of a frantic female, who, with bleeding cheeks, dishevelled hair, and importunate clamours, compelled the marquis to listen to her complaint. "Is it thus," she cried, "ye magnanimous heroes, that ye wage war against women, against women who have never injured ye, and whose only arms are the distaff and the loom?" Theobald denied the charge, and protested, that, since the Amazons, he had never heard of a female war. "And how," she furiously exclaimed, "can you attack us more directly, how can you wound us in a more vital part, than by robbing our husbands of what we most dearly cherish, the source of our joys, and the hope of our posterity? The plunder of our flocks and herds I have endured without a murmur, but this fatal injury, this irreparable loss, subdues my patience, and calls aloud on the justice of heaven and earth." A general laugh applauded her eloquence; the savage Franks, inaccessible to pity, were moved by her ridiculous, yet rational, despair; and with the deliverance of the captives, she obtained the restitution of her effects. As she returned in triumph to the castle, she was overtaken by a messenger, to enquire, in the name of Theobald, what punishment should be inflicted on her husband, were he again taken in arms? "Should such," she answered without hesitation, "be his guilt and misfortune, he has eyes, and a nose, and hands, and feet. These are his own, and these he may deserve to forfeit by his per“sonal offences. But let my lord be pleased “to spare what his little handmaid presumes to “claim as her peculiar and lawful property.”<sup>14</sup>

The establishment of the Normans in the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily,<sup>15</sup> is an event most romantic in its origin, and in its consequences most important both to Italy and the Eastern empire. The broken provinces of the Greeks, Lombards, and Saracens, were exposed to every invader, and every sea and land were invaded by the adventurous spirit of Scandinavian pirates. After a long indulgence of rapine and slaughter, a fair and ample territory was accepted, occupied, and named, by the Normans of France; they renounced their gods for the God of the Christians;<sup>16</sup> and the dukes of Normandy acknowledged themselves the vassals of the successors of Charlemagne and Capet. The savage fierceness which they had brought from the snowy mountains of Norway, was refined, without being corrupted, in a warmer climate; the companions of Rollo insensibly mingled with the natives; they imbibed the manners, language,<sup>17</sup> and gallantry, of the French nation; and, in a martial age, the Normans might claim the palm of valour and glorious achievements. Of the fashionable superstitions, they embraced with ardour the pilgrimages of Rome, Italy, and the Holy Land. In this active devotion, their minds and bodies were invigorated by exercise; danger was the incentive, novelty the recompence; and the prospect of the world was decorated by wonder, credulity, and ambitious hope. They confederated for their mutual defence: and the robbers of the Alps, who had been allured by the gaud of a pilgrim, were often chastised by the arm of a warrior. In one of these pious visits to the cavern of Mount Garganus in Apulia, which had been sanctified by the apparition of the archangel Michael,<sup>18</sup> they were accosted by a stranger in the Greek habit, but who soon revealed himself as a rebel, a fugitive, and a mortal foe of the Greek empire. His name was Melo; a noble citizen of Bari, who, after an unsuccessful revolt, was compelled to seek new allies and avengers of his country. The bold appearance of the Normans revived his hopes and solicited his confidence: they listened to the complaints, and still more to the promises, of the patriot. The assurance of wealth demonstrated the justice of his cause; and they viewed, as the inheritance of the brave, 12 In the year 663, the same tragedy is described by Pindar the Dorian (see Tragic Fragments, p. 178, p. 579, n. 2). But the Greek is different, and the guilt is imparted to the Greek, to those who, when the Byzantine edition is depicted in the S. 100, are taken to the west in Germany. Most of these, a French officer of the regiment of Artillery, is the more heroic, is more someone was captured by the enemy who had made him prisoner (Ymitar). See the Tragic Fragments, p. 178, p. 579, n. 2.

15 Theobald, who is styled Henric by Lampadius, was perhaps Duke of the Franks and margrave of the Marches, the exact date of his life is not known, but he is mentioned in the French chronicles (Mabillon, Annales de l'abbaye de Saint-Denis, p. 157, 72, 8).

but they wrote on the spot, in the age of the first rough wars before A. B. Hall, and with the perfect ignorance of the codes to regulate the compilers in the case of Italy and France, Sigismund, Barnaby, Pico, Graymore, Murdett, St. Marc, &c. whom I have always considered the most ignorant.

[illegible]

In September 1991, the Department of Education (DoE) published a report, Adopting New Technologies in the Classroom, which set out a number of principles for the use of technology in schools. Some of the key points were:

- The use of technology should be seen as a means of enhancing the quality of teaching and learning, rather than as an end in itself.
- The use of technology should be based on sound pedagogical principles.
- The use of technology should be based on the needs of the individual teacher and the individual school.
- The use of technology should be based on the needs of the individual pupil.
- The use of technology should be based on the needs of the individual subject.
- The use of technology should be based on the needs of the individual curriculum.
- The use of technology should be based on the needs of the individual school.
- The use of technology should be based on the needs of the individual region.
- The use of technology should be based on the needs of the individual country.
- The use of technology should be based on the needs of the individual world.

stoutest warriors, with a stroke of his fist, felled to the ground the horse of the Greek messenger. He was dismissed with a fresh horse; the insult was concealed from the Imperial troops; but in two successive battles they were more fatally instructed of the prowess of their adversaries. In the plains of Cannæ, the Asiatics fled before the adventurers of France; the duke of Lombardy was made prisoner; the Apulians acquiesced in a new dominion; and the four places of Bari, Otranto, Brundisium, and Tarentum, were alone saved in the shipwreck of the Grecian fortunes. From this era we may date the establishment of the Norman power, which soon eclipsed the infant colony of Aversa. Twelve counts<sup>24</sup> were chosen by the popular suffrage; and age, birth, and merit, were the motives of their choice. The tributes of their peculiar districts were appropriated to their use; and each count erected a fortress in the midst of his lands, and at the head of his vassals. In the centre of the province, the common habitation of Melphi was reserved as the metropolis and citadel of the republic; an house and separate quarter was allotted to each of the twelve counts; and the national concerns were regulated by this military senate. The first of his peers, their president and general, was entitled count of Apulia; and this dignity was conferred on William of the iron arm, who, in the language of the age, is styled a lion in battle, a lamb in society, and an angel in council.<sup>25</sup> The manners of his countrymen are fairly delineated by a contemporary and national historian.<sup>26</sup> "The Normans,"

Character of the Normans. says Malaterra, "are a cunning and revengeful people; eloquence and dissimulation appear to be their hereditary qualities: they can stoop to flatter; but unless they are curbed by the restraint of law, they indulge the licentiousness of nature and passion. Their princes affect the praise of popular munificence; the people observe the medium, or rather blend the extremes, of avarice and prodigality; and, in their eager thirst of wealth and dominion, they despise whatever they possess, and hope whatever they desire. Arms and horses, the luxury of dress, the exercises of hunting and hawking,<sup>27</sup> are the delight of the Normans; but, on pressing occasions, they can endure with incredible patience the inclemency of every climate, and the toil and abstinence of a military life."<sup>28</sup>

21 Omnes conveniunt, et in sex seduliores, Quos genus et gravitas morum decorabat et ætas, Elicere duces. Proverbia ad comitum. His aut parentis. Comitiis morum honores. Quo donantur erat. In totas undique terras Divisere sibi, in sex minime relinquunt.

Apulian

The Normans of Apulia were seated on the verge of the two empires; and, according to the policy of the hour, they accepted the investiture of their lands from the sovereigns of Germany or Constantinople. But the finest title of these adventurers was the right of conquest: they neither loved nor trusted; they were neither trusted nor beloved: the contempt of the princes was mixed with fear, and the fear of the natives was mingled with hatred and resentment. Every object of desire, an horse, a woman, a garden, tempted and gratified the rapaciousness of the strangers;<sup>29</sup> and the avarice of their chiefs was only coloured by the more specious names of ambition and glory. The twelve counts were sometimes joined in a league of injustice: in their domestic quarrels they disputed the spoils of the people: the virtues of William were buried in his grave; and Drogo, his brother and successor, was better qualified to lead the valour, than to restrain the violence, of his peers. Under the reign of Constantine Monomachus, the policy, rather than benevolence, of the Byzantine court, attempted to relieve Italy from this adherent mischief, more grievous than a flight of barbarians;<sup>30</sup> and Argyrus, the son of Melo, was invested for this purpose with the most lofty titles<sup>31</sup> and the most ample commission. The memory of his father might recommend him to the Normans; and he had already engaged their voluntary service to quell the revolt of Maniaces, and to avenge their own and the public injury. It was the design of Constantine to transplant this warlike colony from the Italian provinces to the Persian war; and the son of Melo distributed among the chiefs the gold and manufactures of Greece, as the first fruits of the Imperial bounty. But his arts were baffled by the sense and spirit of the conquerors of Apulia: his gifts, or at least his proposals, were rejected; and they unanimously refused to relinquish their possessions and their hopes for the distant prospect of Asiatic fortune. After the means of persuasion had failed, Argyrus resolved to compel or to destroy: the Latin powers A.D. 1049-1051. were solicited against the common enemy; and an offensive alliance was formed of the pope and the two emperors of the East and West. The throne of St. Peter was occupied by Leo the Ninth, a simple saint,<sup>32</sup> of a temper most Oppression of Apulia. A.D. 1049, &c.

League of the pope and the two emperors. A.D. 1049-1051.

and the Norwegian sailors; though they might import from Norway and Iceland the finest casts of horses.

22 We may compare this portrait only that of William of Malmesbury, who says, "The Normans were a people of great strength and courage, and of great industry and industry."

23 The Normans were a people of great strength and courage, and of great industry and industry."

24 The Normans were a people of great strength and courage, and of great industry and industry."

25 The Normans were a people of great strength and courage, and of great industry and industry."

26 The Normans were a people of great strength and courage, and of great industry and industry."

27 The Normans were a people of great strength and courage, and of great industry and industry."

28 The Normans were a people of great strength and courage, and of great industry and industry."

29 The Normans were a people of great strength and courage, and of great industry and industry."

30 The Normans were a people of great strength and courage, and of great industry and industry."

npt to deceive himself and the world, and whose venerable character would consecrate with the name of piety the measures least compatible with the practice of religion. His humanity was affected by the complaints, perhaps the calumnies, of an injured people the impious Normans had interrupted the payment of tithes: and the temporal sword might be lawfully unheathed against the sacrilegious robbers, who were deaf to the censures of the church. As a German of noble birth and royal kindred, Leo had free access to the court and confidence of the emperor Henry the Third; and in search of arms and allies, his ardent zeal transported him from Apulia to Saxony, from the Elbe to the Tyber. During these hostile preparations, Argyrus indulged himself in the use of secret and guilty weapons: a crowd of Normans became the victims of public or private revenge; and the valiant Drogo

A. D. 1051.

was murdered in a church. But his spirit survived in his brother Humphrey, the third count of Apulia. The assassins were chastised; and the son of Melo, overthrown and wounded, was driven from the field to hide his shame behind the walls of Bari, and to await the tardy succour of his allies.

But the power of Constantine was distracted by a Turkish war; the mind of Henry was feeble and irresolute; and the pope, instead of repassing the Alps with a German army, was accompanied only by a guard of seven hundred Swabians and some volunteers of Lorraine. In his long progress from Mantua to Beneventum, a vile and promiscuous multitude of Italians was enlisted under the holy standard: <sup>33</sup> the priest and the robber slept in the same tent; the pikes and crosses were intermingled in the front; and the martial saint repeated the lessons of his youth in the order of march, of encampment, and of combat. The Normans of Apulia could muster in the field no more than three thousand horse, with an handful of infantry; the defection of the natives intercepted their provisions and retreat; and their spirit, incapable of fear, was chilled for a moment by superstitious awe. On the hostile approach of Leo, they knelt, without disgrace or reluctance, before their spiritual father. But the pope was inexorable; his lofty Germans affected to deride the diminutive stature of their adversaries; and the Normans were informed that death or exile was their only alternative. Flight they disdained, and, as many of them had been three days without tasting food, they embraced the assurance of a more easy and honourable death. They climbed the hill of Civitella, descended into the plain, and charged in three divisions the army of the pope. On the left, and in the centre, Richard count of Aversa, and Robert the famous Guiscard, attacked, broke, routed, and pursued the Italian multitude, who fought without discipline, and fled without shame. A harder trial was reserved for the valour of count Humphrey, who led the cavalry of the right wing. The Germans <sup>34</sup> have been described as unskilful in the management of the horse and lance: but on foot they formed a strong and impenetrable phalanx; and neither man, nor steed, nor armour, could resist the weight of their long and two-handed swords. After a severe conflict, they were encompassed by the squadrons returning from the pursuit; and died in their ranks, with the esteem of their foes, and the satisfaction of revenge. The gates of Civitella were shut against the flying pope, and he was overtaken by the pious conquerors, who kissed his feet, to implore his blessing and the absolution of their sinful victory. The soldiers beheld in their enemy and captive the vicar of Christ; and, though we may suppose the policy of the chiefs, it is probable that they were infected by the popular superstition. In the calm of retirement, the well-meaning pope deplored the effusion of Christian blood, which must be imputed to his account: he felt that he had been the author of sin and scandal; and as his undertaking had failed, the indecency of his military character was universally condemned. <sup>35</sup> With these dispositions, he listened to the offers of a beneficial treaty; deserted an alliance which he had preached as the cause of God; and ratified the past and future conquests of the Normans. By whatever hands they had been usurped, the provinces of Apulia and Calabria were a part of the donation of Constantine and the patrimony of St. Peter. the grant and the acceptance confirmed the mutual claims of the pontiff and the adventurers. They promised to support each other with spiritual and temporal arms; a tribute or quit-rent of twelve-pence was afterwards stipulated for every plough-land: and since this memorable transaction, the kingdom of Naples has remained above seven hundred years a fief of the Holy See. <sup>36</sup>

The pedigree of Robert Guiscard <sup>37</sup> is variously deduced from the peasants and the dukes of Normandy; from the peasants, by the

His defeat and captivity.
June 18.

Origin of the papal investitures to the Normans.

Birth and character of Robert Guiscard.
A. D. 1020
—1085.

judices of the age, has been composed by Wibert, printed at Paris, 1615, in octavo, and since inserted in the collection of the Holl. vol. 10 of Mabillon, and of Muratori. The public and private history of that period is the subject of the Annals of the Empire, by the same author.

The verses of the Apulian are commonly in this strain, though he heads himself a little in the battle. Two of his similes from hawking and sorcery are descriptive of manners.

<sup>33</sup> Several respectable censures, or complaints are produced by M. de St. Marc (tom. ii. p. 200—204). As Peter Damianus, the oracle of the clergy, had been of the opinion that the war, the heretic, and Baronius, slyly asserts the

<sup>34</sup> The origin and nature of the papal investitures are ably discussed by Gaimore (Historia civile d'Napoli, tom. ii. p. 27—19 57—66.) as a lawyer and antiquarian. Yet he vainly strives to reconcile the duties of patriot and Catholic, adopts an empty distinction of "Ecclesia Romana non dedit sed accepit," and shrinks from an ho-

may 403, Janena
ns of
the

French and Latin Chronicles for supplemental intelligence.

pride and ignorance of a Grecian princess; <sup>38</sup> from the dukes, by the ignorance and flattery of the Italian subjects. <sup>39</sup> His genuine descent may be ascribed to the second or middle order of private nobility. <sup>40</sup> He sprang from a race of ravassors or bannets, of the diocese of Coutances, in the Lower Normandy: the castle of Hauteville was their honourable seat. His father Tancred was conspicuous in the court and army of the duke; and his military service was furnished by ten soldiers or knights. Two marriages, of a rank not unworthy of his own, made him the father of twelve sons, who were educated at home by the impartial tenderness of his second wife. But a narrow patrimony was insufficient for this numerous and daring progeny; they saw around the neighbourhood the mischiefs of poverty and discord, and resolved to seek in foreign wars a more glorious inheritance. Two only remained to perpetuate the race, and cherish their father's age: their ten brothers, as they successively attained the vigour of manhood, departed from the castle, passed the Alps, and joined the Apulian camp of the Normans. The elder were prompted by native spirit; their success encouraged their younger brethren, and the three first in seniority, William, Drogo, and Humphrey, deserved to be the chiefs of their nation, and the founders of the new republic. Robert was the eldest of the seven sons of the second marriage; and even the reluctant praise of his foes has endowed him with the heroic qualities of a soldier and a statesman. His lofty stature surpassed the tallest of his army: his limbs were cast in the true proportion of strength and gracefulness; and to the decline of life, he maintained the patient vigour of health and the commanding dignity of his form. His complexion was ruddy, his shoulders were broad, his hair and beard were long and of a flaxen colour, his eyes sparkled with fire, and his voice, like that of Achilles, could impress obedience and terror amidst the tumult of battle. In the ruder ages of chivalry, such qualifications are not below the notice of the poet or historian: they may observe that Robert, at once, and with equal dexterity, could wield in the right hand his sword, his lance in the left: that in the battle of Civitella, he was thrice unhorsed; and that in the close of that memorable day he was adjudged to have borne away the prize of valour from the warriors of the two armies. <sup>41</sup> His boundless ambition was founded on the consciousness of superior worth: in the pursuit of greatness, he was never arrested by the scruples of justice, and seldom moved by the feelings of humanity : though not insensible of fame, the choice of open or clandestine means was determined only by his present advantage. The surname of Guiscard<sup>42</sup> was applied to this master of political wisdom, which is too often confounded with the practice of dissimulation and deceit ; and Robert is praised by the Apulian poet for excelling the cunning of Ulysses and the eloquence of Cicero. Yet these arts were disguised by an appearance of military frankness. In his highest fortune, he was accessible and courteous to his fellow-soldiers ; and while he indulged the prejudices of his new subjects, he affected in his dress and manners to maintain the ancient fashion of his country. He grasped with a rapacious, that he might distribute with a liberal, hand. his primitive indigence had taught the habits of frugality ; the gain of a merchant was not below his attention ; and his prisoners were tortured with slow and unfeeling cruelty, to force a discovery of their secret treasure. According to the Greeks, he departed from Normandy with only five followers on horseback and thirty on foot ; yet even this allowance appears too bountiful : the sixth son of Tancred of Hauteville passed the Alps as a pilgrim ; and his first military band was levied among the adventurers of Italy. His brothers and countrymen had divided the fertile lands of Apulia : but they guarded their shares with the jealousy of avarice ; the aspiring youth was driven forwards to the mountains of Calabria, and in his first exploits against the Greeks and the natives, it is not easy to discriminate the hero from the robber. To surprise a castle or a convent, to ensnare a wealthy citizen, to plunder the adjacent villages for necessary food, were the obscure labours which formed and exercised the powers of his mind and body. The volunteers of Normandy adhered to his standard ; and, under his command, the peasants of Calabria assumed the name and character of Normans.

As the genius of Robert expanded with his fortune, he awakened the jealousy of his elder brother, by whom, in a transient quarrel, his life was threatened and his liberty restrained. After the death of Humphrey, the tender age of his sons excluded them from the command; they were reduced to a private estate by the ambition of their guardian and uncle; and Guiscard was exalted on a buckler, and saluted count of Apulia and general of the republic. With an increase of authority and of force, he resumed the conquest of Calabria, and soon aspired to a rank that should raise him for ever and excess,

His ambition
A. D. 1051-1050.

38 Ο δὲ Ῥομπέρτος (a Greek corruption) εἶπός τῃ Ναρμάντος τοῦ γενοῦ, τὴν τυχὴν ἀσπίδος . . . Again, εἰς ἀφ᾽ οὗτος πῶς τυχὴν περι-φαντος. And elsewhere (l. iv. p. 51), ἀπὸ εὐχῆς τῆς πατρὸς καὶ τυχῆς ἀφ᾽ οὗτος. Anna Comnena was born in the purple; yet her father was no more than a private though illustrious subject, who raised himself to the throne.

Giannone (om. ii. p. 2) forgets all his original authors, and rests on a princely descendant on the credit of Inveges, an Augustinian monk of Palermo in the last century. They contain the successes of dukes from Rollo to the Emperor of Constantinople whom they held (communelemente si tiene) to be the father of Tancred of Hauteville – a most strange and stupendous blunder! The sons of Tancred fought in Apulia, before William II was three years old (A. D. 1057).

40 The judgment of Ducange is just and moderate. Certe humilis fuit ac tenuis Roberti familia, si ducalem et regium spectemus antea, ad quem postea pervenit : quae honesta tamen et praefer nobilium <sup>et</sup> <sup>regum</sup> statum et conditionem illustris habita est. "cum res huius"

reperet nec altum quid timeret" (Wilhelm, Malmshur. de Gestis Anglorum, l. vi. p. 107. Not. ad Alexiad. p. 230).

41 I shall quote with pleasure some of the best lines of the Apulian (l. u. p. 270)

Pugnal utrâque manû, nec lances cassa, nec ensis Cassus erat, quocunque manû deducere vellet.
Ter dejectus equo, ter viribus ipse resumptis
Major in arma redit. stimulus furor ipse ministrat.
Ite cum frendens, &c.

71192, 27071706, is no bad translation of the surname and character of <sup>him</sup> Robert.

above the heads of his equals. By some acts of rapine or sacrifice, he had incurred a papal excommunication: but Nicholas the Second was easily persuaded, that the divisions of friends could terminate only in their mutual prejudice; that the Normans were the faithful champions of the Holy See; and it was safer to trust the alliance of a prince than the caprice of an aristocracy. A synod of one hundred bishops was convened at Melphi: and the count interrupted an important enterprise to guard the person and execute the decrees of the Roman pontiff. His gratitude and policy conferred on Robert and his posterity the ducal title,<sup>43</sup> with the investiture of Apulia, Calabria, and all the lands, both in Italy and Sicily, which his sword could rescue from the schismatic Greeks and the unbelieving Saracens.<sup>44</sup> This apostolic sanction might justify his arms: but the obedience of a free and victorious people could not be transferred without their consent; and Guiscard dissembled his elevation till the ensuing campaign had been illustrated by the conquest of Consenza and Reggio. In the hour of triumph, he assembled his troops, and solicited the Normans to confirm by their suffrage the judgment of the vicar of Christ: the soldiers hailed with joyful acclamations their valiant duke; and the counts, his former equals, pronounced the oath of fidelity, with hollow smiles

Duke of Apulia,
A. D. 1059.

and secret indignation. After this inauguration, Robert styled himself, "by the grace of God and St. Peter, duke of Apulia, Calabria, and hereafter of Sicily;" and it was the labour of twenty years to deserve and realise these lofty appellations. Such tardy progress, in a narrow space, may seem unworthy of the abilities of the chief and the spirit of the nation: but the Normans were few in number; their resources were scanty; their service was voluntary and precarious. The bravest designs of the duke were sometimes opposed by the free voice of his parliament of barons: the twelve counts of popular election conspired against his authority; and against their perfidious uncle the sons of Humphrey demanded justice and revenge. By his policy and vigour, Guiscard discovered their plots, suppressed their rebellions, and punished the guilty with death or exile: but in these domestic feuds, his years and the national strength were unprofitably consumed. After the defeat of his foreign enemies, the Greeks, Lombards, and Saracens, their broken forces retreated to the strong and populous cities of the sea-coast. They excelled in the arts of fortification and defence; the Normans were accustomed to serve on horseback in the field, and their rude attempts could only succeed by the efforts of persevering courage. The resistance of Salerno was maintained above eight months: the siege or blockade of Bari lasted near four years. In these actions the Norman duke was the foremost in every danger; in every fatigue the last and most patient. As he pressed the citadel of Salerno, an huge stone from the rampart shattered one of his military engines; and by a splinter he was wounded in the breast. Before the gates of Bari, he lodged in a miserable hut or barrack, composed of dry branches, and thatched with straw; a perilous station, on all sides open to the inclemency of the winter and the spears of the enemy.<sup>45</sup>

The Italian conquests of Robert correspond with the limits of the present kingdom of Naples; and the countries united by his arms have not been discovered by the revolutions of seven hundred years.<sup>46</sup> The monarchy has been composed of the Greek provinces of Calabria and Apulia, of the Lombard principality of Salerno, the republic of Amalphi, and the inland dependencies of the large and ancient duchy of Beneventum. Three districts only were exempted from the common law of subjection; the first for ever, and the two last till the middle of the succeeding century. The city and immediate territory of Benevento had been transferred, by gift or exchange, from the German emperor to the Roman pontiff; and although this holy land was sometimes invaded, the name of St. Peter was finally more potent than the sword of the Normans. Their first colony of Aversa subdued and held the state of Capua; and her princes were reduced to beg their bread before the palace of their fathers. The dukes of Naples, the present metropolis, maintained the popular freedom, under the shadow of the Byzantine empire. Among the new acquisitions of Guiscard, the science of Salerno,<sup>47</sup> and the trade of Amalphi,<sup>48</sup> may detain for a moment the curiosity of the reader.

I. Of the learned faculties, jurisprudence implies the previous establishment of laws and property; and theology may perhaps be superseded by the full light of religion and reason. But the savage and the sage must alike implore the assistance of physic; and, if our diseases are inflamed by luxury, the mischiefs of blows and wounds would be more frequent in the ruder ages of society. The treasures of Grecian medicine had been communicated to the Arabian colonies of Africa, Spain, and Sicily; and in the intercourse of peace and war, a spark of knowledge had been kindled and cherished at Salerno, an illustrious city, in which the men were honest and the women beautiful.<sup>49</sup> A

<sup>43</sup> The acquisition of the ducal title by Robert Guiscard is a nice and obscure business. With the good advice of (Gianone, Muratori, and St. Marc), I have endeavoured to form a consistent and probable narrative.

<sup>44</sup> Baronius (Annal. Eccles. A. D. 1059, No. 69) has published the original act. He professes to have copied it from the Liber Communi, a Vatican MS. Yet a Liber Census of the sixth century has been printed by Muratori (Antiquit. Medii Ævi, tom. v. p. 571-508), and the names of Vatican and Consenza awaken the suspicions of a Protestant, and even of a philosopher.

<sup>45</sup> Read the Life of Guiscard in the second and third books of the Annales.

<sup>46</sup> I, the exempt on om, the fourth ex. ora, fide, l. 1. x. was not established before the time of Frederic II.

His Italian
conquests.

School of Salerno.

<sup>47</sup> Giannone (tom. ii. p. 139-127), Muratori (Antiquit. Medii Ævi, tom. ii. dissert. xlv. p. 355, 370), and Tiraboschi (Storia della Letteratura Italiana), have given an historical account of these physicians, their medical knowledge and practice must be left to our physicians.

<sup>48</sup> At the present time, the city of Amalphi is a deserted town.

<sup>49</sup> A Pisani dire and forty writers. Yet he has forgotten two most important passages of the embassy of Luitprand (A. D. 1007), which compare the trade non non poma, nices, non puchit palata deunt,

Non species nullebris alie probatius vromum.
(Gualterius Appulus, l. iii. p. 467)

school, the first that arose in the darkness of Europe, was consecrated to the healing art : the conscience of monks and bishops was reconciled to that salutary and lucrative profession ; and a crowd of patients, of the most eminent rank, and most distant climates, invited or visited the physicians of Salerno. They were protected by the Norman conquerors ; and Guiscard, though bred in arms, could discern the merit and value of a philosopher. After a pilgrimage of thirty-nine years, Constantine, an African Christian, returned from Bagdad, a master of the language and learning of the Arabians ; and Salerno was enriched by the practice, the lessons, and the writings, of the pupil of Avicenna. The school of medicine has long slept in the name of an university ; but her precepts are abridged in a string of aphorisms, bound together in the Leonine verses, or Latin rhymes, of the twelfth century.<sup>50</sup>

Trade of Amalphi. II. Seven miles to the west of Salerno, and thirty to the south of Naples, the obscure town of Amalphi displayed the power and rewards of industry. The land, however fertile, was of narrow extent ; but the sea was accessible and open : the inhabitants first assumed the office of supplying the Western world with the manufactures and productions of the East ; and this useful traffic was the source of their opulence and freedom. The government was popular, under the administration of a duke and the supremacy of the Greek emperor. Fifty thousand citizens were numbered in the walls of Amalphi ; nor was any city more abundantly provided with gold, silver, and the objects of precious luxury. The mariners who swarmed in her port excelled in the theory and practice of navigation and astronomy ; and the discovery of the compass, which has opened the globe, is due to their ingenuity or good fortune. Their trade was extended to the coast, or at least to the commodities, of Africa, Arabia, and India ; and their settlements in Constantinople, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Alexandria, acquired the privileges of independent colonies.<sup>51</sup> After three hundred years of prosperity, Amalphi was oppressed by the arms of the Normans, and sacked by the jealousy of Pisa ; but the poverty of one thousand fishermen is yet dignified by the remains of an arsenal, a cathedral, and the palaces of royal merchants.

Roger, the twelfth and last of Sicily by count Roger the sons of Tancred, had been A.D. 1060-1090. long detained in Normandy by his own and his father's age. He accepted the welcome summons ; hastened to the Apulian camp ; and deserved at first the esteem, and afterwards the envy, of his elder brother. Their valour and ambition were equal ; but the youth, the beauty, the elegant manners, of Roger, engaged the disinterested love of the soldiers and people. So scanty was his allowance, for himself and forty followers, that he descended from conquest to robbery, and from robbery to domestic theft ; and so loose were the notions of property, that, by his own historian, at his special command, he is accused of stealing horses from a stable at Melfi.<sup>52</sup> His spirit emerged from poverty and disgrace, from these base practices he rose to the merit and glory of a holy war ; and the invasion of Sicily was seconded by the zeal and policy of his brother Guiscard. After the retreat of the Greeks, the idolaters, a most audacious reproach of the Catholics, had retrieved their losses and possessions ; but the deliverance of the island, so vainly undertaken by the forces of the Eastern empire, was achieved by a small and private band of adventurers.<sup>53</sup> In the first attempt, Roger braved, in an open boat, the real and fabulous dangers of Scylla and Charybdis ; landed with only sixty soldiers on a hostile shore ; drove the Saracens to the gates of Messina ; and safely returned with the spoils of the adjacent country. In the fortress of Trani, his active and patient courage were equally conspicuous. In his old age he related with pleasure, that by the distress of the siege, himself, and the countess his wife, had been reduced to a single cloak or mantle, which they wore alternately ; that in a sally his horse had been slain, and he was dragged away by the Saracens ; but that he owed his rescue to his good sword, and had retreated with his saddle on his back, lest the meanest trophy might be left in the hands of the miscreants. In the siege of Trani, three hundred Normans withstood and repulsed the forces of the island. In the field of Ceramio, fifty thousand horse and foot were overthrown by one hundred and thirty-six Christian soldiers, without reckoning St. George, who fought on horseback in the foremost ranks. The captive banners, with four camels, were reserved for the successor of St. Peter ; and had these barbaric spoils been exposed, not in the Vatican, but in the Capitol, they might have revived the memory of the Punic triumphs. These insufficient numbers of the Normans most probably denote their knights, the soldiers of honourable and equestrian rank, each of whom was attended by five or six followers in the field ;<sup>54</sup> yet, with the aid of this interpretation, and after every fair allowance on the side of valour, arms, and reputation, the discomfiture of so many myriads will reduce the prudent reader to the alternative of a miracle or a fable. The Arabs of Sicily derived a frequent

<sup>50</sup> Muratori carries their antiquity above the year (1066) of the death of Edward the Confessor, the rex Anglorum to whom they are addressed. Nor of Pasquer (Re (Glossar. Latini) A.D. 1060-1090. long detained in Normandy by his own and his father's age. He accepted the welcome summons ; hastened to the Apulian camp ; and deserved at first the esteem, and afterwards the envy, of his elder brother. Their

<sup>51</sup> The description of Amalphi, by William the Apulian (l. iii. p. 967) is, composita sunt in mari et circa mare, et in terra the third line

*Nauta maris calique una aperire portus.
Huc et Alexandri diversa feruntur ab urbe Reges, et Antiochia. Gens hac freta plurima transit.
His Arabes, Indi, Siculi nascuntur et Afri.*

*Hæc gens est totum prope nobilitata per orbem,
Et mercando ferens, et amans mercata referre.*

<sup>52</sup> Latrocinio armigerorum aorum in multis sustentabatur, quod quidem ad epi non omnium non dicitur, sed ipso ita patiens adque vltima et reprehensibilia dicitur, ut plures patesset, quam laborio et cum quanta angustia et profunda paupertate ad summum culmen divitiarum vel honoris attigunt. Such is the pre-

<sup>54</sup> See the word milites, in the Latin Glossary of Ducange.

men, the horses, the arms, the engines, the wooden towers covered with raw hides, were embarked on board one hundred and fifty vessels. the transports had been built in the ports of Italy, and the galleys were supplied by the alliance of the republic of Ragusa.

Stacy on Im-pizzo
A D 1081,
June 17.

At the mouth of the Adriatic Gulf, the shores of Italy and Epirus incline towards each other. The space between Brundisium and Durazzo, the Roman passage, is no more than one hundred miles;<sup>64</sup> at the last station of Otranto, it is contracted to fifty,<sup>65</sup> and this narrow distance had suggested to Pyrrhus and Pompey the sublime or extravagant idea of a bridge. Before the general embarkation, the Norman duke despatched Bohemond with fifteen galleys to seize or threaten the Isle of Corfu, to survey the opposite coast, and to secure an harbour in the neighbourhood of Vallona for the landing of the troops. They passed and lauded without perceiving an enemy; and this successful experiment displayed the neglect and decay of the naval power of the Greeks. The islands of Epirus and the maritime towns were subdued by the arms or the name of Robert, who led his fleet and army from Corfu (I use the modern appellation) to the siege of Durazzo. That city, the western key of the empire, was guarded by ancient renown, and recent fortifications, by George Palæologus, a patrician, victorious in the Oriental wars, and a numerous garrison of Albanians and Macedonians, who, in every age, have maintained the character of soldiers. In the prosecution of his enterprise, the courage of Guiscard was assailed by every form of danger and mischance. In the most propitious season of the year, as his fleet paced along the coast, a storm of wind and snow unexpectedly arose; the Adriatic was swelled by the raging blast of the south, and a new shipwreck confirmed the old adage of the Actæonian rocks.<sup>67</sup> The sails, the masts, and the oars, were shattered or torn away; the sea and shore were covered with the fragments of vessels, with arms and dead bodies; and the greatest part of the provisions were either drowned or damaged. The ducal galley was laboriously rescued from the waves, and Robert halted seven days on the adjacent cape, to collect the relics of his loss, and revive the drooping spirits of his soldiers. The Normans were no longer the bold and experienced mariners who had explored the ocean from Greenland to Mount Atlas, and who smiled at the petty dangers of the Mediterranean. They had wept during the tempest; they were alarmed by the hostile approach of the Venetians, who had been solicited by the prayers and promises of the Byzantine court. The first day's action was not disadvantageous to Bohemond, a beardless youth,<sup>23</sup> who led the naval powers of his father. All night the galleys of the republic lay on their anchors in the form of a crescent; and the victory of the second day was decided by the dexterity of their evolutions, the station of their archers, the weight of their javelins, and the borrowed aid of the Greek fire. The Apulian and Ragusan vessels fled to the shore, several were cut from their cables, and dragged away by the conqueror; and a sally from the town carried slaughter and dismay to the tents of the Norman duke. A seasonable relief was poured into Durazzo, and as soon as the besiegers had lost the command of the sea, the islands and maritime towns withdrew from the camp the supply of tribute and provision. That camp was soon afflicted with a pestilential disease; five hundred knights perished by an inglorious death; and the list of burials (if all could obtain a decent burial) amounted to ten thousand persons. Under these calamities, the mind of Guiscard alone was firm and invincible: and while he collected new forces from Apulia and Sicily, he battered, or scaled, or sapped, the walls of Durazzo. But his industry and valour were encountered by equal valour and more perfect industry. A moveable turret, of a size and capacity to contain five hundred soldiers, had been rolled forwards to the foot of the rampart: but the descent of the door or drawbridge was checked by an enormous beam, and the wooden structure was instantly consumed by artificial flames.

While the Roman empire was attacked by the Turks in the East, and the Normans in the West, the aged successor of Michael surrendered the sceptre to the hands of Alexius, an illustrious captain, and the founder of the Comnenian dynasty. The princess Anne, his daughter and historian, observes, in her affected style, that even Hercules was unequal to double combat; and, on this principle, she approves an hasty peace with the Turks, which allowed her father to undertake in person the relief of Durazzo. On his accession, Alexius found the camp without soldiers, and the treasury without money; yet such were the vigour and activity of his measures, that in six months he assembled an army of seventy thousand men,<sup>69</sup> and performed a march of five hundred miles. His troops were levied in Europe and Asia, from Peloponnesus to the Black Sea; his majesty was displayed in the silver arms and rich trappings of the companies of horse-guards.

63 The Itinerary of Antonine (p. 609, edit. Wesseling) gives a true and reliable statement of a Roman student or architect of the school, which is strongly doubted by Strabo (I, vi, p. 175) and Ptolemy (Hist. Nat. viii, 10).

<sup>60</sup> Pliny (Hist. Nat. iii. 6. 16.) allows permyadenda mulla for the brevispina curata, and agrees with the real distinction from Otrinto to L'Esclapart, or Apollon (cf. Anacle, Analyse du système de Cates de la France, etc. p. 7.) Herodotus Barbarus, who substitutes calam (H. rebout. Not. bot. in 1909. L. m.) might have been corrected by every Venetian pilot who had sailed out of the gulf.

67. Infans sequens Aeronaui, Horat. carm. 1.5 The praetorian Afrum decernentes Aquilonibus et raui in Noti, and the praetorian units of the Adriatic, are somewhat enlarged, i.e., Horat. is travelling for the life of Virgil, is an interesting moment in the history of poetry and friendship.

69 Τὰν δὲ εἰς τὴν παλαιὰ αὐτοῦ ἐκ Σοφιστικῆς (Alexias, I. iv. p. 106.1. Yet the Normans shaved, and the Venetians wore, their beards: they must have derided the no-beard of Bohemond, an harsh interpretation! (Ducange, Not. ad Alexias, p. 255).

60) Mutation (Annali d'Italia, tom. iv, p. 136, 137) observes, that some authors (Petrus Davon Chron Cassiner I. m. c. 19.) compose the Greek word of ἑὸς, Davon, men; but that the heutius may be struck off, and it will be found to be the original word, which means a man, as we observe to Fabius adules in the Chronicle of Titus Livius (Script. Ital. tom. v, p. 15.). Maffertius (iv. c. 27.) speaks in high, but inaccurate, terms of the emp' rom, cum copus innumera- bilibus. like the Apian poet (iv. p. 272.)

More locustarum montes et plana tegantur

and the emperor was attended by a train of nobles and princes, some of whom, in rapid succession, had been clothed with the purple, and were indulged by the lenity of the times in a life of affluence and dignity. Their youthful ardour might animate the multitude; but their love of pleasure and contempt of subordination were pregnant with disorder and mischief; and their importunate clamours for speedy and decisive action disconcerted the prudence of Alexius, who might have surrounded and starved the besieging army. The enumeration of provinces recalls a sad comparison of the past and present limits of the Roman world: the raw levies were drawn together in haste and terror; and the garrisons of Anatolia, or Asia Minor, had been purchased by the evacuation of the cities which were immediately occupied by the Turks. The strength of the Greek army consisted in the Varangians, the Scandinavian guards, whose numbers were recently augmented by a colony of exiles and volunteers from the British island of Thule. Under the yoke of the Norman conqueror, the Danes and English were oppressed and united: a band of adventurous youths resolved to desert a land of slavery; the sea was open to their escape; and, in their long pilgrimage, they visited every coast that afforded any hope of liberty and revenge. They were entertained in the service of the Greek emperor; and their first station was in a new city on the Asiatic shore: but Alexius soon recalled them to the defence of his person and palace; and bequeathed to his successors the inheritance of their faith and valour.<sup>70</sup> The name of a Norman invader revived the memory of their wrongs: they marched with alacrity against the national foe, and panted to regain in Epirus, the glory which they had lost in the battle of Hastings. The Varangians were supported by some companies of Franks or Latins; and the rebels, who had fled to Constantinople from the tyranny of Guiscard, were eager to signalise their zeal and gratify their revenge. In this emergency, the emperor had not disdained the impure aid of the Paulicians or Manichæans of Thrace and Bulgaria; and these heretics united with the patience of martyrdom, the spirit and discipline of active valour.<sup>71</sup> The treaty with the sultan had procured a supply of some thousand Turks; and the arrows of the Scythian horse were opposed to the lances of the Norman cavalry. On the report and distant prospect of these formidable numbers, Robert assembled a council of his principal officers. "You behold," said he, "your danger: it is urgent and inevitable. The hills are covered with arms and standards; and the emperor of the Greeks is accustomed to wars and triumphs. Obedience and union are our only safety; and I am ready to yield the command to a more worthy leader." The vote and acclamation, even of his secret enemies, assured him, in that perilous moment, of their esteem and confidence; and the duke thus continued: "Let us trust in the rewards of victory, and deprive cowardice of the means of escape. Let us burn our vessels and our baggage, and give battle on this spot, as if it were the place of our nativity and our burial." The resolution was unanimously approved, and without confining himself to his lines, Guiscard awaited in battle-array the nearer approach of the enemy. His rear was covered by a small river; his right wing extended to the sea; his left to the hills: nor was he conscious, perhaps, that on the same ground Cæsar and Pompey had formerly disputed the empire of the world.<sup>72</sup>

Against the advice of his wisest captains, Alexius resolved to risk the event of a general action, and exhorted the garrison of Durazzo to assist their own deliverance by a well-timed sally from the town. He marched in two columns to surprise the Normans before daybreak on two different sides: his light cavalry was scattered over the plain; the archers formed the second line; and the Varangians claimed the honours of the vanguard. In the first onset, the battle-axes of the strangers made a deep and bloody impression on the army of Guiscard, which was now reduced to fifteen thousand men. The Lombards and Calabrians ignominiously turned their backs; they fled towards the river and the sea; but the bridge had been broken down to check the sally of the garrison, and the coast was lined with the Venetian galleys, who played their engines among the disorderly throng. On the verge of ruin, they were saved by the spirit and conduct of their chiefs. Gaita, the wife of Robert, is painted by the Greeks as a warlike Amazon, a second Pallas; less skilful in arts, but not less terrible in arms, than the Athenian goddess:<sup>73</sup> though wounded by an arrow, she stood her ground, and strove, by her exhortation and example, to rally the flying troops.<sup>74</sup> Her female voice was seconded by the more powerful voice and arm of the Norman duke, as calm in action as he was magnanimous in council: "Whither," he cried aloud, "whither do ye fly? Your enemy is implacable; and death is less grievous than servitude." The moment was decisive: as the Varangians advanced before the line, they discovered the nakedness of their flanks: the main battle of the duke, of eight hundred knights, stood firm and entire; they couched their lances, and the

<sup>70</sup> See William of Malm-bury de Gestis Anglorum, l. i. p. 92. Alexius fides Anglorum successus præcipuis familiaritibus suis. . . . (111.) relates their emigration from . . .

The character and story of these

<sup>72</sup> See the simple and masterly narrative of Cæsar himself (Comment. de Bell. Civil. iii. 11-75.) It is a pity that Quintus Julius (M. Guiscard) did not live to analyse these operations, as he has done the campaigns of Africa and Spain.

<sup>73</sup> Παλας ἀλλὰ καὶ μὴ ἄνθρωπος, which is very properly translated by the president Cousin (Hist. de Constantinople, tom. iv. p. 151. in 12mo.), qui combattit comme . . . savante que celle d'Athènes. . . . two discordant characters, of a . . . and of a virgin Amazon of the . . .

. . . admires, with some degree of . . . were more familiar to the La . . . mentions her presence

Greeks deplore the furious and irresistible shock of the French cavalry.<sup>75</sup> Alexius was not deficient in the duties of a soldier or a general; but he no sooner beheld the slaughter of the Varangians, and the flight of the Turks, than he despaired his subjects, and despaired of his fortune. The princess Anne, who drops a tear on this melancholy event, is reduced to praise the strength and swiftness of her father's horse, and his vigorous struggle, when he was almost overthrown by the stroke of a lance, which had shivered the Imperial helmet. His desperate valour broke through a squadron of Franks who opposed his flight; and, after wandering two days and as many nights in the mountains, he found some repose, of body, though not of mind, in the walls of Lychmidus. The victorious Robert reproached the tardy and feeble pursuit which had suffered the escape of so illustrious a prize; but he consoled his disappointment by the trophies and standards of the field, the wealth and luxury of the Byzantine camp, and the glory of defeating an army five times more numerous than his own. A multitude of Italians had been the victims of their own fears; but only thirty of his knights were slain in this memorable day. In the Roman host, the loss of Greeks, Turks, and English, amounted to five or six thousand:<sup>76</sup> the plain of Durazzo was stained with noble and royal blood; and the end of the inopostor Michael was more honourable than his life.

It is more than probable that Durazzo taken A. D. 1082, Feb. 5. Guiscard was not afflicted by the loss of a costly puegant, which had merited only the contempt and derision of the Greeks. After their defeat, they still persevered in the defence of Durazzo; and a Venetian commander supplied the place of George Palæologus, who had been imprudently called away from his station. The tents of the besiegers were converted into barracks, to sustain the inclemency of the winter; and in answer to the defiance of the garrison, Robert insinuated, that his patience was at least equal to their obstinacy.<sup>77</sup> Perhaps he already trusted to his secret correspondence with a Venetian noble, who sold the city for a rich and honourable marriage. At the dead of night several rope-ladders were dropped from the walls; the light Calabrians ascended in silence; and the Greeks were awakened by the name and trumpets of the conqueror. Yet they defended the streets three days against an enemy already master of the rampart; and near seven months elapsed between the first investment and the final surrender of the place. From Durazzo, the Norman duke advanced into the heart of Epirus or Albania; traversed the first mountains of Thesaly; surprised three hundred English in the city of Castoria; approached Thessalonica; and made Constantinople tremble. A more pressing duty suspended the prosecution of his ambitious designs. By shipwreck, pestilence, and the sword, his army was reduced to a third of the original numbers; and instead of being recruited from Italy, he was informed, by plaintive epistles, of the mischief and dangers which had been produced by his absence—the revolt of the cities and barons of Apulia; the distress of the pope; and the approach or invasion of Henry king of Germany. Highly presuming that his person was sufficient for the public safety, he repassed the sea in a single brigantine, and left the remains of the army under the command of his son and the Norman counts, exhorting Bohemond to respect the freedom of his peers, and the counts to obey the authority of their leader. The son of Guiscard trod in the footsteps of his father; and the two destroyers are compared, by the Greeks, to the caterpillar and the locust, the last of whom devours whatever has escaped the teeth of the former.<sup>78</sup> After winning two battles against the emperor, he descended into the plain of Thessaly, and besieged Larissa, the fabulous realm of Achilles,<sup>79</sup> which contained the treasure and magazines of the Byzantine camp. Yet a just praise must not be refused to the fortitude and prudence of Alexius, who bravely struggled with the calamities of the times. In the poverty of the state, he presumed to borrow the superfluous ornaments of the churches, the desertion of the Manichæans was supplied by some tribes of Moldavia, a reinforcement of seven thousand Turks replaced and revenged the loss of their brethren; and the Greek soldiers were exercised to ride, to draw the bow, and to the daily practice of ambuscades and evolutions. Alexius had been taught by experience, that the formidable cavalry of the Franks on foot was unfit for action, and almost incapable of motion;<sup>80</sup> his archers were directed to aim their arrows at the horse rather than the man; and a variety of spikes and snares was scattered over the ground on which he might expect an attack. In the neighbourhood of Larissa the events of war were protracted and balanced. The courage of Bohemond was always conspicuous, and often successful; but his camp was pillaged by a stratagem of the Greeks; the city was impregnable; and the venal or discontented counts deserted his standard, betrayed their trusts, and enlisted in the service of the emperor. Alexius returned to Constantinople with the advantage, rather than the honour, of victory. After evacuating the conquests which he could no longer defend, the son of Guiscard embarked for Italy, and was

<sup>75</sup> Ἰσχυρὸν καὶ ταχὺ ῥομφαίων ἡ ἀντιπαρισταμένη αὐτῷ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ῥωμαίων κατὰ τὸν ἐπὶ τοῦ Ἰνδου τοῦ ἑλλήως ἀντιπάλου Ἀνδρᾶ.

<sup>78</sup> Βοημόνους καὶ ἀνδρᾶς; ὅμοιοι αἱ τοῖς ἀνέροισιν, παρὰ τοῦ Ἀνδρᾶ, ἢ τοῦ Ἰνδου. By these similes, so different from those of Homer, the

and laudable they might with so little trouble have slain two of his p. 110. b. Guiscard has explained the true source of the error, and inconvenient figure, which has been traced from the sixth to the eighth century. These spears, in the form of a scorpion, were sometimes two feet, and fastened to the knee with a silver chain.

Second expectation of role into terms
A D Post
Dated

The deliverer and scourge of Rome might have indulged himself in a season of repose; but in the same year of the flight of the German emperor, the indefatigable Robert resumed the design of his eastern conquests. The zeal or gratitude of Gregory had promised to his valour the kingdoms of Greece and Asia;<sup>78</sup> his troops were assembled in arms, flushed with success, and eager for action. Their numbers, in the language of Homer, are compared by Anna to a swarm of bees;<sup>79</sup> yet the utmost and moderate limits of the powers of Guiscard have been already defined; they were contained on this second occasion in one hundred and twenty vessels; and as the season was far advanced, the harbour of Brundisium<sup>80</sup> was preferred to the open road of Otranto. Alexius, apprehensive of a second attack, had assiduously laboured to restore the naval forces of the empire; and obtained from the republic of Venice an important succour of thirty-six transports, fourteen galleys, and nine galleots or ships of extraordinary strength and magnitude. Their services were liberally paid by the licence or monopoly of trade, a profitable gift of many shops and houses in the port of Constantinople, and a tribute to St. Mark, the more acceptable, as it was the produce of a tax on their rivals of Anaplhi. By the union of the Greeks and Venetians, the Adriatic was covered with an hostile fleet; but their own neglect, or the vigilance of Robert, the change of a wind, or the shelter of a mist, opened a free passage; and the Norman troops were safely disembarked on the coast of Ephesus. With twenty strong and well-appointed galleys, their intrepid duke immediately sought the enemy, and though more accustomed to fight on horseback, he trusted his own life, and the lives of his brother and two sons, to the event of a naval combat. The dominion of the sea was disputed in three engagements, in sight of the isle of Corfu: in the two former, the skill and numbers of the allies were superior; but in the third, the Normans obtained a final and complete victory.<sup>81</sup> The light brigantines of the Greeks were scattered in ignominious flight: the nine castles of the Venetians maintained a more obstinate conflict; seven were sunk, two were taken; two thousand five hundred captives implored in vain the mercy of the victor; and the daughter of Alexius depllores the loss of thirteen thousand of his subjects or allies. The want of experience had been supplied by the genius of Guiscard; and each evening, when he had sounded a retreat, he calmly explored the causes of his repulse, and invented new methods how to remedy his own defects, and to baffle the advantages of the enemy. The winter season suspended his progress; with the return of spring he again aspired to the conquest of Constantinople, but, instead of traversing the hills of Ipirus, he turned his arms against Greece and the islands, where the spoils would repay the labour, and where the land and sea forces might pursue their joint operations with vigour and effect. But, in the isle of Cephalonia, his projects were fatally blasted by an epidemical disease: Robert himself, in the seventieth year of his age, expired in his tent; and a H. & G. do not, A. D. 1085, July 17. suspicion of poison was imputed, by public rumour, to his wife, or to the Greek emperor.<sup>2</sup> This premature death might allow a boundless scope for the imagination of his future exploits; and the event sufficiently declares, that the Norman greatness was founded on his life.<sup>3</sup> Without the appearance of an enemy, a victorious army dispersed or retreated in disorder and consternation; and Alexius, who had trembled for his empire, rejoiced in his deliverance. The galley which transported the remains of Guiscard was shipwrecked on the Italian shore; but the duke's body was recovered from the sea, and deposited in the sepulchre of Venusia;<sup>4</sup> a place more illustrious for the birth of Horace,<sup>5</sup> than for the burial of the Norman heroes. Roger, his second son and successor, immediately sunk to the humble station of a duke of Apulia: the esteem or partiality of his father left the valiant Bohemond to the inheritance of his sword. The national tranquillity was disturbed by his claims, till the first crusade against the infidels of the East opened a more splendid field of glory and conquest.<sup>6</sup>

Of human life, the most glorious or humble prospects are alike soon bounded by the sepulchre.
The male line of Robert Guiscard was extinguished, both in Apulia and at Antioch, in the second generation; but his younger brother became the father of a line of kings; and the son of the great count was endowed with the name, the conquests, and the spirit, of the first Roger.<sup>17</sup> The heir of that Norman

88. The royalty of Robert, either promised or bestowed by the pope (Ann. alt. p. 52) is sufficiently confirmed by the Adrian p. 13 p. 271b.

Romani regni sibi promississe coronam.
F' p' fe clarior

Nor can I understand why Gretser, and the other papal advocates, should be displeased with the few instances of ignorance and error.

St. See Homer, Ibid. P. (I hate this pedantic mode of quotation by the letters of the Greek alphabet, &c.) His reason for the disorderly crowd, their discipline and public works seem to be the turn of a later age (Vergil, Æneid 11.)

[illegible][illegible]

(l. 10, p. 167) and Roger de Hoveden (p. 710 in Script post Bedam), and the latter can be taken the just Aexus post med. renewed, and buried also. His female accomplice. The English historian is indeed so found at the rank Robert Guiscard, or Wiscard, among the knights of Henry I., who ascended the throne fifteen years after the duke of Arundel's death.

The popular Arctonomenus enters some 10 works over the grave of monarchy. Alexiad., l. v. p. 172-166 and his best praise is the eternal and envy of Wlad the conqueror, the scourge of his family. Grammatyky's Western barbarism: necidentium libera beta quod ut Apulia tot esse et Italia turbitur.

94. Erbs Venusiana interitus decedat sepulchre is one of the titles of the Aphrodite poem (l. v. p. 278). With it of Madrigals (l. v. p. 107) inserts an epigraph on friendship, which is not without reason.

<sup>93</sup> Yet Horace had few obligations to Verusia: he was carried to Rome in his childhood (Serm. 1.1.1), and his repeated allusions to the doubtful merit of Alphona and Lucretia (Serm. 1.1.1, Serm. 1.1.1) are unworthy of his age and genius.

97. The reign of Roger, and the Norman kings of Sicily, is a subject which the Italian Cicerone of the twelfth century, op. cit. pp. 117-150, and is more than ever the subject of a series of the Historia Antiqua of Muratori, pp. 11-12. The Præsentation of the Historia Antiqua of Muratori, pp. 11-12, is a useful abstract of the Historia Antiqua of Muratori, pp. 11-12, which is a history of his country from Roger I. to Frederick II. inclusively.

adventurer was born in Sicily; and, at the age of only four years, he succeeded to the sovereignty of the island, a lot which reason might envy, could she indulge for a moment the visionary, though virtuous, wish of dominion. Had Roger been content with his fruitful patrimony, an happy and grateful people might have blessed their benefactor; and, if a wise administration could have restored the prosperous times of the Greek colonies,<sup>8</sup> the opulence and power of Sicily alone might have equalled the widest scope that could be acquired and desolated by the sword of war. But the ambition of the great count was ignorant of these noble pursuits; it was gratified by the vulgar means of violence and artifice. He sought to obtain the undivided possession of Palermo, of which one moiety had been ceded to the elder branch; struggled to enlarge his Calabrian limits beyond the measure of former treaties; and impatiently watched the declining health of his cousin William of Apulia, the grandson of Robert. On the Duke of Apulia.

A. D. 1127. first intelligence of his premature death, Roger sailed from Palermo with seven galleys, cast anchor in the Bay of Salerno, received, after ten days' negotiation, an oath of fidelity from the Norman capital, commanded the submission of the barons, and extorted a legal investiture from the reluctant popes, who could not long endure either the friendship or enmity of a powerful vassal. The sacred spot of Benevento was respectfully spared, as the patrimony of St. Peter; but the reduction of Capua and Naples completed the design of his uncle Guiscard; and the sole inheritance of the Norman conquests was possessed by the victorious Roger. A conscious superiority of power and merit prompted him to disdain the titles of duke and of count; and the isle of Sicily, with a third perhaps of the continent of Italy, might form the basis of a kingdom<sup>9</sup> which would only yield to the monarchies of France and England. The chiefs of the nation who attended his coronation at Palermo, might doubtless pronounce under what name he should reign over them; but the example of a Greek tyrant or a Saracen emir were insufficient to justify his regal character; and the nine kings of the Latin world<sup>101</sup> might disclaim their new associate, unless he were consecrated by the authority of the supreme pontiff. The pride of Anacletus was pleased to confer a title, which the pride of the Norman had stooped to solicit;<sup>102</sup> but his own legitimacy was attacked by the adverse election of Innocent the Second; and while Anacletus sat in the Vatican, the successful fugitive was acknowledged by the nations of Europe. The infant the tyrant Duchy of Sicily.

101/2
4750
The ruins of Agrigento are the theme of every traveller, D'Orcville, Revue, Numismatique, &c.
102 Roger conveyed the second person of Lothaire's army, who, soothed, or rather cired, a retreat, for the Germans say, (inimatus, 1 in c. p. 51) are ignorant of the use of trumpets. Most ignorant himself.

103 See De Guignes, Hist. Générale des Huns, tom. i. p. 361—373 and Carlonne, Hist. de l'Afrique, &c. sous la Domination des Arabes. tom. i. p. 70—114. Their common original appears to be Svanar.

104 Tripoli (says the Nubian geographer, or more properly the Sheriff al Edrisi) urbis fortis, saxo muro vallata, sita prope litus maris. Hanc expugnavit Rogerius, qui multibus captivis ductis, viros peremit.

monarchy of Roger was shaken, and almost overthrown, by the unlucky choice of an ecclesiastical patron; and the sword of Lothaire the Second of Germany, the excommunications of Innocent, the fleets of Pisa, and the zeal of St. Bernard, were united for the ruin of the Sicilian robber. After a gallant resistance, the Norman prince was driven from the continent of Italy: a new duke of Apulia was invested by the pope and the emperor, each of whom held one end of the gonfalon, or flag-staff, as a token that they asserted their right, and suspended their quarrel. But such jealous friendship was of short and precarious duration: the German armies soon vanished in disease and desertion: the Apulian duke, with all his adherents, was exterminated by a conqueror, who seldom forgave either the dead or the living; like his predecessor Leo the Ninth, the feeble though haughty pontiff became the captive and friend of the Normans; and their reconciliation was celebrated by the eloquence of Bernard, who now revered the title and virtues of the king of Sicily.

As a penance for his impious war against the successor of St. Peter, that monarch might have promised to display the banner of the cross, and he accomplished with ardour a vow so propitious to his interest and revenge. The recent injuries of Sicily might provoke a just retaliation on the heads of the Saracens: the Normans, whose blood had been mingled with so many subject streams, were encouraged to remember and emulate the naval trophies of their fathers, and in the maturity of their strength they contended with the decline of an African power. When the Fatimite caliph departed for the conquest of Egypt, he rewarded the real merit and apparent fidelity of his servant Joseph, with a gift of his royal mantle, and forty Arabian horses, his palace, with its sumptuous furniture, and the government of the kingdoms of Tunis and Algiers. The Zeirides, the descendants of Joseph, forgot their allegiance and gratitude to a distant benefactor; grasped and abused the fruits of prosperity; and after running the little course of an Oriental dynasty, were now fainting in their own weakness. On the side of the land, they were oppressed by the Almohades, the fanatic princes of Morocco, while the sea-coast was open to the enterprises of the Greeks and Franks, who, before the close of the eleventh century, had extorted a ransom of two hundred thousand pieces of gold. By the first arms of Roger, the island or rock of Malta, which has been since ennobled by a military and religious colony, was inseparably annexed to the crown of Sicily. Tripoli,<sup>104</sup> a strong and and independent coronation (A. D. 1150, May 1), which Giamone unwillingly rejects (tom. ii. p. 177—111). This fiction is disproved by the silence of contemporaries, nor can it be restored by a spurious charter of Mesina (Muratori, Annali d'Italia, tom. ix. p. 346. Fagn, Critica, tom. iv. p. 167, 468).

His conquests in Africa.
A. D. 1122—1152.

102 Roger conveyed the second person of Lothaire's army, who, soothed, or rather cired, a retreat, for the Germans say, (inimatus, 1 in c. p. 51) are ignorant of the use of trumpets. Most ignorant himself.

103 See De Guignes, Hist. Générale des Huns, tom. i. p. 361—373 and Carlonne, Hist. de l'Afrique, &c. sous la Domination des Arabes. tom. i. p. 70—114. Their common original appears to be Svanar.

104 Tripoli (says the Nubian geographer, or more properly the Sheriff al Edrisi) urbis fortis, saxo muro vallata, sita prope litus maris. Hanc expugnavit Rogerius, qui multibus captivis ductis, viros peremit.

maritime city, was the next object of his attack; and the slaughter of the males, the captivity of the females, might be justified by the frequent practice of the Moslems themselves. The capital of the Zeirides was named Africa from the country, and Mahadia<sup>105</sup> from the Arabian founder: it is strongly built on a neck of land, but the imperfection of the harbour is not compensated by the fertility of the adjacent plain. Mahadia was besieged by George the Sicilian admiral, with a fleet of one hundred and fifty galleys, amply provided with men and the instruments of mischief: the sovereign had fled, the Moorish governor refused to capitulate, declined the last and irresistible assault, and secretly escaping with the Moslem inhabitants, abandoned the place and its treasures to the rapacious Franks. In successive expeditions, the king of Sicily or his lieutenants reduced the cities of Tunis, Safax, Capsia, Bona, and a long tract of the sea-coast; <sup>106</sup> the fortresses were garrisoned, the country was tributary; and a boast, that it held Africa in subjection, might be inscribed with some flattery on the sword of Roger.<sup>107</sup> After his death, that sword was broken; and these transmarine possessions were neglected, evacuated, or lost, under the troubled reign of his successor.<sup>108</sup> The triumphs of Scipio and Belisarius have proved, that the African continent is neither inaccessible nor invincible; yet the great princes and powers of Christendom have repeatedly failed in their armaments against the Moors, who may still glory in the easy conquest and long servitude of Spain.

His invasion of Greece, A. D. 1146.
Since the decease of Robert Guiscard, the Normans had relinquished, above sixty years, their hostile designs against the empire of the East. The policy of Roger solicited a public and private union with the Greek princes, whose alliance would dignify his regal character; he demanded in marriage a daughter of the Comnenian family, and the first steps of the treaty seemed to promise a favourable event. But the contemptuous treatment of his ambassadors exasperated the vanity of the new monarch; and the insolence of the Byzantine court was exalted, according to the laws of nations, by the sufferings of a guiltless people.<sup>109</sup> With a fleet of seventy galleys, George the admiral of Sicily appeared before Corfu; and both the island and city were delivered into his hands by the disaffected inhabitants, who had yet to learn that a siege is still more calamitous than a tribute. In this invasion, of some moment in the annals of commerce, the Normans spread themselves by sea, and over the provinces of Greece; and the venerable age of Athens, Thebes, and Corinth, was violated by rapine and cruelty. Of the wrongs of Athens no memorial remains. The ancient walls, which encompassed, without guarding, the opulence of Thebes, were scaled by the Latin Christians; but their sole use of the Gospel was to sanctify an oath, that the lawful owners had not secreted any relic of their inheritance or industry. On the approach of the Normans the lower town of Corinth was evacuated: the Greeks retired to the citadel, which was seated on a lofty eminence abundantly watered by the classic fountain of Pirene; an impregnable fortress, if the want of courage could be balanced by any advantages of art or nature. As soon as the besiegers had surmounted the labour (their sole labour) of climbing the hill, their general, from the commanding eminence, admired his own victory, and testified his gratitude to Heaven, by tearing from the altar the precious image of Theodore the tutelary saint. The silk weavers of both sexes, whom George transported to Sicily, composed the most valuable part of the spoil; and in comparing the skilful industry of the mechanic with the sloth and cowardice of the soldier, he was heard to exclaim, that the distaff and loom were the only weapons which the Greeks were capable of using. The progress of this naval armament was marked by two conspicuous events, the rescue of the king of France, and the insult of the Byzantine capital. In his return by sea from an unfortunate crusade, Louis the Seventh was intercepted by the Greeks, who basely violated the laws of honour and religion. The fortunate encounter of the Norman fleet delivered the royal captive; and, after a free and honourable entertainment in the court of Sicily, Louis continued his journey to Rome and Paris.<sup>110</sup> In the absence of the emperor, Constantinople and the Hellespont <sup>insults Constantinople.</sup> were left without defence and without the suspicion of danger. The clergy and people, for the soldiers had followed the standard of Manuel, were astonished and dismayed at the hostile appearance of a line of galleys, which boldly cast anchor in the front of the Imperial city. The forces of the Sicilian admiral were inadequate to the siege or assault of an immense and populous metropolis: but George enjoyed the glory of humbling the Greek arrogance, and of marking the path of conquest to the navies of the West. He landed some soldiers to rife the fruits of the royal gardens, and pointed with silver, or most probably with fire, the arrows which he discharged against the palace of the Cæsars.<sup>111</sup>

Georg. Frederici I. l. i. c. 53 in Muratori, Script. tom. vi. p. 668, the Venerian Andrew Dandolo Hist. tom. xii. p. 282, 283, and the Greek writers Cinnamus (l. iii. c. 2-5) and Nicetas (in Manuel. l. iii. c. 1-6).

<sup>110</sup> To this imperfect capture and speedy rescue, I apply the words ἀπολαύω τοῦ ἀνδραγαθίου of Cinnamus, l. iii. c. 19, p. 49. Muratori, on tolerable evidence Annali d'Italia, tom. ix. p. 420, 421, is puzzled at the delicacy of the French, un homme, unarque, melle, n'ont nite pericula ad regnum proprium revertunt esse. yet I observe that their advocate, Durandus, is less positive as the commentator on Cinnamus, than as the author of Geneva.

<sup>111</sup> In palatium regium sagittas igneis misit, says Dandolo; but Nicetas, l. iii. c. 8, p. 66, transforms them into βολὴν ἀνεστρέψαντα ἐν τῷ ἀνακτορίῳ, and adds, that Manuel styled this insult — αἱ σφαῖραι, and γὰρ οὐκ ἔστιν ἀνεστρέψαντα. These arrows, by the conj. αἱ, Vincent or Beauvais, are again transmuted into gold.

<sup>105</sup> See the geography of Leo Africanus (in Ramusio, tom. i. fol. 71 verso, fol. 75, recto), and Shaw's Travels, p. 110, the sixth book of Thuanus, and the sixth of the Abbe de Verot. The possession and defense of the place was offered by Charles V. and wisely declined by the knights of Malta.

<sup>106</sup> Pagan has accurately marked the African conquests of Roger; and the Abbe de Longueville, l. i. 26, 27, A. D. 1118, 1119.

<sup>107</sup> Norman conquerors were still discriminated from their Christian and Moslem subjects.

<sup>108</sup> Hugo Falcandus (Hist. Sicula, in Muratori Script. tom. vi. p. 270, 271) describes these losses to the neglect or treachery of the admiral Majo.

<sup>109</sup> The silence of the Sicilian historians, who end too soon or begin too late, must be supplied by Otto of Frisingen, a German, die

The emperor Manuel repulses the Germans.
A. D. 1148, 1149.

This playful outrage of the pirates of Sicily, who had surprised an unguarded moment, Manuel affected to despise, while his martial spirit, and the forces of the empire, were awakened to revenge. The Archipelago and Ionian Sea were covered with his squadrons and those of Venice; but I know not by what favourable allowance of transports, victuallers, and pinnaces, our reason or even our fancy can be reconciled to the stupendous account of fifteen hundred vessels, which is proposed by a Byzantine historian. These operations were directed with prudence and energy: in his homeward voyage George lost nineteen of his galleys, which were separated and taken: after an obstinate defence, Corfu implored the clemency of her lawful sovereign; nor could a ship, a soldier of the Norman prince, be found, unless as a captive, within the limits of the Eastern empire. The prosperity and the health of Roger were already in a declining state: while he listened in his palace of Palermo to the messengers of victory or defeat, the invincible Manuel, the foremost in every assault, was celebrated by the Greeks and Latins as the Alexander or the Hercules of the age.

A prince of such a temper could not be satisfied with having repelled the insolence of a barbarian. It was the right and duty, it might be the interest and glory, of Manuel to restore the ancient majesty of the empire, to recover the provinces of Italy and Sicily, and to chastise this pretended king, the grandson of a Norman vassal.<sup>112</sup> The natives of Calabria were still attached to the Greek language and worship, which had been inexorably proscribed by the Latin clergy: after the loss of her dukes, Apulia was chained as a servile appendage to the crown of Sicily: the founder of the monarchy had ruled by the sword; and his death had abated the fear, without healing the discontent, of his subjects: the feudal government was always pregnant with the seeds of rebellion; and a nephew of Roger himself invited the enemies of his family and nation. The majesty of the purple, and a series of Hungarian and Turkish wars, prevented Manuel from embarking his person in the Italian expedition. To the brave and noble Palæologus, his lieutenant, the Greek monarch intrusted a fleet and army: the siege of Bari was his first exploit; and, in every operation, gold as well as steel was the instrument of victory. Salerno, and some places along the western coast, maintained their fidelity to the Norman king; but he lost in two campaigns the greater part of his continental possessions; and the modest emperor, disdainful all flattery and falsehood, was content with the reduction of three hundred cities or villages of Apulia and Calabria, whose names and titles were inscribed on all the walls of the palace. The prejudices of the Latins were gratified by a genuine or fictitious donation, under the seal of the German Cæsars;<sup>113</sup> but the successor of Constantine soon renounced this ignominious pretence, claimed the indefeasible dominion of Italy, and professed his design of chasing the barbarians beyond the Alps. By the artful speeches, liberal gifts, and unbounded promises, of their Eastern ally, the free cities were encouraged to persevere in their generous struggle against the despotism of Frederic Barbarossa. the walls of Milan were rebuilt by the contributions of Manuel; and he poured, says the historian, a river of gold into the bosom of Ancona, whose attachment to the Greeks was fortified by the jealous enmity of the Venetians.<sup>114</sup> The situation and trade of Ancona rendered it an important garrison in the heart of Italy: it was twice besieged by the arms of Frederic; the Imperial forces were twice repulsed by the spirit of freedom; that spirit was animated by the ambassador of Constantinople; and the most intrepid patriots, the most faithful servants, were rewarded by the wealth and honours of the Byzantine court.<sup>115</sup> The pride of Manuel disdained and rejected a barbarian colleague; his ambition was excited by the hope of stripping the purple from the German usurpers, and of establishing, in the West, as in the East, his lawful title of sole emperor of the Romans. With this view, he solicited the alliance of the people and the bishop of Rome. Several of the nobles embraced the cause of the Greek monarch; the splendid nuptials of his niece with Odo Frangipani secured the support of that powerful family,<sup>116</sup> and his royal standard or image was entertained with due reverence in the ancient metropolis.<sup>117</sup> During the quarrel between Frederic and Alexander the Third, the pope twice received in the Vatican the ambassadors of Constantinople. They flattered his piety by the long-promised union of the two churches, tempted the avarice of his venal court, and exhorted the Roman pontiff to seize the just provocation, the favourable moment, to humble the savage insolence of the Alemanni, and to acknowledge the true representative of Constantine and Augustus.<sup>118</sup>

But these Italian conquests, this universal reign, soon escaped from the hand of the Greek emperor. His first demands were eluded by the prudence of Alexander the Third, who paused on this deep and momentous revolution; <sup>119</sup> nor could the pope be second siege that we possess an original narrative, which he has published in his great collection (tom. vi. p. 321-336).

Failure of his designs.

<sup>112</sup> We derive this anecdote from an anonymous chronicle of Fossa Nova, published by Muratori (Script. Ital. tom. vi. p. 871).

<sup>113</sup> The basilicous stylos of Constantine (l. i. c. 14 p. 99.) is susceptible of this double sense. A standard is more Latin, an image more Greek.

<sup>114</sup> Nihilominus quoque petatit, ut quia occasio justa et tempus opportunum et acceptabile se ostendebat, Romanorum coronam imperii a sacro apostolice sibi reddideretur, quoniam non ad Fredericum Alemanni, sed ad suum asserunt pertinere (Vit. Alexandri III. a Cardinali Arragonensi, in Script. Rerum Ital. tom. vi. p. 478). His words and embassy was accompanied cum immensa multitudine pecuniarum.

<sup>115</sup> Serius alta et perplexa sunt (Vit. Alexandri III. p. 460, 461.) says the cautious pope.

<sup>112</sup> For the invasion of Italy, which is almost overlooked by Muratori, see the private history of Constantine (l. i. c. 1. l. p. 78.) [101] who introduced a de novo narrative by a lofty profession, τοιοῦτο συνέλαβε, ὅτι, καὶ τὰς ἰταλίας ἐκείνητος χρόνου, ἀπὸ καὶ ταύτης (p. 102, 103).

<sup>113</sup> The basilicous stylos of Constantine (l. i. c. 14 p. 99.) is susceptible of this double sense. A standard is more Latin, an image more Greek.

<sup>114</sup> Nihilominus quoque petatit, ut quia occasio justa et tempus opportunum et acceptabile se ostendebat, Romanorum coronam imperii a sacro apostolice sibi reddideretur, quoniam non ad Fredericum Alemanni, sed ad suum asserunt pertinere (Vit. Alexandri III. a Cardinali Arragonensi, in Script. Rerum Ital. tom. vi. p. 478). His words and embassy was accompanied cum immensa multitudine pecuniarum.

<sup>115</sup> Serius alta et perplexa sunt (Vit. Alexandri III. p. 460, 461.) says the cautious pope.

seduced by a personal dispute to renounce the perpetual inheritance of the Latin name. After his reunion with Frederic, he spoke a more peremptory language, confirmed the acts of his predecessors, excommunicated the adherents of Manuel, and pronounced the final separation of the churches, or at least the empires, of Constantinople and Rome.<sup>110</sup> The free cities of Lombardy no longer remembered their foreign benefactor; and without preserving the friendship of Ancona, he soon incurred the enmity of Venice.<sup>121</sup> By his own avarice, or the complaints of his subjects, the Greek emperor was provoked to arrest the persons, and confiscate the effects, of the Venetian merchants. This violation of the public faith exasperated a free and commercial people: one hundred galleys were launched and armed in as many days; they swept the coasts of Dalmatia and Greece; but after some mutual wounds, the war was terminated by an agreement, inglorious to the empire, insufficient for the republic; and a complete vengeance of these and of fresh injuries, was reserved for the succeeding generation. The lieutenant of Manuel had informed his sovereign that he was strong enough to quell any domestic revolt of Apulia and Calabria; but that his forces were inadequate to resist the impending attack of the king of Sicily. His prophecy was soon verified: the death of Palæologus devolved the command on several chiefs, alike eminent in rank, alike defective in military talents; the Greeks were oppressed by land and sea; and a captive remnant that escaped the swords of the Normans and Saracens, abjured all future hostility against the person or dominions of their conqueror.<sup>122</sup> Yet the king of Sicily esteemed the courage and constancy of Manuel, who had landed a second army on the Italian shore: he respectfully addressed the new Justinian; solicited a peace or truce of thirty years; accepted, as a gift, the regal title; and acknowledged himself the military vassal of the Roman empire.<sup>123</sup> The Byzantine

Peace with the Normans.
A. D. 1136.

Cæsars acquiesced in this shadow of dominion, without expecting, perhaps without desiring, the service of a Norman army; and the truce of thirty years was not disturbed by any hostilities between Sicily and Constantinople. About the end of that period the throne of Manuel was usurped by an inhuman tyrant, who had deserved the abhorrence of his country and mankind: the sword of William the Second, the grandson of Roger, was drawn by a fugitive of the Comnenian race; and the subjects of Andronicus might salute the strangers as friends, since they detested their sovereign as the worst of enemies. The Latin historians<sup>124</sup> expatiate on the rapid progress of the four counts who invaded Romania with a fleet and army, and reduced many castles and cities to the obedience of the king of Sicily. The Greeks<sup>125</sup> accuse and magnify the wanton and sacrilegious cruelties that were perpetrated in the sack of Thessalonica, the second city of the empire. The former deplore the fate of those invincible but unsuspecting warriors who were destroyed by the arts of a vanquished foe. The latter applaud, in songs of triumph, the repeated victories of their countrymen on the Sea of Marmora or Propontis, on the banks of the Strymon, and under the walls of Durazzo. A revolution which punished the crimes of Andronicus, had united against the Franks the zeal and courage of the successful insurgents: ten thousand were slain in battle; and Isaac Angelus, the new emperor, might indulge his vanity or vengeance in the treatment of four thousand captives. Such was the event of the last contest between the Greeks and Normans: before the expiration of twenty years, the rival nations were lost or degraded in foreign servitude; and the successors of Constantine did not long survive to insult the fall of the Sicilian monarchy.

The sceptre of Roger successively devolved to his son and grandson: they might be confounded under the name of William; they are strongly discriminated by the epithets of the bad and the good: but these epithets, which appear to describe the perfection of vice and virtue, cannot strictly be applied to either of the Norman princes. When he was roused to arms by danger and shame, the first William did not degenerate from the valour of his race; but his temper was slothful; his manners were dissolute; his passions headstrong and mischievous; and the monarch is responsible, not only for his personal vices, but for those of Major, the great admiral, who abused the confidence, and conspired against the life, of his benefactor. From the Arabian conquest, Sicily had imbibed a deep tincture of Oriental manners; the despotism, the pomp, and even the harem, of a sultan; and a Christian people was oppressed and insulted by the ascendant of the eunuchs, who openly professed, or secretly cherished, the religion of Mahomet. An eloquent historian of the times<sup>126</sup> has delineated the misfortunes of his country: the ambition and fall of the ungrateful Major; the revolt and

William I.
the Bad, king of Sicily.
A. D. 1135,
Feb. 29th.
A. D. 1166,
May 7.

<sup>120</sup> Μανὸς ἡγεμονίας Ἀνδρονίκου. Περὶ τῆς ἐκείνου ἀπορίας καὶ τῆς ἀπορίας ἀπορίας καὶ τῆς ἀπορίας ἀπορίας. (A. D. 1136.)

<sup>121</sup> In his sixth book, Comnenus describes the Venetian navy, which Nicolas has not thought worthy of his attention. The Italian accounts, which by no means satisfy our curiosity, are reported by the first Muratori, under the years 1171, &c.

<sup>122</sup> This victory is mentioned by Renaldus de Sideribus Muratori, Script. Ital. tom. vi. p. 308. It is obvious that such a truce to the prince of the king of Sicily, Comnenus (A. D. 1136, p. 302, 303) is a man warmer and more generous than I find him (p. 265, 270). The Greek is fond of deceptions, and the Latin for as an is not fond of William the Bad.

<sup>123</sup> For the justice of William I. see Comnenus (l. iv. c. 13, p. 101, 102), and Nicolas (l. ii. c. 8). It is difficult to affirm, of either these authors, in these flattering portraits

evidence, the poor character of Frederick. The king of Sicily sent his troops contra nequitiam Andronicum. . . . ad nequitiam.

genial emperor, C. P. They were captives to confound . . . decepti capti, p. 101, 102.

<sup>124</sup> The history of Comnenus, which is now reduced to . . . Andronicus. . . . Isaac Angelus, l. c. 11, who has become a popular abbreviation. As he survived the emperor, and the emperor does not flatter him, but the fall of Constantinople, and his personal vices, and the Latin. For the honor of the king, a skill of a few, that flowers great antiquarian, Andronicus at Thessalonica, a relic of the old world.

<sup>125</sup> The History of Sicily, l. c. 10, which properly extends from 1134 to 1166, is written in the sixth volume of Muratori's collection, tom. vi. p. 314, and preceded by an eloquent preface, or epistle, p. 21, 22. De Constantinianis. . . . Eusebius has been saved the pains of Sicily, and, after a just, but immense, platonic, from the rest to the sixth century, from a senator to a monk, I would not strip him of his title. His narrative is rapid and full of interest, and, in the end, and again, his observation. He had a talent to speak in such a manner. I can only repeat the name and the name of the king, his subjects have been lost.

<sup>127</sup> The famous Benedictines (l'Art de vérifier les Dates, p. 202

which the Vatican has so often been praised or arraigned, was on this occasion blind and inactive; and if it were true that Celestine the Third had kicked away the Imperial crown from the head of the prostrate Henry,<sup>17</sup> such an act of impotent pride could serve only to cancel an obligation and provoke an enemy. The Genoese, who enjoyed a beneficial trade and establishment in Sicily, listened to the promise of his boundless gratitude and speedy departure.<sup>18</sup> Their fleet commanded the Straits of Messina, and opened the harbour of Palermo; and the first act of his government was to abolish the privileges, and to seize the property, of these imprudent allies. The last hope of Falcandus was defeated by the discord of the Christians and Mahometans: they fought in the capital; several thousands of the latter were slain; but their surviving brethren fortified the mountains, and disturbed above thirty years the peace of the island. By the policy of Frederic the Second, sixty thousand Saracens were transplanted to Nocera in Apulia. In their wars against the Roman church, the emperor and his son Mainfroy were strengthened and disgraced by the service of the enemies of Christ; and this national colony maintained their religion and manners in the heart of Italy, till they were extirpated, at the end of the thirteenth century, by the zeal and revenge of the house of Anjou.<sup>19</sup> All the calamities which the prophetic orator had deplored, were surpassed by the cruelty and avarice of the German conqueror. He violated the royal sepulchres, and explored the secret treasures of the palace, Palermo, and the whole kingdom: the pearls and jewels, however precious, might be easily removed; but one hundred and sixty horses were laden with the gold and silver of Sicily.<sup>20</sup> The young king, his mother and sisters, and the nobles of both sexes, were separately confined in the fortresses of the Alps; and, on the slightest rumour of rebellion, the captives were deprived of life, of their eyes, or of the hope of posterity. Constantia herself was touched with sympathy for the miseries of her country; and the heiress of the Norman line might struggle to check her despotic husband, and to save the patrimony of her new-born son, of an emperor so famous in the next age under the name of Frederic the Second.

Final extinction of the Normans. A. D. 1201. Ten years after this revolution, the French monarchs annexed to their crown the duchy of Normandy. the sceptre of her ancient dukes had been transmitted, by a grand-daughter of William the Conqueror, to the house of Plantagenet; and the adventurous Normans, who had raised so many trophies in France, England, and Ireland, in Apulia, Sicily, and the East, were lost, either in victory or servitude, among the vanquished nations.

CHAP. LVII.

The Turks of the House of Seljuk. — Their Revolt against Mahmud Conqueror of Hindustan. — Togrul subdues Persia, and protects the Caliphs. — Defeat and Captivity of the Emperor Romanus Diogenes by Alp Arslan. — Power and Magnificence of Malek Shah. — Conquest of Asia Minor and Syria. — State and Oppression of Jerusalem. — Pilgrimages to the Holy Sepulchre.

FROM the isle of Sicily, the reader must transport himself beyond the Caspian Sea, to the original seat of the Turks or Turkmans, against whom the first crusade was principally directed.<sup>THE TURKS.</sup> Their Scythian empire of the sixth century was long since dissolved; but the name was still famous among the Greeks and Orientals; and the fragments of the nation, each a powerful and independent people, were scattered over the desert from China to the Oxus and the Danube: the colony of Hungarians was admitted into the republic of Europe, and the thrones of Asia were occupied by slaves and soldiers of Turkish extraction. While Apulia and Sicily were subdued by the Norman lance, a swarm of these Northern shepherds overspread the kingdoms of Persia: their princes of the race of Seljuk erected a splendid and solid empire from Samarcand to the confines of Greece and Egypt; and the Turks have maintained their dominion in Asia Minor, till the victorious crescent has been planted on the dome of St. Sophia.

One of the greatest of the Turkish princes was Mahmood or Mahmud,<sup>1</sup> the Gaznevide, who reigned in the eastern provinces of Persia, one thousand years after the birth of Christ. His father Sebestagi was the slave of the slave of the slave of the commander of the faithful. But in this descent of servitude, the first degree was merely titular, since it was filled by the sovereign of Transoxiana and Chorasán, who still paid a nominal allegiance to the caliph of Bagdad. The second rank was that of a minister of state, a lieutenant of the Samanides,<sup>2</sup> who broke, by his revolt, the bonds of political slavery. But the third step was a state of real and domestic servitude in the Mahmud, the Gaznevide, A. D. 997–1028.

17. The testimony of an Englishman, of Roger de Hoveden (p. 559), will highly weigh against the silence of German and Italian history (Muratori, Annali d'Italia, tom. x. p. 146). The priests and pilgrims, who returned from Rome, exalted, by every tale, the omnipotence of the holy father.

18. Ego enim in eorum Tentoribus in quere non debui. Caffari, Arabi, Genuenses, in Muratori, Script. Rerum Italianarum, tom. vi. p. 567, 568.

19. For the Saracens of Sicily and Nocera, see the Annals of Muratori (tom. x. p. 149), and A. D. 1223, 1217, G. annone (tom. ii. p. 385), and of the originals, in Muratori's Collection, Richard de St. German (tom. vi. p. 696), Matteo Spinelli de Gualazzo (tom. vi. p. 1064), Nichola de Janina (tom. x. p. 103), and Matteo Villani (tom. i. lib. i. p. 107). The first of these circumstances, that in reducing the Saracens of Nocera, Charles II. of Anjou employed repented artifice than violence.

20. Muratori quotes a passage from Arnold of Tuben (l. iv. c. 20), Repent thesaurus abundanter, et omnium lapidum pretiosorum et gemmarum gloriam, ita ut operaretur 100 somnium, gloriose ad terram curam redierat. Roger de Hoveden, who mentions the violation of the royal tombs and crosses, computes the spoil of Salerno at 200,000 ounces of gold (p. 716 c). On these occasions, I am almost tempted to exclaim with the learned maid in La Fontaine, "Je voudrais bien s'avoir ce qu'il mangent."

I am indebted for his character and history to D'Herbelot (Bibliothèque Orientale, Mahmud, p. 555, 573). M. de Guignes (Histoire des Huns, tom. iii. p. 175, 173, and our countryman Colonel Alexander Burnes (l. i. p. 25, 27). In the two first volumes of his History of Hindostan, he styles himself the translator of the Persian Ferdosta. But in his old text, it is not easy to distinguish the version and the original.

2. The details of the Samanids continued 12 years, A. D. 974–999, under ten princes. See the same seen and run, in the Tablet of M. de Guignes (Hist. des Huns, tom. i. p. 304–396). They were followed by the Gaznevids, A. D. 999–1155 (see tom. i. p. 229, 230). His division of nations often disturbs the series of time and place.

press his astonishment and curiosity; and the courteous monarch condescended to explain the motives of this singular behaviour. "I had reason to suspect that none except one of my sons could dare to perpetrate such an outrage; and I extinguished the lights, that my justice might be blind and inexorable. My prayer was a thanksgiving on the discovery of the offender; and so painful was my anxiety, that I had passed three days without food since the first moment of your complaint." II. The sultan of Gazna had declared war against the dynasty of the Bowides, the sovereigns of the western Persia; he was disarmed by an epistle of the sultana mother, and delayed his invasion till the manhood of her son.<sup>8</sup> "During the life of my husband," said the artful regent, "I was ever apprehensive of your ambition: he was a prince and a soldier worthy of your arms. He is now no more: his sceptre has passed to a woman and a child, and you dare not attack their infancy and weakness. How inglorious would be your conquest, how shameful your defeat! and yet the event of war is in the hand of the Almighty." Avarice was the only defect that tarnished the illustrious character of Mahmud; and never has that passion been more richly satiated. The Orientals exceed the measure of credibility in the account of millions of gold and silver, such as the avidity of man has never accumulated; in the magnitude of pearls, diamonds, and rubies, such as have never been produced by the workmanship of nature.<sup>9</sup> Yet the soil of Hindostan is impregnated with precious minerals: her trade, in every age, has attracted the gold and silver of the world; and her virgin spoils were rifled by the first of the Mahomedan conquerors. His behaviour, in the last days of his life, evinces the vanity of these possessions, so laboriously won, so dangerously held, and so inevitably lost. He surveyed the vast and various chambers of the treasury of Gazna; burst into tears; and again closed the doors, without bestowing any portion of the wealth which he could no longer hope to preserve. The following day he reviewed the state of his military force; one hundred thousand foot, fifty-five thousand horse, and thirteen hundred elephants of battle.<sup>10</sup> He again wept the instability of human greatness; and his grief was embittered by the hostile progress of the Turks, whom he had introduced into the heart of his Persian kingdom.

Mothers and the young of the Turks, or Turkians,
A.D. 1800-1028.

considerable branches extend on either side of the Caspian Sea: the western colony can muster forty thousand soldiers; the eastern, less obvious to the traveller, but more strong and populous, has increased to the number of one hundred thousand families. In the midst of civilised nations, they preserve the manners of the Scythian desert, remove their encampments with the change of seasons, and feed their cattle among the ruins of palaces and temples. Their flocks and herds are their only riches; their tents, either black or white, according to the colour of the banner, are covered with felt, and of a circular form; their winter apparel is a sheepskin; a robe of cloth or cotton their summer garment; the features of the men are harsh and ferocious; the countenance of their women is soft and pleasing. Their wandering life maintains the spirit and exercise of arms; they fight on horseback; and their courage is displayed in frequent contests with each other and with their neighbours. For the licence of pasture they pay a slight tribute to the sovereign of the land; but the domestic jurisdiction is in the hands of the chiefs and elders. The first emigration of the Eastern Turkmans, the most ancient of their race, may be ascribed to the tenth century of the Christian era.<sup>12</sup> In the decline of the caliphs, and the weakness of their lieutenants, the barrier of the Jaxartes was often violated: in each invasion, after the victory or retreat of their countrymen, some wandering tribe, embracing the Mahometan faith, obtained a free encampment in the spacious plains and pleasant climate of Transoxiana and Carizme. The Turkish slaves who aspired to the throne encouraged these emigrations, which recruited their armies, won their subjects and rivals, and protected the frontier against the wilder natives of Turkestan; and this policy was abused by Mahmud the Gaznevide beyond the example of former times. He was admonished of his error by a chief of the race of Seljuk, who dwelt in the territory of Bochara. The sultan had enquired what supply of men he could furnish for military service. "If you send," replied Ismael, "one of these arrows into our camp, fifty thousand of your servants will mount on horseback." "And if that number," continued Mahmud, "should not be sufficient?" "Send this second arrow to the horde of Balik, and you will find fifty thousand more." "But," said the Gaznevide, dissembling his anxiety, "if I should stand in need of the whole force of your kindred tribes?" "Despatch my bow," was the last reply of Ismael, "and as it is circulated around, the summons will be obeyed by two hundred thousand horse." The apprehension of such formidable fellowship induced Mahmud to transport the most of noble armor. For instance, a ruby of four hundred and fifty marks is bought for 100 or 110 pounds three ounces. The least of the treasure of the French was of seven marks. It varies de 100 or 110 marks, part of the value. It is true, that in the East all colored stones are valued according to the weight, and that I have seen some three larger and more precious than the best of the French, and of the price of 1000, 1200, 1500, 2000, 3000, 4000, 5000, 6000, 7000, 8000, 9000, 10000, 11000, 12000, 13000, 14000, 15000, 16000, 17000, 18000, 19000, 20000, 21000, 22000, 23000, 24000, 25000, 26000, 27000, 28000, 29000, 30000, 31000, 32000, 33000, 34000, 35000, 36000, 37000, 38000, 39000, 40000, 41000, 42000, 43000, 44000, 45000, 46000, 47000, 48000, 49000, 50000, 51000, 52000, 53000, 54000, 55000, 56000, 57000, 58000, 59000, 60000, 61000, 62000, 63000, 64000, 65000, 66000, 67000, 68000, 69000, 70000, 71000, 72000, 73000, 74000, 75000, 76000, 77000, 78000, 79000, 80000, 81000, 82000, 83000, 84000, 85000, 86000, 87000, 88000, 89000, 90000, 91000, 92000, 93000, 94000, 95000, 96000, 97000, 98000, 99000, 100000, 101000, 102000, 103000, 104000, 105000, 106000, 107000, 108000, 109000, 110000, 111000, 112000, 113000, 114000, 115000, 116000, 117000, 118000, 119000, 120000, 121000, 122000, 123000, 124000, 125000, 126000, 127000, 128000, 129000, 130000, 131000, 132000, 133000, 134000, 135000, 136000, 137000, 138000, 139000, 140000, 141000, 142000, 143000, 144000, 145000, 146000, 147000, 148000, 149000, 150000, 151000, 152000, 153000, 154000, 155000, 156000, 157000, 158000, 159000, 160000, 161000, 162000, 163000, 164000, 165000, 166000, 167000, 168000, 169000, 170000, 171000, 172000, 173000, 174000, 175000, 176000, 177000, 178000, 179000, 180000, 181000, 182000, 183000, 184000, 185000, 186000, 187000, 188000, 189000, 190000, 191000, 192000, 193000, 194000, 195000, 196000, 197000, 198000, 199000, 200000, 201000, 202000, 203000, 204000, 205000, 206000, 207000, 208000, 209000, 210000, 211000, 212000, 213000, 214000, 215000, 216000, 217000, 218000, 219000, 220000, 221000, 222000, 223000, 224000, 225000, 226000, 227000, 228000, 229000, 230000, 231000, 232000, 233000, 234000, 235000, 236000, 237000, 238000, 239000, 240000, 241000, 242000, 243000, 244000, 245000, 246000, 247000, 248000, 249000, 250000, 251000, 252000, 253000, 254000, 255000, 256000, 257000, 258000, 259000, 260000, 261000, 262000, 263000, 264000, 265000, 266000, 267000, 268000, 269000, 270000, 271000, 272000, 273000, 274000, 275000, 276000, 277000, 278000, 279000, 280000, 281000, 282000, 283000, 284000, 285000, 286000, 287000, 288000, 289000, 290000, 291000, 292000, 293000, 294000, 295000, 296000, 297000, 298000, 299000, 300000, 301000, 302000, 303000, 304000, 305000, 306000, 307000, 308000, 309000, 310000, 311000, 312000, 313000, 314000, 315000, 316000, 317000, 318000, 319000, 320000, 321000, 322000, 323000, 324000, 325000, 326000, 327000, 328000, 329000, 330000, 331000, 332000, 333000, 334000, 335000, 336000, 337000, 338000, 339000, 340000, 341000, 342000, 343000, 344000, 345000, 346000, 347000, 348000, 349000, 350000, 351000, 352000, 353000, 354000, 355000, 356000, 357000, 358000, 359000, 360000, 361000, 362000, 363000, 364000, 365000, 366000, 367000, 368000, 369000, 370000, 371000, 372000, 373000, 374000, 375000, 376000, 377000, 378000, 379000, 380000, 381000, 382000, 383000, 384000, 385000, 386000, 387000, 388000, 389000, 390000, 391000, 392000, 393000, 394000, 395000, 396000, 397000, 398000, 399000, 400000, 401000, 402000, 403000, 404000, 405000, 406000, 407000, 408000, 409000, 410000, 411000, 412000, 413000, 414000, 415000, 416000, 417000, 418000, 419000, 420000, 421000, 422000, 423000, 424000, 425000, 426000, 427000, 428000, 429000, 430000, 431000, 432000, 433000, 434000, 435000, 436000, 437000, 438000, 439000, 440000, 441000, 442000, 443000, 444000, 445000, 446000, 447000, 448000, 449000, 450000, 451000, 452000, 453000, 454000, 455000, 456000, 457000, 458000, 459000, 460000, 461000, 462000, 463000, 464000, 465000, 466000, 467000, 468000, 469000, 470000, 471000, 472000, 473000, 474000, 475000, 476000, 477000, 478000, 479000, 480000, 481000, 482000, 483000, 484000, 485000, 486000, 487000, 488000, 489000, 490000, 491000, 492000, 493000, 494000, 495000, 496000, 497000, 498000, 499000, 500000, 501000, 502000, 503000, 504000, 505000, 506000, 507000, 508000, 509000, 510000, 51100

S. D. Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 27. Yet these letters, and the zims, &c. are rarely the language of the heart, or the motives of noble action.

these Indian stories, the reader may correct a role on p. 76, or from the reader may correct these stories.

11 See a historical picture of the capital on the title page of Walt Whitman's Boston (1961), available at <http://www.boston.gov> per <http://www.boston.gov>, p. 77, 87, and a photograph of the corner of the building at 100 North Street.

12. The authors are indebted to the Turkish Ministry of Health for the financial support of this study. The authors also wish to thank Dr. M. A. K. for his valuable comments on the manuscript. The authors are also indebted to Dr. M. A. K. for his valuable comments on the manuscript.

obnoxious tribes into the heart of Chorasán, where they would be separated from their brethren by the river Oxus, and enclosed on all sides by the walls of obedient cities. But the face of the country was an object of temptation rather than terror; and the vigour of government was relaxed by the absence and death of the sultan of Gazna. The shepherds were converted into robbers; the bands of robbers were collected into an army of conquerors: as far as Ispahan and the Tigris, Persia was afflicted by their predatory inroads; and the Turkmans were not ashamed or afraid to measure their courage and numbers with the proudest sovereigns of Asia. Masoud, the son and successor of Mahmud, had too long neglected the advice of his wisest Omrahs. "Your enemies," they repeatedly urged, "were in their origin a swarm of ants; they are now little snakes; and, unless they be instantly crushed, they will acquire the venom and magnitude of serpents." After some alternatives of truce and hostility, after the repulse or partial success of his lieutenants, the sultan marched in person against the Turkmans, who attacked him on all sides with barbarous shouts and irregular onset. "Masoud," says the Persian historian,<sup>13</sup> "plunged singly to oppose the torrent of gleaming arms, exhibiting such acts of gigantic force and valour as never

They defeat the Gaznevites, and subdue Persia. A.D. 1058.

"a king had before displayed. A few of his friends, roused by his words and actions, and that innate honour which inspires the brave, seconded their lord so well, that whosoever he turned his fatal sword, the enemies were mowed down, or retreated before him. But now, when victory seemed to blow on his standard, misfortune was active behind it; for when he looked round, he beheld almost his whole army, excepting that body he commanded in person, devouring the paths of flight." The Gaznevite was abandoned by the cowardice or treachery of some generals of Turkish race; and this memorable day of Zendeen<sup>14</sup> founded in Persia the dynasty of the shepherd kings.<sup>15</sup>

The victorious Turkmans immediately proceeded to the election of a king; and if the probable tale of a Latin historian<sup>16</sup> deserves any credit, they determined by lot the choice of their new master. A number of arrows were successively inscribed with the name of a tribe, a family, and a candidate; they were drawn from the bundle by the hand of a child; and the important prize was obtained by Togrul Beg, the son of Michael, the son of Seljuk, whose surname was immortalised in the greatness of his posterity. The sultan Mahmud, who valued himself on his skill in national genealogy, professed his ignorance of the family of Seljuk; yet the father of that race appears to have been a chief of power and renown.<sup>17</sup> For a daring intrusion into the harem of his prince, Seljuk was banished from Turkestan: with a numerous tribe of his friends and vassals, he passed the Jaxartes, encamped in the neighbourhood of Samarcand, embraced the religion of Mahomet, and acquired the crown of martyrdom in a war against the infidels. His age, of an hundred and seven years, surpassed the life of his son, and Seljuk adopted the care of his two grandsons, Togrul and Jaafar; the eldest of whom, at the age of forty-five, was invested with the title of sultan, in the royal city of Nishapur.

The blind determination of chance was justified by the virtues of the successful candidate. It would be superfluous to praise the valour of a Turk; and the ambition of Togrul<sup>18</sup> was equal to his valour. By his arms the Gaznevites were expelled from the eastern kingdoms of Persia, and gradually driven to the banks of the Indus, in search of a softer and more wealthy conquest. In the West he annihilated the dynasty of the Bowides; and the sceptre of Irak passed from the Persian to the Turkish nation. The princes who had felt, or who feared, the Seljukian arrows, bowed their heads in the dust; by the conquest of Aderbijan, or Media, he approached the Roman confines; and the shepherd presumed to despatch an ambassador, or herald, to demand the tribute and obedience of the emperor of Constantinople.<sup>19</sup> In his own dominions, Togrul was the father of his soldiers and people; by a firm and equal administration, Persia was relieved from the evils of anarchy; and the same hands which had been imbrued in blood became the guardians of justice and the public peace. The more rustic, perhaps the wisest, portion of the Turkmans<sup>20</sup> continued to dwell in the tents of their ancestors; and, from the Oxus to the Euphrates, these military colonies were protected and propagated by their native princes. But the Turks of the court and city were refined by business and softened by pleasure: they imitated the dress, language, and manners, of Persia; and the royal palaces of Nishapur and Rei displayed the order and magnificence of a great monarchy. The most deserving of the Arabians and Persians were promoted to the

Reign and character of Togrul Beg. A.D. 1058-1063

<sup>13</sup> Dour, Hist. of Hindostan, vol. i. p. 81, 95, 98. I have copied this passage, to confirm in the Persian history, the account of Togrul Beg, by an independent testimony, the story of Ferdowsi has been improved by that of Ousein.

<sup>14</sup> The Zendeen of D'Hérédote (p. 1028) are the Bandak of Dow (vol. ii. p. 57), as printed; the Bandak of Ambeda (topograph. p. 51). But Ambeda is a small town of Chorasán, two days' journey from Masud, and removed through the East for the production and manufacture of cotton.

<sup>15</sup> The Byzantine historians (O. d'Acres, tom. i. p. 764, 767. Zonaras, tom. i. p. 275. Nicephorus Bryennius, &c.) have unforgotten, in the report of the truth of time and place, of names and persons, of times and events. The ignorance and errors of these Greeks (which I shall not stop to narrate) may mislead to some distrust of the story of Cyrus and Cyrus, as it is told by their most eloquent predecessors.

<sup>16</sup> W. Kiepert, Trav. i. c. 7. p. 635. The divination by arrows is ancient and firm in the East.

<sup>17</sup> D'Hérédote, p. 801. Yet after the fortune of his posterity, Seljuk became the thirty-fourth in lineal descent from the great Afrasiab, emperor of Touran (p. 800.). The Tartar pedigree of the house of Zingis is also adulated as to fiction and fable, and the history in Mirchond derives the Sakaekes from Anahitavah, the virgin mother (p. 801. c. 2.). It thence to the same is the Zende of Ambedak, the Bandak of Ambedak (p. 118.). We quote in their favour the most solid evidence of a Tartar prince, himself the descendant of Zingis, Alukishah, or Alpau, and Ghuz Khan.

<sup>18</sup> By a slight corruption, Togrul Beg is the Tangrol-pix of the Greeks. His reign and character are faithfully exhibited by D'Hérédote (R. d'Herodote Oriental, p. 1027, 1028) and De Guignes (Hist. des Huns, tom. i. p. 199-204).

<sup>19</sup> O. d'Acres, tom. i. p. 774, 775. Zonaras, tom. i. p. 277. With their usual knowledge of Orient it is difficult to describe the ambassador as a Turk, who, like the synecdoche of the patriarch, was the vicar and successor of the empire.

<sup>20</sup> From William of Tyre, I have borrowed this distinction of Turks and Turkmans, which at least is popular and convenient. The names are the same, and the addition of man is of the same import in the Persian and European idioms. Few critics will adopt the etymology of James de Vitry (Hist. Hierosol. i. c. 11. p. 161.) of Turcomanni, quam Turci et Comani, a mixed people.

who were themselves of the Turkish race;<sup>51</sup> and, above all, the mercenary and adventurous bands of French and Normans. Their lances were commanded by the valiant Uziel of Balioi, the kinsman or father of the Scottish kings,<sup>52</sup> and were allowed to excel in the exercise of arms, or, according to the Greek style, in the practice of the Pyrrhic dance.

On the report of this bold invasion, which threatened his hereditary dominions, Alp Arslan flew to the scene of action at the head of forty thousand horse.<sup>53</sup> His rapid and skilful evolutions distressed and dismayed the superior numbers of the Greeks; and in the defeat of Basilacius, one of their principal generals, he displayed the first example of his valour and clemency. The imprudence of the emperor had separated his forces after the reduction of Malazkerd. It was in vain that he attempted to recal the mercenary Franks: they refused to obey his summons; he disdained to await their return; the desertion of the Uzi filled his mind with anxiety and suspicion; and against the most salutary advice he rushed forwards to speedy and decisive action. Had he listened to the fair proposals of the sultan, Romanus might have secured a retreat, perhaps a peace; but in these overtures he supposed the fear or weakness of the enemy, and his answer was conceived in the tone of insult and defiance. "If the barbarian wishes for peace, let him evacuate the ground which he occupies for the encampment of the Romans, and surrender his city and palace of Rei as a pledge of his sincerity." Alp Arslan smiled at the vanity of the demand, but he wept the death of so many faithful Moslems; and, after a devout prayer, proclaimed a free permission to all who were desirous of retreating from the field. With his own hands he tied up his horse's tail, exchanged his bow and arrows for a mace and cincher, clothed himself in a white garment, perfumed his body with musk, and declared that if he were vanquished, that spot should be the place of his burial.<sup>54</sup> The sultan himself had affected to cast away his missile weapons; but his hopes of victory were placed in the arrows of the Turkish cavalry, whose squadrons were loosely distributed in the form of a crescent. Instead of the successive lines and reserves of the Grecian tactics, Romanus led his army in a single and solid phalanx, and pressed with vigour and impatience the artful and yielding resistance of the barbarians. In this desultory and fruitless combat he wasted the greater part of a summer's day, till prudence and fatigue compelled him to return to his camp. But a retreat is always perilous in the face of an active foe; and no sooner had the standard been turned to the rear than the phalanx was broken by the base cowardice, or the baser jealousy, of Andronicus, a rival prince, who disgraced his birth and the purple of the Cæsars.<sup>55</sup> The Turkish squadrons poured a cloud of arrows on this moment of confusion and lassitude; and the horns of their formidable crescent were closed in the rear of the Greeks. In the destruction of the army and pillage of the camp, it would be needless to mention the number of the slain or captives. The Byzantine writers deplore the loss of an inestimable pearl: they forget to mention that in this fatal day the Asiatic provinces of Rome were irretrievably sacrificed.

As long as a hope survived, Romanus attempted to rally and save the relics of his army. When the centre, the Imperial station, was left naked on all sides, and encompassed by the victorious Turks, he still, with desperate courage, maintained the fight till the close of day, at the head of the brave and faithful subjects who adhered to his standard. They fell around him; his horse was slain; the emperor was wounded; yet he stood alone and intrepid, till he was oppressed and bound by the strength of multitudes. The glory of this illustrious prize was disputed by a slave and a soldier; a slave who had seen him on the throne of Constantinople, and a soldier whose extreme deformity had been excused on the promise of some signal service. Despoiled of his arms, his jewels, and his purple, Romanus spent a dreary and perilous night on the field of battle, amidst a disorderly crowd of the meaner barbarians. In the morning the royal captive was presented to Alp Arslan, who doubted of his fortune, till the identity of the person was ascertained by the report of his ambassadors, and by the more pathetic evidence of Basilacius, who embraced with tears the feet of his unhappy sovereign. The successor of Constantine, in a plebeian habit, was led into the Turkish divan, and commanded to kiss the ground before the lord of Asia. He reluctantly obeyed; and Alp Arslan, starting from his throne, is said to have planted his foot on the neck of the Roman emperor.<sup>56</sup> But the fact is doubtful; and if, in this moment of insolence, the sultan complied with a national custom, the rest of his conduct has extorted the praise of his bigoted foes, and may afford a lesson to the most civilised ages. He instantly raised the royal captive from the ground; and thrice clasping his hand with tender sympathy, assured him, that his life and dignity should be inviolate in the hands of a prince who had learned to respect the majesty of his equals and the vicissitudes of <sup>51</sup> The Uzi of the Greeks (Straber, Memor. Byzant. tom. iv. p. 105, 106) are the Gog of the Orientals. Hist. de France, tom. vi. p. 12, tom. vii. p. 175, &c. They were the Franks and the Vikings of Armenia, Syria, and Choras, and the name seems to have been extended to the whole Turkoman race.

<sup>52</sup> Uzielus (the Ruschus of Zonaras) is distinguished by Jeffrey Malherbe (l. i. c. 5) among the Norman conquerors of Sicily, and with the surname of Balioi, and his own historians who tell how the Balioi came from Normandy to Durham, that Bernard, lord of the Tower, married an heiress of Scotland, &c. Duhaugue (Not. du Cæsar, Brevenius, l. ii. No. 4) has observed the name of Uziel of the president de Balioi, whose father had exchanged the sword for the gown.

<sup>53</sup> The number (p. 514, 514) assign, this probable number, which is reduced by Alupharasus to 15,000 (p. 227), and by Eutropius (p. 102) to 12,000 horse. But the same Eutropius gives 70,000 (p. 102).

to the emperor, of whom Alp Arslan says, can canan honurum (p. 105), to dispute to the Turks the possession of the empire. The rocks at Malazkerd are still called malazkerd.

<sup>54</sup> The Byzantine writers of the Turkish empire, in the presence of the sultan, he was bound to kiss the ground, and had retired to a distance, &c. Byzantine writers of the Turkish empire.

<sup>55</sup> He was the son of the Cæsar, he was the brother of the emperor Constantine (Duhaugue, l. ii. c. 5). Byzantine writers of the Turkish empire (Duhaugue, l. ii. c. 5). Yet he owes his enmity to Romanus, &c. (p. 105, 106). Byzantine writers of the Turkish empire (Duhaugue, l. ii. c. 5).

<sup>56</sup> This circumstance, which we read and doubt in Strabo and Constantine Malherbe, is more prudently omitted by Nicetas and Zonaras.

During the life of Alp Arslan, his eldest son had been acknowledged as the future sultan of the Turks. On his father's death, the inheritance was disputed by an uncle, a cousin, and a brother: they drew their cimeters, and assembled their followers; and the triple victory of Malek Shah established his own reputation and the right of primogeniture. In every age, and more especially in Asia, the thirst of power has inspired the same passions, and occasioned the same disorders; but, from the long series of civil war, it would not be easy to extract a sentiment more pure and magnanimous than is contained in a saying of the Turkish prince. On the eve of the battle, he performed his devotions at Thous, before the tomb of the Imam Riza. As the sultan rose from the ground, he asked his vizir Nizam, who had knelt beside him, what had been the object of his secret petition. "That your arms may be crowned with victory," was the prudent and, most probably, the sincere answer of the minister. "For my part," replied the generous Malek, "I implored the Lord of Hosts, that he would take from me my life and crown, if my brother be more worthy than myself to reign over the Moslems." The favourable judgment of Heaven was ratified by the caliph; and for the first time the sacred title of commander of the faithful was communicated to a barbarian. But this barbarian, by his personal merit, and the extent of his empire, was the greatest prince of his age. After the settlement of Persia and Syria, he marched at the head of innumerable armies to achieve the conquest of Turkistan, which had been undertaken by his father. In his passage of the Oxus, the footmen, who had been employed in transporting some troops, complained, that their payment was assigned on the revenues of Antioch. The sultan frowned at this preposterous choice; but he smiled at the artful flattery of his vizir. "It was not to postpone their reward, that I select those remote places, but to leave a memorial to posterity, that, under your reign, Antioch and the Oxus were subject to the same sovereign." But this description of his limits was unjust and parsimonious: beyond the Oxus, he reduced to his obedience the cities of Bactana, Gaznae, and Samarcand, and erected each rebellious slave, or independent savage, who dared to resist. Malek passed the Gihon or Jaxartes, the last boundary of Persian civilization: the borders of Turkistan yielded to his supremacy. His name was inscribed on the coins and in the prayers of Cashghar, a Tartar kingdom on the extreme borders of China. From the Chinese frontier, he stretched his menac'd jurisdiction or feudatory sway to the West and South, as far as the mountains of Georgia, the neighbourhood of Constantinople, the holy city of Jerusalem, and the spicy groves of Arabia Felix. Instead of regarding himself to the luxury of his harem, the shepherd king, both in peace and war, was in action and in the field. By the perpetual motion of the royal camp, each province was successively blessed with his presence; and he is said to have perambulated twelve times the wide extent of his dominions, which surpassed the Asiatic reign of Cyrus and the caliphs. Of these expeditious, the most pious and splendid was the pilgrimage of Mecca: the freedom and safety of the caravans were protected by his arms; the citizens and pilgrims were enriched by the profusion of his alms; and the desert was cheered by the places of relief and refreshment, which he instituted for the use of his brethren. Hunting was the pleasure, and even the passion, of the sultan, and his train consisted of forty-seven thousand horses; but after the mastery of a Turkish chase, for each piece of game, he bestowed a piece of gold on the poor, a slight atonement, at the expense of the people, for the cost and mischief of the amusement of kings. In the peaceful prosperity of his reign, the cities of Asia were adorned with palaces and hospitals, with moschs and colleges; few departed from his divan without reward, and none without justice. The language and literature of Persia revived under the house of Seljuk;<sup>41</sup> and if Malek emulated the liberality of a Turk less potent than himself,<sup>42</sup> his palace might resound with the songs of an hundred poets. The sultan bestowed a more serious and learned care on the reformation of the calendar, which was ordered by a general assembly of the astronomers of the East. By a law of the prophet, the Moslems are confined to the irregular course of the lunar months; in Persia, since the age of Zoroaster, the revolution of the sun has been known and celebrated as an annual festival;<sup>43</sup> but after the fall of the Magian empire, the intercalation had been neglected: the fractions of minutes and hours were multiplied into days; and the date of the spring was removed from the sign of Aries to that of Pisces. The reign of Malek was illustrated by the Golden Age; and all errors, either past or future, were corrected by a computation of time, which surpasses the Julian, and approaches the accuracy of the Grecian style.<sup>44</sup>

In a period which Europe was plunged in the deepest barbarism, the splendour of Asia may be ascribed to the vicinity rather than the knowledge of the Turkish conquerors. An ample share of their wisdom and virtue is due to a Persian vizir, who ruled the empire under the reigns of Alp Arslan and his son. Nor is one of the most illustrious ministers of the East, was honoured

41 The Persians, who, in the history of the reign of Malek Shah, p. 224, 225, are called the Seljuks, are the same as the Seljuks, who, in the history of the reign of Alp Arslan, p. 214, 215, are called the Seljuks. The Seljuks, who, in the history of the reign of Alp Arslan, p. 214, 215, are called the Seljuks, are the same as the Seljuks, who, in the history of the reign of Alp Arslan, p. 214, 215, are called the Seljuks.

42 The Seljuks, who, in the history of the reign of Alp Arslan, p. 214, 215, are called the Seljuks, are the same as the Seljuks, who, in the history of the reign of Alp Arslan, p. 214, 215, are called the Seljuks. The Seljuks, who, in the history of the reign of Alp Arslan, p. 214, 215, are called the Seljuks, are the same as the Seljuks, who, in the history of the reign of Alp Arslan, p. 214, 215, are called the Seljuks.

by the caliph as an oracle of religion and science; he was trusted by the sultan as the faithful viceregent of his power and justice. After an administration of thirty years, the fame of the vizir, his wealth, and even his services, were transformed into crimes. He was overthrown by the insidious arts of a woman and a rival; and his fall was hastened by a rash declaration, that his cap and ink-horn, the badges of his office, were connected by the divine decree with the throne and diadem of the sultan. At the age of ninety-three years, the venerable statesman was dismissed by his master, accused by his enemies, and murdered by a fanatic: the last words of Nizam attested his innocence, and the remainder of Malek's life was short and inglorious. From Ispahan, the scene of this disgraceful transaction, the sultan moved to Bagdad, with the design of transplanting the caliph, and of fixing his own residence in the capital of the Moslem world. The feeble successor of Mahomet obtained a respite of ten days; and before the expiration of the term, the barbarian was summoned by the angel of death. His ambassadors at Constantinople had asked in marriage a Roman princess; but the proposal was decently eluded; and the daughter of Alexius, who might herself have been the victim, expresses her abhorrence of this unnatural conjunction.<sup>45</sup> The daughter of the sultan was bestowed on the caliph Moctadi, with the imperious condition, that, renouncing the society of his wives and concubines, he should for ever confine himself to this honourable alliance.

The greatness and unity of the Turkish empire expired in the person of Malek Shah. His vacant throne was disputed by his brother and his four sons; and, after a series of civil wars, the treaty which reconciled the surviving candidates confirmed a lasting separation in the Persian dynasty, the eldest and principal branch of the house of Seljuk. The three younger dynasties were those of Kerman, of Spiri, and of Roum: the first of these commanded an extensive, though obscure,<sup>46</sup> dominion on the shores of the Indian Ocean;<sup>47</sup> the second expelled the Arabian princes of Aleppo and Damascus; and the third, our peculiar care, invaded the Roman provinces of Asia Minor. The generous policy of Malek contributed to their elevation: he allowed the princes of his blood, even those whom he had vanquished in the field, to seek new kingdoms worthy of their ambition; nor was he displeased that they should draw away the more ardent spirits, who might have disturbed the tranquillity of his reign. As the supreme head of his family and nation, the great sultan of Persia commanded the obedience and tribute of his royal brethren: the thrones of Kerman and Nice, of Aleppo and Damascus; the Atabeks, and emirs of Syria and Mesopotamia, erected their standards under the shadow of his sceptre;<sup>48</sup> and the hordes of Tuikmans overspread the plains of the Western Asia. After the death of Malek, the bands of union and subordination were relaxed and finally dissolved: the indulgence of the house of Seljuk invested their slaves with the inheritance of kingdoms; and, in the Oriental style, a crowd of princes arose from the dust of their feet.<sup>50</sup>

A prince of the royal line, Cutilmish, the son of Izrail, the son of Seljuk, had fallen in a battle against Alp Arslan; and the humane victor had dropt a tear over his grave. His five sons, strong in arms, ambitious of power, and eager for revenge, unsheathed their cimeters against the son of Alp Arslan. The two armies expected the signal, when the caliph, forgetful of the majesty which secluded him from vulgar eyes, interposed his venerable mediation. "Instead of shedding the blood of your brethren, your brethren both in descent and faith, unite your forces in an holy war against the Greeks, the enemies of God and his apostle." They listened to his voice; the sultan embraced his rebellious kinsmen; and the eldest, the valiant Soliman, accepted the royal standard, which gave him the free conquest and hereditary command of the provinces of the Roman empire, from Arzeroum to Constantinople, and the unknown regions of the West.<sup>51</sup> Accompanied by his four brothers, he passed the Euphrates; the Turkish camp was soon seated in the neighbourhood of Kutaieh in Phrygia; and his flying cavalry laid waste the country as far as the Hellespont and the Black Sea. Since the decline of the empire, the peninsula of Asia Minor had been exposed to the transient, though destructive, inroads of the Persians and Saracens; but the fruits of a lasting conquest were reserved for the Turkish sultan; and his arms were introduced by the Greeks, who aspired to reign on the ruins of their country. Since the captivity of Romanus, six years the feeble son of Eudocia had trembled under the weight of the Imperial crown, till the provinces of the East and West were lost in the same month by a double rebellion: of either chief Nicephorus was the common name; but the surnames of Bryennius and Botoniates distinguish the European and Asiatic candidates. Their reasons, or rather their promises, were weighed in the divan; and, after some hesitation, Soliman declared himself in favour of Botoniates, opened a free passage to his troops in their march from Antioch to Nice, and joined the banner of the crescent to that of the cross. After his ally had

45. See sneaks of this Persian prince as sereno and pacifice in Commena (A. D. 1092), and when she speaks of his accession, she confounds the sultan with the vizir (Alexius, l. vi. p. 177-178).

46. So obscure, that the industry of M. de Guignes could only copy (tom. i. p. 241) some part p. 269, &c.) the history, or ruler list, of the Selukids of Kerman, in Belochistan (Orientalis). They were extinguished before the end of the sixth century.

47. Taxemner, perhaps, the only traveller who has visited Kerman, describes the capital as a great ruinous place, twenty-five miles from Ispahan, and twenty-seven from Shiraz, in the midst of a fertile country (Voyages en Turquie et en Perse, p. 107, 110).

48. It appears from Anna Comnena, that the Turks of Asia Minor obeyed the signal and chains of the great sultan (Alexius, l. vi. p. 179), and that the two sons of Soliman were detained in his court (p. 180).

49. This expression is quoted by Petit de la Croix (Vie de Gengis kan, p. 161), from a source

50. On the conquest assistance from the naked list of the ascended the throne of Constantinople, the sultan was hospitably entertained in the suburb of Chrysopolis or Scutari; and a body of two thousand Turks was transported into Europe, to whose dexterity and courage the new emperor was indebted for the defeat and captivity of his rival, Bryennius. But the conquest of Europe was dearly purchased by the sacrifice of Asia: Constantinople was deprived of the obedience and revenue of the provinces beyond the Bosphorus and Hellespont; and the regular progress of the Turks, who fortified the passes of the rivers and mountains, left not a hope of their retreat or expulsion. Another candidate implored the aid of the sultan: Melissenus, in his purple robes and red buskins, attended the motions of the Turkish camp; and the desponding cities were tempted by the summons of a Roman prince, who immediately surrendered them into the hands of the barbarians. These acquisitions were confirmed by a treaty of peace with the emperor Alexius: his fear of Robert compelled him to seek the friendship of Soliman; and it was not till after the sultan's death that he extended as far as Nicomedia, about sixty miles from Constantinople, the eastern boundary of the Roman world. Trebizond alone, defended on either side by the sea and mountains, preserved at the extremity of the Euxine the ancient character of a Greek colony, and the future destiny of a Christian empire.

51. We must exert some hints from Schirraz in vol. 562, Nicephorus Bryennius (p. 88, 91, 92, &c. 103, 104), and Anna Comnena (Alexius, p. 91, 92, &c. 103, &c.).

Since the first conquests of the caliphs, the establishment of the Turks in Anatolia or Asia Minor was the most deplorable loss which the church and empire had sustained. By the propagation of the Moslem faith, Soliman deserved the name of Gazi, a holy champion; and his new kingdom, of the Romans, or of Roum, was added to the tables of Oriental geography. It is described as extending from the Euphrates to Constantinople, from the Black Sea to the confines of Syria; pregnant with mines of silver and iron, of alum and copper, fruitful in corn and wine, and productive of cattle and excellent horses.<sup>22</sup> The wealth of Lydia, the arts of the Greeks, the splendour of the Augustan age, existed only in books and ruins, which were equally obscure in the eyes of the Scythian conquerors. Yet, in the present decay, Anatolia still contains some wealthy and populous cities; and, under the Byzantine empire, they were far more flourishing in numbers, size, and opulence. By the choice of the sultan, Nice, the metropolis of Bithynia, was preferred for his palace and fortress: the seat of the Selinkian dynasty of Roum was planted one hundred miles from Constantinople; and the divinity of Christ was denied and derided in the same temple in which it had been pronounced by the first general synod of the Catholics. The unity of God, and the mission of Mahomet, were preached in the moschs; the Arabian learning was taught in the schools; the Cadhis judged according to the law of the Koran; the Turkish manners and language prevailed in the cities; and Turkman camps were scattered over the plains and mountains of Anatolia. On the hard conditions of tribute and servitude, the Greek Christians might enjoy the exercise of their religion; but their most holy churches were profaned; their priests and bishops were insulted;<sup>53</sup> they were compelled to suffer the triumph of the Pagans, and the apostasy of their brethren; many thousand children were marked by the knife of circumcision; and many thousand captives were devoted to the service or the pleasures of their masters.<sup>54</sup> After the loss of Asia, Antioch still maintained her primitive allegiance to Christ and Cæsar; but the solitary province was separated from all Roman aid, and surrounded on all sides by the Mahometan powers. The despair of Philaretus the governor prepared the sacrifice of his religion and loyalty, had not his guilt been prevented by his son, who hastened to the Nicene palace, and offered to deliver this valuable prize into the hands of Soliman. The ambitious sultan mounted on horseback, and in twelve nights (for he reposed in the day) performed a march of six hundred miles. Antioch was oppressed by the speed and secrecy of his enterprise; and the dependent cities, as far as Laodicea and the confines of Aleppo, obeyed the example of the metropolis. From Laodicea to the Thracian Paphlagon, or arm of St. George, the conquests and reign of Soliman extended thirty days' journey in length, and in breadth about ten or fifteen, between the rocks of Lycia and the Black Sea.<sup>56</sup> The Turkish ignorance of navigation protected, for a while, the inglorious safety of the emperor; but no sooner had a fleet of two hundred ships been constructed by the hands of the captive Greeks, than Alexius trembled behind the walls of his capital. His plaintive epistles were dispersed over Europe, to excite the compassion of the Latins, and to paint the danger, the weakness, and the riches of the city of Constantine.<sup>57</sup>

But the most interesting conquest of the Seljukian Turks was that of Jerusalem,<sup>58</sup> which soon became the theatre of nations. In their capitulation with Omar, the inhabitants had stipulated 52 Such is the description of Roum by Hæton the Armenian, whose 7th century history may be found in the collections of Karaman and Hæton (see Stavridis, Geographia, ed. J. V. Gouras, 1911, p. 100).

[illegible]

11 The emperor, or abbot, desire the same of a Turkish camp as it they had been present. Mares de regere is a corruption with a multiplex repetition diversorum eorum in textu, etc. is it the true reading? cum eadem assensum carum praecent. nulla de coe-gentur. Mox eadem passio ad nias, &c.

<sup>66</sup> W. Mon. of Tyre (1889), I, p. 175, gives the most authentic and detailed account of these Turkish accounts.

[illegible]

the assurance of their religion and property; but the articles were interpreted by a master, against whom it was dangerous to dispute; and in the four hundred years of the reign of the caliphs, the political climate of Jerusalem was exposed to the vicissitudes of storms and sunshine.<sup>59</sup> By the increase of proselytes and population, the Mahometans might excuse their usurpation of three fourths of the city: but a peculiar quarter was reserved for the patriarch with his clergy and people; a tribute of two pieces of gold was the price of protection; and the sepulchre of Christ, with the church of the Resurrection, was still left in the hands of his votaries. Of these votaries, the most numerous and respectable portion were strangers to Jerusalem: the pilgrimages to the Holy Land had been stimulated, rather than suppressed, by the conquest of the Arabs; and the enthusiasm which had always prompted these perilous journeys, was nourished by the congenial passions of grief and indignation. A crowd of pilgrims from the East and West continued to visit the holy sepulchre, and the adjacent sanctuaries, more especially at the festival of Easter: and the Greeks and Latins, the Nestorians and Jacobites, the Copts and Abyssinians, the Armenians and Georgians, maintained the chapels, the clergy, and the poor of their respective communions. The harmony of prayer in so many various tongues, the worship of so many nations in the common temple of their religion, might have afforded a spectacle of edification and peace; but the zeal of the Christian sects was embittered by hatred and revenge; and in the kingdom of a suffering Messiah, who had pardoned his enemies, they aspired to command and persecute their spiritual brethren. The pre-eminence was asserted by the spirit and numbers of the Franks; and the greatness of Charlemagne<sup>60</sup> protected both the Latin pilgrims, and the Catholics of the East. The poverty of Carthage, Alexandria, and Jerusalem, was relieved by the gifts of that pious emperor; and many monasteries of Palestine were founded or restored by his liberal devotion. Harun al Rashid, the greatest of the Abbassides, extended to his Christian brother a similar supremacy of genius and power: their friendship was cemented by a frequent intercourse of gifts and caresses; and the caliph, without resting the smallest claim, presented the emperor with the keys of the holy sepulchre, and perhaps of the city of Jerusalem. In the decline of the Caliphate, a monarchy, the republic of Amalphi promoted the interest of trade and religion in the East. Her vessels transported the Latin pilgrims to the coasts of Egypt and Palestine, and deserved, by their useful imports, the favour and alliance of the Fatimite caliphs: <sup>61</sup> an annual fair was instituted on Mount Calvary; and the Italian merchants founded the convent and hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, the cradle of the monastic and military order, which has since reigned in the isles of Rhodes and of Malta. Had the Christian pilgrims been content to revere the tomb of a prophet, the disciples of Mahomet, instead of blaming, would have imitated, their piety: but these rigid Unitarians were scandalized by a worship which represents the birth, death, and resurrection, of a God; the Catholic images were branded with the name of idols; and the Moslems smiled with indignation<sup>62</sup> at the miraculous flame, which was kindled on the eve of Easter in the holy sepulchre.<sup>63</sup> This pious fraud, first devised in the ninth century,<sup>64</sup> was devoutly cherished by the Latin crusaders, and is annually repeated by the clergy of the Greek, Armenian, and Coptic sects,<sup>65</sup> who impose on the credulous spectators<sup>66</sup> for their own benefit, and that of their tyrants. In every age, a principle of toleration has been fortified by a sense of interest; and the revenue of the prince and his emir was increased each year, by the expense and tribute of so many thousand strangers.

The revolution which transferred the sceptre from the Abbassides to the Fatimites was a benefit, rather than an injury, to the Holy Land. A sovereign resident in Egypt was more sensible of the importance of Christian trade; and the emirs of Palestine were less remote from the justice and power of the throne. But the third of these Fatimite caliphs was the famous Hakem,<sup>67</sup> a frantic youth, who was delivered by his impiety and despotism from the fear either of God or man; and whose reign was a wild mixture of vice and folly. Regardless of the most ancient customs of Egypt, he imposed on the women an absolute continence; the men excited the clamours of their wives; their clamours provoked his fury; a pet of voluptuaries was delivered to the flames; and his godless and citizens were engaged many days in a bloody combat. At first the caliph declared himself a Mahomedan, the founder of the sect of the Mahomedan colleges, twelve hundred and ninety copies of the Koran were translated at his expense in letters of gold; and his edict expanded the vineyards of the Upper Egypt. But his vanity was soon flattered by the

Under the Fatimite caliphs.
A.D. 969-1076.

<sup>59</sup> See the history of the Caliphate, in the preceding modelation, p. 114.

<sup>60</sup> See the history of the Caliphate, in the preceding modelation, p. 114.

<sup>61</sup> See the history of the Caliphate, in the preceding modelation, p. 114.

<sup>62</sup> See the history of the Caliphate, in the preceding modelation, p. 114.

<sup>63</sup> See the history of the Caliphate, in the preceding modelation, p. 114.

<sup>64</sup> See the history of the Caliphate, in the preceding modelation, p. 114.

<sup>65</sup> See the history of the Caliphate, in the preceding modelation, p. 114.

<sup>66</sup> See the history of the Caliphate, in the preceding modelation, p. 114.

<sup>67</sup> See the history of the Caliphate, in the preceding modelation, p. 114.

doned to the emir Ortok, the chief of a tribe of Turkinians, whose children, after their expulsion from Palestine, formed two dynasties on the borders of Armenia and Assyria.<sup>75</sup> The Oriental Christians and the Latin pilgrims deplored a revolution, which, instead of the regular government and old alliance of the caliphs, imposed on their necks the iron yoke of the strangers of the North.<sup>76</sup> In his court and camp the great sultan had adopted in some degree the arts and manners of Persia; but the body of the Turkish nation, and more especially the pastoral tribes, still breathed the fierceness of the desert. From Nice to Jerusalem, the western countries of Asia were a scene of foreign and domestic hostility; and the shepherds of Palestine, who held a precarious sway on a doubtful frontier, had neither leisure nor capacity to await the slow profits of commercial and religious freedom. The pilgrims, who, through innumerable perils, had reached the gates of Jerusalem, were the victims of private rapine or public oppression, and often sunk under the pressure of famine and disease, before they were permitted to salute the holy sepulchre. A spirit of native barbarism, or recent zeal, prompted the Turkinians to insult the clergy of every sect: the patriarch was dragged by the hair along the pavement, and cast into a dungeon, to extort a ransom from the sympathy of his flock; and the divine worship in the church of the Resurrection was often disturbed by the savage rudeness of its masters. The pathetic tale excited the millions of the West to march under the standard of the cross to the relief of the Holy Land: and yet how trifling is the sum of these accumulated evils, if compared with the single act of the sacrilege of Hakem, which had been so patiently endured by the Latin Christians! A slighter provocation inflamed the more irascible temper of their descendants: a new spirit had arisen of religious chivalry and papal dominion; a nerve was touched of exquisite feeling; and the sensation vibrated to the heart of Europe.

CHAP. LVIII.

Origin and Numbers of the First Crusade. — Characters of the Latin Princes. — Their March to Constantinople. — Policy of the Greek Emperor Alexius. — Conquest of Nice, Antioch, and Jerusalem, by the Franks. — Deliverance of the Holy Sepulchre. — Goliath of Boudon, First King of Jerusalem. — Institutions of the French or Latin Kingdom.

THE crusade ABOUT twenty years after the conquest of Jerusalem by the Turks, the holy sepulchre was visited by an hermit of the name of Peter, a native of Amiens, in the province of Picardy<sup>1</sup> in France. His resentment and sympathy were excited by his own injuries and the oppression of the Christian name; he mingled his tears with those of the patriarch, and earnestly enquired, if no hopes of relief could be entertained from the Greek emperors of the East. The patriarch exposed the vices and weakness of the successors of Constantine. "I will rouse," exclaimed the hermit, "the martial nations of Europe in your cause;" and Europe was obedient to the call of the hermit. The astonished patriarch dismissed him with epistles of credit and complaint; and no sooner did he land at Bari, than Peter hastened to kiss the feet of the Roman pontiff. His stature was small, his appearance contemptible; but his eye was keen and lively; and he possessed that vehemence of speech, which seldom fails to impart the persuasion of the soul.<sup>2</sup> He was born of a gentleman's family (for we must now adopt a modern idiom), and his military service was under the neighbouring counts of Boulogne, the heroes of the first crusade. But he soon relinquished the sword and the world; and if it be true, that his wife, however noble, was aged and ugly, he might withdraw, with the less reluctance, from her bed to a convent, and at length to an hermitage. In this austere solitude, his body was emaciated, his fancy was inflamed; whatever he wished, he believed; whatever he believed, he saw in dreams and revelations. From Jerusalem the pilgrim returned an accomplished fanatic; but as he excelled in the popular madness of the times, pope Urban the Second received him as a prophet, applauded his glorious design, promised to support it in a general council, and encouraged him to proclaim the deliverance of the Holy Land. Invigorated by the approbation of the pontiff, his zealous missionary traversed, with speed and success, the provinces of Italy and France. His diet was abstemious, his prayers long and fervent, and the alms which he received with one hand, he distributed with the other: his head was bare, his feet naked, his meagre body was wrapped in a coarse garment; he bore and displayed a weighty crucifix; and the ass on which he rode was sanctified in the public eye, by the service of the man of God. He preached to innumerable crowds in the churches, the streets, and the highways; the hermit entered with equal confidence the palace and the cottage; and the people, for all was people, was impetuously moved by his call to repentance and arms. When he painted the sufferings of the natives and pilgrims of Palestine, every heart was melted to compassion; every breast glowed with indignation, when he challenged the warriors of the age to defend their brethren, and rescue their Saviour: his ignorance of art and language was compensated by sighs, and tears, and ejaculations; and Peter supplied the deficiency of reason by loud and frequent appeals to Christ and his Mother, to the saints and angels of paradise, with whom he had personally conversed.

<sup>75</sup> De Guignes, Hist. des Huns, tom. i. p. 219. 272.
<sup>76</sup> Wotien, Tyr. l. i. c. 8. p. 651. who strives hard to magnify the Christian grievances. The Turks exacted no more from each pilgrim. The offer of the Franks is now fourteen dollars and Europe does not complain of this voluntary tax.
<sup>1</sup> Whomsoever enough is the origin of the name of Picardy, and from hence of Picardie, which does not date earlier than A. D. 1260. It was an academical joke, an epithet first applied to the quarrelsome

legal assemblies, and whose disregard of their sovereign was revenged by the disobedience of their inferior vassals. At Clermont, in the territories of the count of Auvergne,<sup>13</sup> the pope might brave with impunity the resentment of Philip; and the council which he convened in that city was not less numerous or respectable than the synod of Placentia.<sup>14</sup> Besides his court and council of Roman cardinals, he was supported by thirteen archbishops, and two hundred and twenty-five bishops; the number of mitred prelates was computed at four hundred; and the fathers of the church were blessed by the saints, and enlightened by the doctors of the age. From the adjacent kingdoms, a martial train of lords and knights of power and renown attended the council,<sup>15</sup> in high expectation of its resolves; and such was the ardour of zeal and curiosity, that the city was filled, and many thousands, in the month of November, erected their tents or huts in the open field. A session of eight days produced some useful or edifying canons for the reformation of manners; a severe censure was pronounced against the licence of private war; the will of God<sup>16</sup> was confirmed, a suspension of hostilities during four days of the week; women and priests were placed under the safeguard of the church; and a protection of three years was extended to husbandmen and merchants, the defenceless victims of military rapine. But a law, however venerable be the sanction, cannot suddenly transform the temper of the times; and the benevolent efforts of Urban deserve the less praise, since he laboured to appease some domestic quarrels, that he might spread the flames of war from the Atlantic to the Euphrates. From the synod of Placentia, the rumour of his great design had gone forth among the nations: the clergy on their return had preached in every diocese the merit and glory of the deliverance of the Holy Land; and when the pope ascended a lofty scaffold in the market-place of Clermont, his eloquence was addressed to a well-prepared and impatient audience. His topics were obvious, his exhortation was vehement, his address meretricious. The orator was interrupted by the shout of those and, who, with one voice, and in their native idiom, exclaimed aloud, "God will it, God will it."<sup>17</sup> "It is indeed the will of God," replied the pope; "and let this memorable word, the in"spiration surely of the Holy Spirit, be for "ever adopted as your cry of battle, to animate

"the devotion and courage of the champions of "Christ. His cross is the symbol of your sal"vation; wear it, a red, a bloody cross, as an "external mark, on your breasts or shoulders,
"as a pledge of your sacred and irrevocable en"gagement." The proposal was joyfully ac"cepted; great numbers, both of the clergy and "laity, impressed on their garments the sign of "the cross,<sup>18</sup> and solicited the pope to march at "their head. This dangerous honour was de"clined by the more prudent successor of Gregory,
"who alleged the schism of the church, and the "duties of his pastoral office, recommending to
"the faithful, who were disqualified by sex or "profession, by age or infirmity, to aid, with their "prayers and alms, the personal service of their "robust brethren. The name and powers of his "legate he devolved on Adhemar bishop of Puy,
"the first who had received the cross at his hands.
The foremost of the temporal chiefs was Raymond count of Thoulouse, whose ambassadors in the council excused the absence, and pledged the honour of their master. After the confession and absolution of their sins, the champions of the cross were dismissed with a superfluous admonition to invite their countrymen and friends; and their departure for the Holy Land was fixed to the festival of the Assumption, the fifteenth of August, of the ensuing year.<sup>19</sup>

So familiar, and as it were so natu- Justice of ral to man, is the practice of violence, the crusades, that our indulgence allows the slightest provocation, the most disputable right, as a sufficient ground of national hostility. But the name and nature of an holy war demands a more rigorous scrutiny; nor can we hastily believe, that the servants of the Prince of Peace would unheath the sword of destruction, unless the motive were pure, the quarrel legitimate, and the necessity inevitable. The policy of an action may be determined from the tardy lessons of experience; but, before we act, our conscience should be satisfied of the justice and propriety of our enterprise. In the age of the crusades, the Christians, both of the East and West, were persuaded of their lawfulness and merit; their arguments are clothed by the perpetual abuse of Scripture and rhetoric; but they seem to insist on the right of natural and religious defence, their pe-

the same, and to the same effect. See B. l. v. c. 1. No. 11. p. 10. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history.

13. See the account of the council of Clermont, in the same work, B. l. v. c. 1. No. 11. p. 10. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history.

14. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history.

15. Most commonly on their shoulders, in a girdle of silk, or cloth, ceder title to the Holy Land, and the impurity in their Pagan and Mahometan fides. I. The right of a just defence may fairly include our civil and spiritual allies: it depends on the existence of danger: and that danger must be estimated by the twofold consideration of the malice, and the power, of our enemies. A perfidious tenet has been imputed to the Mahometans, the duty of exterminating all other religions by the sword. This charge of ignorance and bigotry is refuted by the Koran, by the history of the Musliman conquerors, and by their public and legal toleration of the Christian worship. But it cannot be denied, that the Oriental churches are depressed under their iron yoke; that, in peace and war, they assert a divine and indefeasible claim of universal empire; and that, in their orthodox creed, the unbelieving nations are continually threatened with the loss of religion or liberty. In the eleventh century, the victorious arms of the Turks presented a real and urgent apprehension of these losses. They had subdued, in less than thirty years, the kingdoms of Asia, as far as Jerusalem and the Hellespont; and the Greek empire tottered on the verge of destruction. Besides an honest sympathy for their brethren, the Latins had a right and interest in the support of Constantinople, the most important barrier of the West; and the privilege of defence must reach to prevent, as well as to repel, an impending assault. But this salutary purpose might have been accomplished by a moderate succour; and our calmer reason must disclaim the innumerable hosts and remote operations, which overwhelmed Asia and depopulated Europe. II. But we could add nothing to the strength or safety of the Latins; and fanaticism could pretend to justify the conquest of that distant and narrow province. The Christians affirmed that their inalienable title to the promised land had been sealed by the blood of their divine Saviour: it was their right and duty to rescue their inheritance from the unjust possessors, who profaned his sepulchre, and oppressed the pilgrimage of his disciples. Vainly would it be alleged that the pre-eminence of Jerusalem, and the sanctity of Palestine, have been abolished with the Mosaic law; that the God of the Christians is not a local deity, and that the recovery of Bethlem or Calvary, his cradle or his tomb, will not atone for the violation of the moral precepts of the Gospel. Such arguments glance aside from the laden shield of superstition; and the religious mind will not easily relinquish its hold on the sacred ground of mystery and miracle. III. But the holy wars which have been waged in every climate of the globe, from Egypt to Livonia, and from Peru to Hindostan, require the support of a more general and flexible tenet. It has been often supposed, and sometimes affirmed, that a difference of religion is a worthy cause of hostility; that obstinate unbelievers may be slain or subdued by the champions of the cross; and that grace is the sole fountain of dominion as well as of mercy. Above four hundred years before the first crusade, the eastern and western provinces of the Roman empire had been acquired about the same time, and in the same manner, by the labours of Germany and Ardia. Time and treaties had legitimated the conquest of the Christian Franks; but in the eyes of their subjects and neighbours, the Mahometan princes were still tyrants and usurpers, who, by the arms of war or rebellion, might be lawfully driven from their unlawful possessions.<sup>21</sup>

16. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history.

17. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history.

18. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history. The same is also the case in the other parts of the history.

As the manners of the Christians were relaxed, their discipline of penance <sup>So great in cases, and in the gestures,</sup> was enforced; and with the multiplication of sins, the remedies were multiplied. In the primitive church, a voluntary and open confession prepared the work of atonement. In the middle ages, the bishops and priests interrogated the criminal; compelled him to account for his thoughts, words, and actions; and prescribed the terms of his reconciliation with God. But as this discretionary power might alternately be abused by indulgence and tyranny, a rule of discipline was framed, to inform and regulate the spiritual judges. This mode of legislation was invented by the Greeks; their penitentials <sup>penitentials</sup> were translated, or imitated, in the Latin church; and, in the time of Charlemagne, the clergy of every diocese were provided with a code, which they prudently concealed from the knowledge of the vulgar. In this dangerous estate of crimes and punishments, each case was supposed, each difference was remarked, by the experience or perception of the monks; some sins are enumerated which innocence could not have suspected, and others which reason cannot believe; and the more ordinary offences of fornication and adultery, of perjury and sacrilege, of rapine and murder, were expiated by a penance, which, according to the various circumstances, was prolonged from forty days to seven years. During this term of mortification, the patient was healed, the criminal was absolved by a salutary regimen of fasts and prayers: the disorder of his dress was expressive of grief and remorse; and he humbly abstained from all the business and pleasure of social life. But the rigid execution of these laws would have depopulated the palace, the camp, and the city; the barbarians of the West believed and trembled; but nature often rebelled against principle; and the magistrate laboured without effect to enforce the jurisdiction of the priest. A literal accomplishment of penance was indeed impracticable; the guilt of adultery was multiplied by daily repetition; that of homicide might involve the massacre of a whole people; each act was one has  $p = 70.9 - 70.83 = 0.07$  MeV, as the energy difference between the two states. The energy difference is  $0.07 \times 1.6 \times 10^{-13} = 1.12 \times 10^{-14}$  J. Hence, the difference in energy between the two states is  $1.12 \times 10^{-14}$  J, exactly the same as the energy of the photon. It was a little surprising to see that separately numbered; and, in those times of anarchy and vice, a modest sinner might easily incur a debt of three hundred years. His insolvency was relieved by a commutation, or indulgence: a year of penance was appreciated at twenty-six solidi<sup>24</sup> of silver, about four pounds sterling, for the rich: at three solidi, or nine shillings, for the indigent: and these alms were soon appropriated to the use of the church, which derived, from the redemption of sins, an inexhaustible source of opulence and dominion. A debt of three hundred years, or twelve hundred pounds, was enough to impoverish a plentiful fortune; the scarcity of gold and silver was supplied by the alienation of land; and the princely donations of Pepin and Charlemagne are expressly given for the remedy of their soul. It is a maxim of the civil law, that whosoever cannot pay with his purse, must pay with his body; and the practice of flagellation was adopted by the monks, a cheap, though painful, equivalent. By a fantastic arithmetic, a year of penance was taxed at three thousand lashes;<sup>25</sup> and such was the skill and patience of a famous hermit, St. Dominic of the Iron Cuirass,<sup>26</sup> that in six days he could discharge an entire century, by a whipping of three hundred thousand stripes. His example was followed by many penitents of both sexes; and, as a vicarious sacrifice was accepted, a sturdy disciplinarian might expiate on his own back the sins of his benefactors.<sup>27</sup> These compensations of the purse and the person introduced, in the eleventh century, a more honourable mode of satisfaction. The merit of military service against the Saracens of Africa and Spain had been allowed by the predecessors of Urban the Second. In the council of Clermont, that pope proclaimed a plenary indulgence to those who should enlist under the banner of the cross; the absolution of all their sins, and a full receipt for all that might be due of canonical penance.<sup>28</sup> The cold philosophy of modern times is incapable of feeling the impression that was made on a sinful and fanatic world. At the voice of their pastor, the robber, the incendiary, the homicide, arose by thousands to redeem their souls, by repeating on the infidels the same deeds which they had exercised against their Christian brethren; and the terms of atonement were eagerly embraced by offenders of every rank and denomination. None were pure; none were exempt from the guilt and penalty of sin; and those who were the least amenable to the justice of God and the church, were the best entitled to the temporal and eternal recompence of their pious courage. If they fill, the spirit of the Latin clergy did not hesitate to adorn their tomb with the crown of martyrdom;<sup>29</sup> and should they survive, they could expect without impatience the delay and increase of their heavenly reward. They offered their blood to the Son of God, who had laid down his life for their salvation: they took up the cross, and entered with confidence into the way of the Lord. His providence would watch over their safety; perhaps his visible and miraculous power would smooth the difficulties of their holy enterprise. The cloud and pillar of Jehovah had marched before the Israelites into the promised land. Might not the Christians more reasonably hope that the rivers would open for their passage; that the walls of the strongest cities would fall at the sound of their trumpets; and that the sun would be arrested in his mid-career, to allow them time for the destruction of the infidels?

20) If the reader wants to go to the first volume of the first part of It's, the Fourth, he will see in the text of Shikpele the matter which is full of enthusiasm and in the pages of Luchinskaia, the wariness of the legend, though it is more, more gradually on every page to hate and to hate those who are from the end.

22 The passage, too, leaves, &c. of the middle ages are amply discussed by Maitland (antiquaries). Engl. Media Ages, etc.

[illegible]

Of the chiefs and soldiers who <sup>Temporal and carnal motives.</sup> marched to the holy sepulchre, I will dare to affirm, that all were prompted by the spirit of enthusiasm; the belief of merit, the hope of reward, and the assurance of divine aid. But I am equally persuaded, that in many it was not the sole, that in some it was not the leading, principle of action. The use and abuse of religion are feeble to stem, they are strong and irresistible to impel, the stream of national manners. Against the private wars of the barbarians, their bloody tournaments, licentious loves, and judicial duels, the popes and synods might ineffectually thunder. It is a more easy task to provoke the metaphysical disputes of the Greeks, to drive into the cloister the victims of anarchy or despotism, to sanctify the patience of slaves and cowards, or to assume the merit of the humanity and benevolence of modern Christians. War and exercise were the reigning passions of the Franks or Latins; they were enjoined, as a penance, to gratify those passions, to visit distant lands, and to draw their swords against the nations of the East. Their victory, or even their attempt, would immortalise the names of the intrepid heroes of the cross; and the purest piety could not be insensible to the most splendid prospect of military glory. In the petty quarrels of Europe, they shed the blood of their friends and countrymen, for the acquisition perhaps of a castle or a village. They could march with alacrity against the distant and hostile nations who were devoted to their arms; their fancy already grasped the golden sceptres of Asia; and the conquest of Apulia and Sicily by the Normans might exalt to royalty the hopes of the most private adventurer. Christendom, in her rudest state, must have yielded to the climate and cultivation of the Mahometan countries; and their natural and artificial wealth had been magnified by the tales of pilgrims, and the gifts of an imperfect commerce. The vulgar, both the great and small, were taught to believe every wonder, of lands flowing with milk and honey, of mines and treasures, of gold and diamonds, <sup>24</sup> Till the sixth century, we may suppose the clear account of ten denarii, or pence, to the solidus, or shilling; and xx solidi to the pound weight of silver, about ten pound sterling. Our money is diminished to a third, and the French to a fifth, of this primitive standard.

<sup>25</sup> Each century of lashes was sanctified with the recital of a psalm; and the whole latter, with the accomplishment of 15400 stripes, was equivalent to five years.

<sup>26</sup> The Life and Achievements of St. Dominic Loricatus was composed by his friend and admirer, Peter Damiani. See Florus, Hist. Eccles. tom. viii. p. 365-369. Bignon, A. D. 1054. See F., who derives from Parianus, how it is to be, even among laches, of quality (sublimis generis), this expiation (pari, non generis) was given.

<sup>27</sup> At a quarter, or even half a rial a lash, Sancho Panza was a cheeper, and possibly not a more dishonest, workman. I remember in 1781 to have seen a man who had been whipped 16-20 a very lively picture of

<sup>28</sup> Omni horis vel pœnæ ademptis, si enim penitentia repente. Canon, Council of Clermont, c. p. 526. Indulgent styles it novum salutis genus (p. 413), and is almost the only one of the subject.

<sup>29</sup> Such at least was the belief of the crusaders, and such is the uniform style of the historians. E-spirit the Crusades, tom. i. p. 47. But the prayer for the repose of their souls is inconsistent in orthodox dialogue, with the merits of martyrdom.

of palaces of marble and jasper, and of odiferous groves of cinnamon and frankincense. In this earthly paradise, each warrior depended on his sword to carve a plenteous and honourable establishment, which he measured only by the extent of his wishes.<sup>30</sup> Their vassals and soldiers trusted their fortunes to God and their master: the spoils of a Turkish emir might enrich the meanest follower of the camp; and the flavour of the wines, the beauty of the Grecian women,<sup>31</sup> were temptations more adapted to the nature, than to the profession, of the champions of the cross. The love of freedom was a powerful incitement to the multitudes who were oppressed by feudal or ecclesiastical tyranny. Under this holy sign, the peasants and burghers, who were attached to the servitude of the glebe, might escape from an haughty lord, and transplant themselves and their families to a land of liberty. The monk might release himself from the discipline of his convent; the debtor might suspend the accumulation of usury, and the pursuit of his creditors; and outlaws and malefactors of every cast might continue to brave the laws and elude the punishment of their crimes.<sup>32</sup>

Influence of example.

These motives were potent and numerous: when we have singly computed their weight on the mind of each individual, we must add the infinite series, the multiplying powers of example and fashion. The first proselytes became the warmest and most effectual missionaries of the cross; among their friends and countrymen they preached the duty, the merit, and the recompence, of their holy vow; and the most reluctant hearers were insensibly drawn within the whirlpool of persuasion and authority. The martial youths were fired by the reproach or suspicion of cowardice; the opportunity of visiting with an army the sepulchre of Christ, was embraced by the old and infirm, by women and children, who consulted rather their zeal than their strength; and those who in the evening had derided the folly of their companions, were the most eager, the ensuing day, to tread in their foot-steps. The ignorance, which magnified the hopes, diminished the perils, of the enterprise. Since the Turkish conquest, the paths of pilgrimage were obliterated; the chiefs themselves had an imperfect notion of the length of the way and the state of their enemies; and such was the stupidity of the people, that, at the sight of the first city or castle beyond the limits of their knowledge, they were ready to ask whether that was not the Jerusalem, the term and object of their labours. Yet the more prudent of the crusaders, who were not sure that they should be fed from heaven with a shower of quails or manna, provided themselves with those precious metals, which, in every country, are the representatives of every commodity. To defray, according to their rank, the expenses of the road, princes alienated their provinces, nobles their lands and castles, peasants their cattle and the instruments of husbandry. The value of property was depreciated by the eager competition of multitudes; while the price of arms and horses was raised to an exorbitant height by the wants and impatience of the buyers.<sup>3)</sup> Those who remained at home, with sense and money, were enriched by the epidemical disease: the sovereigns acquired at a cheap rate the domains of their vassals; and the ecclesiastical purchasers completed the payment by the assurance of their prayers. The cross, which was commonly sewed on the garment, in cloth or silk, was inscribed by some zealots on their skin: an hot iron, or indelible liquor, was applied to perpetuate the mark; and a crafty monk, who showed the miraculous impression on his breast, was repaid with the popular veneration and the richest benefices of Palestine.<sup>34</sup>

The fifteenth of August had been fixed in the council of Clermont for the departure of the pilgrims ; but the day was anticipated by the thoughtless and needy crowd of plebeians ; and I shall briefly despatch the calamities which they inflicted and suffered, before I enter on the more serious and successful enterprise of the chiefs. Early in the spring, from the confines of France and Lorraine, above sixty thousand of the populace of both sexes flocked round the first missionary of the crusade, and pressed him with clamorous importunity to lead them to the holy sepulchre. The hermit, assuming the character, without the talents or authority, of a general, impelled or obeyed the forward impulse of his votaries along the banks of the Rhine and Danube. Their wants and numbers soon compelled them to separate, and his lieutenant, Walter the Peeniless, a valiant, though needy, soldier, conducted a vanguard of pilgrims, whose condition may be determined from the proportion of eight horsemen to fifteen thousand foot. The example and footsteps of Peter were closely pursued by another fanatic, the monk Godescalc, whose sermons had swept away fifteen or twenty thousand peasants from the villages of Germany. Their rear was again pressed by an herd of two hundred thousand, the most stupid and savage refuse of the people, who mingled with their devotion a brutal licence of rapine, prostitution, and drunkenness. Some counts and gentlemen, at the head of three thousand horse, attended the motions of the multitude to partake in the spoil ; but their genuine leaders (may we credit such folly ?) were a goose and a goat, who were carried in the front, and to whom these worthy Christians ascribed an infusion of the divine spirit.<sup>32</sup> Of these, and of other bands of en-

Departure of the first crusaders.
A. D. 1096,
March, May,
&c.

<sup>30</sup> The same hopes were displayed in the letters of the adventurers ad animandos qui in Francia residerant. Hugh de Rostes<sup>31</sup> could boast, that his share amounted to one abbey and ten castles, of the yearly value of 1500 marks, and that he should acquire an hundred castles in the space of thirty years, if he lived long enough.

51 In his genuine or fictitious letter to the count of Flanders, Alexius mingles with the dagger of the church, and the robes of saints, the auri et argenti amor, and pulcherrimum fornicarium voluptas (p. 176.), as it says the indignant Gilbert, the Greek women were handsomer than those of Europe.

33 Gumbert, tom. ii. p. 651, 652.

He was one of the few contemporaries who had genius enough to feel the astonishing scenes that were passing before their eyes. Exat itaque

...towards, &c.
given in the Esprit des whom I have not seen.
a general, intimate acquaintance popular state of opinion, however, as to the general disposition of resistant to change, and especially to any measure of extension of the the direct, would be to keep it as it is. As the Esprit des has P. L'Esprit. Has there been any further in our knowledge of the understand it, as it is, at the same time, that the whole of the the people, the church, the world have passed over with some questions and subtle and story.

whom he was descended in the female line. His father was of the noble race of the counts of Boulogne: Brabant, the lower province of Lorraine,<sup>43</sup> was the inheritance of his mother; and by the emperor's bounty, he was himself invested with that ducal title, which has been improperly transferred to his lordship of Bouillon in the Ardennes.<sup>44</sup> In the service of Henry the Fourth, he bore the great standard of the empire, and pierced with his lance the breast of Rodolph, the rebel king: Godfrey was the first who ascended the walls of Rome; and his sickness, his vow, perhaps his remorse for bearing arms against the pope, confirmed an early resolution of visiting the holy sepulchre, not as a pilgrim, but a deliverer. His valour was matured by prudence and moderation; his piety, though blind, was sincere; and in the tumult of a camp, he practised the real and fictitious virtues of a convent. Superior to the private factions of the chief, he reserved his enmity for the enemies of Christ; and though he gained a kingdom by the attempt, his pure and disinterested zeal was acknowledged by his rivals. Godfrey of Bouillon<sup>45</sup> was accompanied by his two brothers, by Eustace the elder, who had succeeded to the county of Boulogne, and by the younger, Baldwin, a character of more ambiguous virtue. The duke of Lorraine was alike celebrated on either side of the Rhine: from his birth and education, he was equally conversant with the French and Teutonic languages: the barons of France, Germany, and Lorraine, assembled their vassals; and the confederate force that marched under his banner was composed of fourscore thousand foot and about ten thousand horse.

II. In the parliament that was held at Paris, in the king's presence, about two months after the council of Clermont, Hugh, count of Vermandois, was the most conspicuous of the princes who assumed the cross. But the appellation of the Great was applied, not so much to his merit or possessions (though neither were contemptible), as to the royal birth of the brother of the king of France.<sup>46</sup> Robert, duke of Normandy, was the eldest son of William the Conqueror; but on his father's death he was deprived of the kingdom of England, by his own indolence and the activity of his brother Rufus. The birth of Robert was degraded by an excessive levity and easiness of temper: his cheerfulness seduced him to the indulgence of pleasure; his profuse liberality impoverished the prince and people; his indiscriminate clemency multiplied the number of offenders; and the amiable qualities of a private man became the essential defects of a sovereign. For the trifling sum of ten thousand marks, he mortgaged Normandy during his absence to the English usurper;<sup>47</sup> but his engagement and behaviour in the holy war, announced in Robert a reformation of manners, and restored him in some degree to the public esteem. Another Robert was count of Flanders, a royal province, which, in this century, gave three queens to the thrones of France, England, and Denmark: he was surnamed the Sword and Lance of the Christians; but in the exploits of a soldier, he sometimes forgot the duties of a general. Stephen, count of Chartres, of Blois, and of Troyes, was one of the richest princes of the age; and the number of his

II. Hugh of Vermandois, Robert of Normandy, Robert of Flanders, Stephen of Chartres, &c.

<sup>43</sup> The fragments of the kingdoms of Lotharinga, or Lorraine, were broken into the two duchies of the Moselle and of the Rhine: the first has preserved its name, which in the latter it has been changed into that of Brabant (Vales Not. vol. p. 287—288).
<sup>44</sup> See, by the Abbe de Beaumont, 54. Beaumont, part. i. p. 17, 18.
<sup>45</sup> Godfrey sold or pawned Bouillon to the king (Necker, Administration des Finances, tom. i. p. 257).

<sup>46</sup> Anna Cornuena supposes, that Hugh was proud of his nobility, riches, and power (N. A. p. 288). The two last articles appear more equivocal; but an et cetera, which is seven hundred years now for us in the palace of Constantinople, attests the ancient dignity of the Capetian branch of France.
<sup>47</sup> Wolf Gometzschius, l. vi. c. 7. p. 672, 673 in Camden. Normandy. He pawned the duchy for one hundredth part of the present yearly revenue. Ten thousand marks may be equal to five hundred thousand livres, and Normandy annually yields fifty-seven million to the king (Necker, Administration des Finances, tom. i. p. 257).

* To save time and space, I shall represent, in a short table, the particular references to the great events of the first crusade.

	The Crowd.	The Chiefs.	The Road to Constantinople.	Alexius.	Nice and Asia Minor.	Edessa.	Antioch.	The Battle.	The Holy Lance.	Conquest of Jerusalem.
I. Gesta Francorum	p. 1, 2.	p. 2.	p. 2, 3.	p. 4, 5.	p. 5-7.	—	p. 9-15.	p. 15-22.	p. 18-20.	p. 26-29.
II. Robertus Monachus	p. 33, 34.	p. 35, 36.	p. 36, 37.	p. 37, 38.	p. 39-45.	—	p. 45-55.	p. 56-66.	p. 61, 62.	p. 74-81.
III. Baldricus	p. 89.	—	p. 91-95.	p. 91-94.	p. 91-101.	—	p. 101-111.	p. 111-122.	p. 116-119.	p. 120-128.
IV. Raimundus de Agiles	—	—	p. 139, 140.	p. 140, 141.	p. 142.	—	p. 142-149.	p. 149-155.	p. 150, 152, 156.	p. 175-185.
V. Albertus Aqueensis	l. i. c. 7-31.	—	l. ii. c. 1-5.	l. iii. c. 9-19.	l. iv. c. 20-43.	l. v. c. 5-59.	l. vi. c. 53.	l. vii. c. 7-56.	l. viii. c. 43.	l. ix. c. 4, 46.
VI. Fulcherius Carnotensis	p. 351.	—	p. 355, 386.	p. 386.	p. 387-399.	p. 389, 390.	p. 390-392.	p. 392-397.	p. 392.	p. 396-400.
VII. Guibertus	p. 482, 485.	—	p. 485, 489.	p. 485-490.	p. 491-497.	p. 496, 497.	p. 495, 506, 512.	p. 512-523.	p. 520, 530.	p. 523-537.
VIII. Willelmus Tyrensis	l. i. c. 18-30.	l. i. c. 17.	l. ii. c. 1-4.	l. iii. c. 5-25.	l. iv. c. 1-12.	l. v. c. 1-6.	l. vi. c. 1-23.	l. vii. c. 1-23.	l. viii. c. 14.	l. ix. c. 1-25.
IX. Radulphus Cadomensis	—	c. 1-3, 15.	c. 4-7, 17.	c. 9-17, 19, 19.	c. 11-16, 21-27.	c. 45-71.	c. 72-91.	c. 160-160.	c. 111-138.	—
X. Bernardus Thesaurarius	c. 7-11.	—	c. 11-20.	c. 11-20.	c. 21-25.	c. 26.	c. 27-38.	c. 39-52.	c. 45.	c. 54-77.

castles has been compared to the three hundred and sixty-five days of the year. His mind was improved by literature; and in the council of the chiefs, the eloquent Stephen<sup>48</sup> was chosen to discharge the office of their president. These four were the principal leaders of the French, the Normans, and the pilgrims of the British isles: but the list of the barons who were possessed of three or four towns, would exceed, says a contemporary, the catalogue of the Trojan

III. Raymond, the command was assumed by Adhemar, bishop of Puy, the pope's legate, and by Raymond, count of St. Giles and Thoulouse, who added the prouder titles of duke of Narbonne and marquis of Provence. The former was a respectable prelate, alike qualified for this world and the next. The latter was a veteran warrior, who had fought against the Saracens of Spain, and who consecrated his declining age, not only to the deliverance, but to the perpetual service, of the holy sepulchre. His experience and riches gave him a strong ascendancy in the Christian camp, whose distress he was often able, and sometimes willing, to relieve. But it was easier for him to extort the praise of the infidels, than to preserve the love of his subjects and associates. His eminent qualities were clouded by a temper, haughty, envious, and obstinate; and, though he resigned an ample patrimony, for the cause of God, his piety, in the public opinion, was not exempt from avarice and ambition.<sup>50</sup> A mercantile, rather than a martial spirit, prevailed among his provincials,<sup>51</sup> a common name, which included the natives of Auvergne and Languedoc,<sup>52</sup> the vassals of the kingdom of Burgundy or Arles. From the adjacent frontier of Spain, he drew a band of hardy adventurers; as he marched through Lombardy, a crowd of Italians flocked to his standard, and his united force consisted of one hundred thousand horse and foot. If Raymond was the first to enlist and the last to depart, the delay may be excused by the greatness of his preparation and the promise of an everlasting firewall. IV. The name of Bohemond, of Bohemond, the son of Robert Guiscard, was already famous by his double victory over the Greek emperor, but his father's will had reduced him to the principality of Tarentum, and the remembrance of his Eastern trophies, till he was awakened by the rumour and passage of the French pilgrims. It is in the person of this Norman chief that we may seek for the coolest policy and ambition, with a small alloy of religious fanaticism. His conduct may justify a belief that he had secretly directed the design of the pope which he affected to second with astonishment and zeal : at the siege of Amalphi, his example and discourse inflamed the passions of a confederate army ; he instantly tore his garment to supply crosses for the numerous candidates, and prepared to visit Constantinople and Asia at the head of ten thousand horse and twenty thousand foot. Several princes of the Norman race accompanied this veteran general ; and his cousin Tancred<sup>33</sup> was the partner, rather than the servant, of the war. In the accomplished character of Tancred, we discover all the virtues of a perfect knight,<sup>34</sup> the true spirit of chivalry, which inspired the generous sentiments and social offices of man, far better than the base philosophy, or the baser religion, of the times.

Between the age of Charlemagne and that of the crusades, a revolution had taken place among the Spaniards, the Normans, and the French, which was gradually extended to the rest of Europe. The service of the infantry was degraded to the plebeians; the cavalry formed the strength of the armies, and the honourable name of miles, or soldier, was confined to the gentlemen<sup>55</sup> who served on horseback, and were invested with the character of knighthood. The dukes and counts, who had usurped the rights of sovereignty, divided the provinces among their faithful barons: the barons distributed among their vassals the fiefs, or benefices of their jurisdiction; and these military tenants, the peers of each other and of their lord, composed the noble or equestrian order, which disdained to conceive the peasant or burgher as of the same species with themselves. The dignity of their birth was preserved by pure and equal alliances; their sons alone, who could produce four quarters or lines of ancestry, without spot or reproach, might legally pretend to the honour of knighthood; but a valiant plebeian was sometimes enriched and ennobled by the sword, and became the father of a new race. A single knight could impart, according to his judgment, the character which he received; and the warlike sovereigns of Europe derived more glory from this personal distinction, than from the lustre of their diadem. This ceremony, of which some traces may be found in Tacitus and the woods of Germany,<sup>56</sup> was in its origin simple and profane; the candidate, after some previous trial, was in-48 His original letter to his wife is preserved in the Spanish arm of Dom Inigo de Aghero, to which it is alluded in the L'oprit des crousides, fol. 110 v<sup>17</sup>.

49. Emm. emm. dubia, from sea quarter opposite the pier, quite matured; 4 specimens; first pair in 1st stage. 1003. Abdomen coarsely punctate (Ever the lively and interesting tourist, p. 189).

<sup>50</sup> It is singular enough, that Raymond of St. Giles, second count in the kingdom of the crusades, should have been the hero of the writings of the Greeks (Ant. Comnen. Alexad. l. v. xi) and the Arabians (Ibn al-Arabi, p. 129).

St. John's town of his birth, or first anchorage, was consecrated to by t

Guscard; his father, the marquis Odo the Good. It is singular enough, that the family and country of so illustrious a person should be unknown. But Muratori reasonably conjectures that he was an Italian, and perhaps of the race of the marquesses of Muntferat in Piedmont (Savoy to us), as he 14 In gratitude the cloth brought at the House of Este, Tasso has inserted in his poem, and in the first rhapsody, a fabulous hero, the brave and anonymous Biondo (x, 3, vv. 16-91). He might borrow his

[illegible]

etymologies
ury, the sol-

56. Franciae scutoque iuvenem ornant. Tacitus, Germania, c. 13.

vested with his sword and spurs; and his cheek or shoulder was touched with a slight blow, as an emblem of the last affront which it was lawful for him to endure. But superstition mingled in every public and private action of life; in the holy wars, it sanctified the profession of arms; and the order of chivalry was assimilated in its rights and privileges to the sacred orders of priesthood. The bath and white garment of the novice were an indecent copy of the regeneration of baptism: his sword, which he offered on the altar, was blessed by the ministers of religion: his solemn reception was preceded by fasts and vigils; and he was created a knight in the name of God, of St. George, and of St. Michael the archangel. He swore to accomplish the duties of his profession; and education, example, and the public opinion, were the inviolable guardians of his oath. As the champion of God and the ladies (I blush to unite such discordant names), he devoted himself to speak the truth; to maintain the right; to protect the distressed; to practise courtesy, a virtue less familiar to the ancients; to pursue the infidels; to despise the allurements of ease and safety; and to vindicate in every perilous adventure the honour of his character.

The abuse of the same spirit provoked the illiterate knight to disdain the arts of industry and peace; to esteem himself the sole judge and avenger of his own injuries; and proudly to neglect the laws of civil society and military discipline. Yet the benefits of this institution, to refine the temper of barbarians, and to infuse some principles of faith, justice, and humanity, were strongly felt, and have been often observed.

The asperity of national prejudice was softened ; and the community of religion and arms spread a similar colour and generous emulation over the face of Christendom. Abroad, in enterprise and pilgrimage, at home in martial exercise, the warriors of every country were perpetually associated ; and impartial taste must prefer a Gothic tournament to the Olympic games of classic antiquity.<sup>37</sup> Instead of the naked spectacles which corrupted the manners of the Greeks, and banished from the stadium the virgins and matrons ; the pompous decoration of the lists was crowned with the presence of chaste and high-born beauty, from whose hands the conqueror received the prize of his dexterity and courage. The skill and strength that were exerted in wrestling and boxing bear a distant and doubtful relation to the merit of a soldier ; but the tournaments, as they were invented in France, and eagerly adopted both in the East and West, presented a lively image of the business of the field. The single combats, the general skirmish, the defence of a pass or castle, were rehearsed as in actual service ; and the contest, both in real and mimic war, was decided by the superior management of the horse and lance. The lance was the proper and peculiar weapon of the knight. his horse was of a large and heavy breed ; but this charger, till he was roused by the approaching danger, was usually led by an attendant, and he quietly rode a pad or palfrey of a more easy pace. His helmet and sword, his greaves and buckler, it would be superfluous to describe; but I may remark, that at the period of the crusades, the armour was less ponderous than in later times; and that, instead of a massy cuirass, his breast was defended by an hauberk, or coat of mail. When their long lances were fixed in the rest, the warriors furiously spurred their horses against the foe; and the light cavalry of the Turks, and Arabs could seldom stand against the direct and impetuous weight of their charge. Each knight was attended to the field by his faithful squire, a youth of equal birth and similar hopes; he was followed by his archers and men at arms, and four, or five, or six soldiers, were computed as the furniture of a complete lance. In the expeditions to the neighbouring kingdoms or the Holy Land, the duties of the feudal tenure no longer subsisted; the voluntary service of the knights and their followers was either prompted by zeal or attachment, or purchased with rewards and promises; and the numbers of each squadron were measured by the power, the wealth, and the fame, of each independent chieftain. They were distinguished by his banner, his armorial coat, and his cry of war; and the most ancient families of Europe must seek in these achievements the origin and proof of their nobility. In this rapid portrait of chivalry, I have been urged to anticipate on the story of the crusades, at once an effect, and a cause, of this memorable institution.<sup>58</sup>

Such were the troops, and such the leaders, who assumed the cross for the deliverance of the holy sepulchre. As soon as they were relieved by the absence of the plebeian multitude, they encouraged each other, by interviews and messages, to accomplish their vow, and hasten their departure. Their wives and sisters were desirous of partaking the danger and merit of the pilgrimage; their portable treasures were conveyed in bars of silver and gold; and the princes and barons were attended by their equipage of hounds and hawks to amuse their leisure and to supply their table. The difficulty of procuring subsistence for so many myriads of men and horses, engaged them to separate their forces; their choice or situation determined the road; and it was agreed to meet in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, and from thence to begin their operations against the Turks. From the banks of the Meuse and the Moselle, Godfrey of Bouillon followed the direct way of Germany, Hungary, and Bulgaria: and, as long as he exercised the sole command, every step afforded some proof of his prudence and virtue. On the confines of Hungary he was stopped three weeks by a Christian people, to whom the name, or at least the abuse, of the cross was justly odious. The Hungarians still smarted with the wounds which they had received from the first pilgrims:

March of the princes to Constantinople.
A. D. 1099,
August 17—
A. D. 1097,
May.

57 The athletic exercises, particularly the coetus and papcratum, were conde a general, reader may see West (215-218.

55 On the various subjects of knighthood, knight's service, nobility, arms, cry of war, banners, and tournament. a ample fund of information. Part 1. Folios of 101. 102. 103. 104. 105. 106. 107. 108. 109. 110. 111. 112. 113. 114. 115. 116. 117. 118. 119. 120. 121. 122. 123. 124. 125. 126. 127. 128. 129. 130. 131. 132. 133. 134. 135. 136. 137. 138. 139. 140. 141. 142. 143. 144. 145. 146. 147. 148. 149. 150. 151. 152. 153. 154. 155. 156. 157. 158. 159. 160. 161. 162. 163. 164. 165. 166. 167. 168. 169. 170. 171. 172. 173. 174. 175. 176. 177. 178. 179. 180. 181. 182. 183. 184. 185. 186. 187. 188. 189. 190. 191. 192. 193. 194. 195. 196. 197. 198. 199. 200. 201. 202. 203. 204. 205. 206. 207. 208. 209. 210. 211. 212. 213. 214. 215. 216. 217. 218. 219. 220. 221. 222. 223. 224. 225. 226. 227. 228. 229. 230. 231. 232. 233. 234. 235. 236. 237. 238. 239. 240. 241. 242. 243. 244. 245. 246. 247. 248. 249. 250. 251. 252. 253. 254. 255. 256. 257. 258. 259. 260. 261. 262. 263. 264. 265. 266. 267. 268. 269. 270. 271. 272. 273. 274. 275. 276. 277. 278. 279. 280. 281. 282. 283. 284. 285. 286. 287. 288. 289. 290. 291. 292. 293. 294. 295. 296. 297. 298. 299. 300. 301. 302. 303. 304. 305. 306. 307. 308. 309. 310. 311. 312. 313. 314. 315. 316. 317. 318. 319. 320. 321. 322. 323. 324. 325. 326. 327. 328. 329. 330. 331. 332. 333. 334. 335. 336. 337. 338. 339. 340. 341. 342. 343. 344. 345. 346. 347. 348. 349. 350. 351. 352. 353. 354. 355. 356. 357. 358. 359. 360. 361. 362. 363. 364. 365. 366. 367. 368. 369. 370. 371. 372. 373. 374. 375. 376. 377. 378. 379. 380. 381. 382. 383. 384. 385. 386. 387. 388. 389. 390. 391. 392. 393. 394. 395. 396. 397. 398. 399. 400. 401. 402. 403. 404. 405. 406. 407. 408. 409. 410. 411. 412. 413. 414. 415. 416. 417. 418. 419. 420. 421. 422. 423. 424. 425. 426. 427. 428. 429. 430. 431. 432. 433. 434. 435. 436. 437. 438. 439. 440. 441. 442. 443. 444. 445. 446. 447. 448. 449. 450. 451. 452. 453. 454. 455. 456. 457. 458. 459. 460. 461. 462. 463. 464. 465. 466. 467. 468. 469. 470. 471. 472. 473. 474. 475. 476. 477. 478. 479. 480. 481. 482. 483. 484. 485. 486. 487. 488. 489. 490. 491. 492. 493. 494. 495. 496. 497. 498. 499. 500. 501. 502. 503. 504. 505. 506. 507. 508. 509. 510. 511. 512. 513. 514. 515. 516. 517. 518. 519. 520. 521. 522. 523. 524. 525. 526. 527. 528. 529. 530. 531. 532. 533. 534. 535. 536. 537. 538. 539. 540. 541. 542. 543. 544. 545. 546. 547. 548. 549. 550. 551. 552. 553. 554. 555. 556. 557. 558. 559. 560. 561. 562. 563. 564. 565. 566. 567. 568. 569. 570. 571. 572. 573. 574. 575. 576. 577. 578. 579. 580. 581. 582. 583. 584. 585. 586. 587. 588. 589. 590. 591. 592. 593. 594. 595. 596. 597. 598. 599. 600. 601. 602. 603. 604. 605. 606. 607. 608. 609. 610. 611. 612. 613. 614. 615. 616. 617. 618. 619. 620. 621. 622. 623. 624. 625. 626. 627. 628. 629. 630. 631. 632. 633. 634. 635. 636. 637. 638. 639. 640. 641. 642. 643. 644. 645. 646. 647. 648. 649. 650. 651. 652. 653. 654. 655. 656. 657. 658. 659. 660. 661. 662. 663. 664. 665. 666. 667. 668. 669. 670. 671. 672. 673. 674. 675. 676. 677. 678. 679. 680. 681. 682. 683. 684. 685. 686. 687. 688. 689. 690. 691. 692. 693. 694. 695. 696. 697. 698. 699. 700. 701. 702. 703. 704. 705. 706. 707. 708. 709. 710. 711. 712. 713. 714. 715. 716. 717. 718. 719. 720. 721. 722. 723. 724. 725. 726. 727. 728. 729. 730. 731. 732. 733. 734. 735. 736. 737. 738. 739. 740. 741. 742. 743. 744. 745. 746. 747. 748. 749. 750. 751. 752. 753. 754. 755. 756. 757. 758. 759. 760. 761. 762. 763. 764. 765. 766. 767. 768. 769. 770. 771. 772. 773. 774. 775. 776. 777. 778. 779. 780. 781. 782. 783. 784. 785. 786. 787. 788. 789. 790. 791. 792. 793. 794. 795. 796. 797. 798. 799. 800. 801. 802. 803. 804. 805. 806. 807. 808. 809. 810. 811. 812. 813. 814. 815. 816. 817. 818. 819. 820. 821. 822. 823. 824. 825. 826. 827. 828. 829. 830. 831. 832. 833. 834. 835. 836. 837. 838. 839. 840. 841. 842. 843. 844. 845. 846. 847. 848. 849. 850. 851. 852. 853. 854. 855. 856. 857. 858. 859. 860. 861. 862. 863. 864. 865. 866. 867. 868. 869. 870. 871. 872. 873. 874. 875. 876. 877. 878. 879. 880. 881. 882. 883. 884. 885. 886. 887. 888. 889. 890. 891. 892. 893. 894. 895. 896. 897. 898. 899. 900. 901. 902. 903. 904. 905. 906. 907. 908. 909.

in their turn they had abused the right of defence and retaliation; and they had reason to apprehend a severe revenge from an hero of the same nation, and who was engaged in the same cause. But, after weighing the motives and the events, the virtuous duke was content to pity the crimes and misfortunes of his worthless brethren; and his twelve deputies, the messengers of peace, requested in his name a free passage and an equal market. To remove their suspicions, Godfrey trusted himself, and afterwards his brother, to the faith of Carloman king of Hungary, who treated them with a simple but hospitable entertainment: the treaty was sanctified by their common Gospel; and a proclamation, under pain of death, restrained the animosity and licence of the Latin soldiers. From Austria to Belgrade, they traversed the plains of Hungary, without enduring or offering an injury; and the proximity of Carloman, who hovered on their flanks with his numerous cavalry, was a precaution not less useful for their safety than for his own. They reached the banks of the Save; and no sooner had they passed the river, than the king of Hungary restored the hostages, and saluted their departure with the fairest wishes for the success of their enterprise. With the same conduct and discipline, Godfrey pervaded the woods of Bulgaria and the frontiers of Thrace; and might congratulate himself, that he had almost reached the first term of his pilgrimage, without drawing his sword against a Christian adversary. After an easy and pleasant journey through Lombardy, from Turin to Aquileia, Raymond and his provincials marched forty days through the savage country of Dalmatia<sup>59</sup> and Sclavonia. The weather was a perpetual fog; the land was mountainous and desolate; the natives were either fugitive or hostile: loose in their religion and government, they refused to furnish provisions or guides; murdered the stragglers; and exercised by night and day the vigilance of the count, who derived more security from the punishment of some captive robbers than from his interview and treaty with the prince of Scodra.<sup>60</sup> His march between Durazzo and Constantinople was harassed, without being stopped, by the peasants and soldiers of the Greek emperor; and the same faint and ambiguous hostility was prepared for the remaining chiefs, who passed the Adriatic from the coast of Italy. Bohemond had arms and vessels, and foresight and discipline; and his name was not forgotten in the provinces of Epirus and Thessaly. Whatever obstacles he encountered were surmounted by his military conduct and the valour of Tancred; and if the Norman prince affected to spare the Greeks, he gorged his soldiers with the full plunder of an heretical castle.<sup>61</sup> The nobles of France pressed forwards with the vain and thoughtless ardour of which their nation has been sometimes accused. From the Alps to Apulia the march of Hugh the Great, of the two Roberts, and of Stephen of Chartres, through a wealthy country, and amidst the applauding Catholics, was a devout or triumphant progress: they kissed the feet of the Roman pontiff; and the golden standard of St. Peter was delivered to the brother of the French monarch.<sup>62</sup> But in this visit of piety and pleasure, they neglected to secure the season and the means, of their embarkation: the winter was insensibly lost; their troops were scattered and corrupted in the towns of Italy. They separately accomplished their passage, regardless of safety or dignity; and within nine months from the feast of the Assumption, the day appointed by Urban, all the Latin princes had reached Constantinople. But the count of Vermandois was produced as a captive; his foremost vessels were scattered by a tempest; and his person, against the law of nations, was detained by the lieutenants of Alexius. Yet the arrival of Hugh had been announced by four and twenty knights in golden armour, who commanded the emperor to revere the general of the Latin Christians, the brother of the King of kings.<sup>63</sup>

In some Oriental tale I have read the fable of a shepherd, who was ruined by the accomplishment of his own wishes: he had prayed for water; the Ganges was turned into his grounds, and his flock and cottage were swept away by the inundation. Such was the fortune, or at least the apprehension, of the Greek emperor Alexius Comnenus, whose name has already appeared in this history, and whose conduct is so differently represented by his daughter Anne,<sup>64</sup> and by the Latin writers.<sup>65</sup> In the council of Placentia, his ambassadors had solicited a moderate succour, perhaps of ten thousand soldiers. but he was astonished by the approach of so many potent chiefs and fanatic nations. The emperor fluctuated between hope and fear, between timidity and courage; but in the crooked policy which he mistook for wisdom, I cannot believe, I cannot discern, that he maliciously conspired against the life or honour of the French heroes. The promiscuous multitudes of Peter the Hermit were savage beasts, alike

<sup>59</sup> The Finis Dalmatiae of Pucenaz is modern and incorrect, the principal frontiers are recent and fabulous; the Greeks reside and empire. At the war 1194, Alexius retained the maritime country as far as Trau and Salona (Katonas, Hist. Crit. tom. i. p. 126—207.)

<sup>60</sup> Scodra appears in Larc as the capital and fortress of the first king of the Elyriens, or manussimas, afterwards a Roman count (D'Anast, tom. i. p. 793, 794). It is now a dried bed, or desert (D'Anast, tom. i. p. 793, 794). The sinjag (river) under the Begler, is a revenue of 75,000 as (D'Anast, tom. i. p. 793, 794).

<sup>61</sup> In Peloponneso castrum barreticum . . . spoliatum cum suis habitatoribus igne combussere. Accidit eis infirma quibus quia illorum detestabilis sermo et cancer sequebat, tamque circumcinctos regiones suo pravo dogmate sed daverat (Robert. Mon. p. 36, 37).

<sup>62</sup> Accidit eis infirma quibus quia illorum detestabilis sermo et cancer sequebat, tamque circumcinctos regiones suo pravo dogmate sed daverat (Robert. Mon. p. 36, 37).

<sup>63</sup> Ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ῥωμανῶν καὶ ἀντιπρὸς τοὺς ἑσπερίους στρατηγούς, ὅπως αὐτοὶ οὐκ ἐπὶ τῇ πόλει Βυζαντίου ἔχουσιν ἰσχυρὰν ἀμύνεσθαι, ἀλλ' ἐπὶ τῇ πόλει Βυζαντίου ἔχουσιν ἰσχυρὰν ἀμύνεσθαι, ἀλλ' ἐπὶ τῇ πόλει Βυζαντίου ἔχουσιν ἰσχυρὰν ἀμύνεσθαι (Mansueti, p. 51). The passage of Matthew Paris (A.D. 1244) and Froussart (A.D. 1244), which style the king of France, rex regum, and chief defender of Christians.

<sup>64</sup> Anna Comnenus was born the 1st of December, A.D. 1098, under the reign of Alexius I. p. 109, 110. At thirteen, the time of the first crusade, she was married, and perhaps married to the younger Nicephorus Basilus, whom she humbly styles τὸν ἐμὸν Καίσαρα (A.D. 1109, p. 200). Some moderns have imagined, that her enmity to Bo-

destitute of humanity and reason: nor was it possible for Alexius to prevent or deplore their destruction. The troops of Godfrey and his peers were less contemptible, but not less suspicious, to the Greek emperor. Their motives might be pure and pious; but he was equally alarmed by his knowledge of the ambitious Bohemond, and his ignorance of the Transalpine chiefs: the courage of the French was blind and headstrong; they might be tempted by the luxury and wealth of Greece, and elated by the view and opinion of their invincible strength; and Jerusalem might be forgotten in the prospect of Constantinople. After a long march and painful abstinence, the troops of Godfrey encamped in the plains of Thrace; they heard with indignation, that their brother, the count of Vermandois, was imprisoned by the Greeks; and their reluctant duke was compelled to indulge them in some freedom of retaliation and rapine. They were appeased by the submission of Alexius; he promised to supply their camp; and as they refused, in the midst of winter, to pass the Bosphorus, their quarters were assigned among the gardens and palaces on the shores of that narrow sea. But an incurable jealousy still rankled in the minds of the two nations, who despised each other as slaves and barbarians. Ignorance is the ground of suspicion, and suspicion was inflamed into daily provocations: prejudice is blind, hunger is deaf; and Alexius is accused of a design to starve or assault the Latins in a dangerous post, on all sides encompassed with the waters.<sup>65</sup> Godfrey sounded his trumpets, burst the net, overspread the plain, and insulted the suburbs: but the gates of Constantinople were strongly fortified; the ramparts were lined with archers; and after a doubtful conflict, both parties listened to the voice of peace and religion. The gifts and promises of the emperor insensibly soothed the fierce spirit of the western strangers; as a Christian warrior, he rekindled their zeal for the prosecution of their holy enterprise, which he engaged to second with his troops and treasures. On the return of spring, Godfrey was persuaded to occupy a pleasant and plentiful camp in Asia; and no sooner had he passed the Bosphorus, than the Greek vessels were suddenly recalled to the opposite shore. The same policy was repeated with the succeeding chiefs, who were swayed by the example, and weakened by the departure, of their foremost companions. By his skill and diligence, Alexius prevented the union of any two of the confederate armies at the same moment under the walls of Constantinople; and before the feast of the Pentecost not a Latin pilgrim was left on the coast of Europe.

He obtains the homage of the crusaders.

The same arms which threatened Europe might deliver Asia. And compel the Turks from the neighbouring shores of the Bosphorus and Hellespont. The fair provinces from Nice to Antioch were the recent patrimony of the Roman emperor; and his ancient and perpetual claim still embraced the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt. In his enthusiasm, Alexius indulged, or affected, the ambitious hope of leading his new allies to subvert the thrones of the East; but the calmer dictates of reason and temper dissuaded him from exposing his royal person to the faith of unknown and lawless barbarians. His prudence, or his pride, was content with extorting from the French princes an oath of homage and fidelity, and a solemn promise, that they would either restore, or hold, their Asiatic conquests, as the humble and loyal vassals of the Roman empire. Their independent spirit was fired at the mention of this foreign and voluntary servitude: they successively yielded to the dexterous application of gifts and flattery; and the first proselytes became the most eloquent and effectual missionaries to multiply the companions of their shame. The pride of Hugh of Vermandois was soothed by the honours of his captivity; and in the brother of the French king, the example of submission was prevalent and weighty. In the mind of Godfrey of Bouillon every human consideration was subordinate to the glory of God and the success of the crusade. He had firmly resisted the temptations of Bohemond and Raymond, who urged the attack and conquest of Constantinople. Alexius esteemed his virtues, deservedly named him the champion of the empire, and dignified his homage with the filial name and the rights of adoption.<sup>67</sup> The hateful Bohemond was received as a true and ancient ally; and if the emperor reminded him of former hostilities, it was only to praise the valour that he had displayed, and the glory that he had acquired, in the fields of Dumazzo and Larissa. The son of Guiscard was lodged and entertained, and served with Imperial pomp: one day, as he passed through the gallery of the palace, a door was carelessly left open to expose a pile of gold and silver, of silk and gems, of curious and costly furniture, that was heaped in seeming disorder, from the floor to the roof of the chamber. "What conquests," exclaimed the ambitious miser, "might not be achieved by the possession of such a treasure?" "It is your own," replied a Greek attendant, who watched the motions of his soul; and Bohemond, after some hesitation, condescended to accept this magnificent present. The Norman was flattered by the assurance of an independent principality; and Alexius eluded, rather than denied, his daring demand of the office of great domestic, or general, of the East. The two Roberts, the son of the conqueror of England, and the kinsman of three queens,<sup>68</sup> bowed in their turn before the Byzantine throne. A private letter of Stephen of Chartres attests his admiration of the emperor, the most excellent and liberal of men, who taught him to believe that he was a favourite, and promised to educate and establish dusty of Alexius; a great number of boats was transported on sledges from the sea to the lake; they were filled with the most dexterous of his archers; the flight of the sultana was intercepted; Nice was invested by land and water; and a Greek emissary persuaded the inhabitants to accept his master's protection, and to save themselves, by a timely surrender, from the rage of the savages of Europe. In the moment of victory, or at least of hope, the crusaders, thirsting for blood and plunder, were awed by the Imperial banner that streamed from the citadel; and Alexius guarded with jealous vigilance this important conquest. The murmurs of the chiefs were stifled by honour or interest; and after an halt of nine days, they directed their march towards Phrygia under the guidance of a Greek general, whom they suspected of a secret connivance with the sultan. The consort and the principal servants of Soliman had been honourably restored without ransom; and the emperor's generosity to the mascreants<sup>83</sup> was interpreted as treason to the Christian cause.

<sup>65</sup> Introducing the son between the shirt and skin of his father. Phrygæ sacra &c. vol. d. xxv. p. 216. supposes to derive adoption to have been of the latter sort.

<sup>67</sup> After his return, Robert of Flanders, became the monk of the abbey of Brabant, but is famous for that he died in battle. See the first act of Bayard's Fadaire.

<sup>68</sup> There were two sorts of adjectives, the first army, the other 15

Soliman was rather provoked than dismayed by the loss of his capital: he admonished his subjects and allies of this strange invasion of the Western barbarians; the Turkish emirs obeyed the call of loyalty or religion; the Turkman hordes encamped round his standard; and his whole force is loosely stated by the Christians at two hundred, or even three hundred and sixty thousand horse. Yet he patiently waited till they had left behind them the sea and the Greek frontier; and hovering on the flanks, observed their careless and confident progress in two columns beyond the view of each other. Some miles before they could reach Dorylaeum in Phrygia, the left and least numerous division was surprised, and attacked, and almost oppressed, by the Turkish cavalry.<sup>84</sup> The heat of the weather, the clouds of arrows, and the barbarous onset, overwhelmed the crusaders; they lost their order and confidence, and the fainting flight was sustained by the personal valour, rather than by the military conduct, of Bohemond, Tancred, and Robert of Normandy. They were revived by the welcome banners of duke Godfrey, who flew to their succour, with the count of Flanders, and six thousand horse; and was followed by Raymond of Thoulouse, the bishop of Puy, and the remainder of the sacred army. Without a moment's pause, they formed in new order, and advanced to a second battle. They were received with equal resolution; and, in their common disdain for the unwelcome people of Greece and Asia, they were confounded on both sides, that the Turks and the Franks were the only nations entitled to the appellation of soldiers.<sup>85</sup> Their encounter was varied and balanced by the contrast of arms and discipline; of the direct charge, and wheeling evolutions; of the couched lance, and the brandished javelin; of a weighty broadsword, and a crooked sabre; of cumbrous armour, and thin flowing robes; and of the long Tartar bow, and the arbalist or cross-bow, a deadly weapon, yet unknown to the Orientals.<sup>86</sup> As long as the horses were fresh, and the quivers full, Soliman maintained the advantage of the day; and four thousand Christians were pierced by the Turkish arrows. In the evening, swiftness yielded to strength; on either side the numbers were equal, or at least as great as any ground could hold, or any generals could manage; but in turning the hills, the last division of Raymond and his provincials was led, perhaps without design, on the rear of an exhausted enemy; and the long contest was determined. Besides a nameless and unaccounted multitude, three thousand Pagan knights were slain in the battle and pursuit; the camp of Soliman was pillaged; and in the variety of precious spoil, the avarice of the Latins was amused with foreign arms and apparel, and the new aspect of dromedaries and camels. The importance of the victory was proved by the hasty retreat of the sultan: reserving ten thousand guards of the relics of his army, Soliman evacuated the kingdom of Roum, and hastened to implore the aid, and kindle the resentment, of his Eastern brethren. In a march of five hundred miles, the crusaders traversed the Lesser Asia, through a wasted land and deserted towns, without finding either a friend or an enemy. The geographer<sup>87</sup> may trace the position of Dorylaeum, Antioch of Pisidia, Iconium, Archelais, and Germanicia, and may compare those classic appellations with the modern names of Ekishehr the old city, Akishehr the white city, Cogni, Ereklî, and Marash. As the pilgrims passed over a desert, where a draught of water is exchanged for silver, they were tormented by intolerable thirst; and on the banks of the first rivulet, their haste and intemperance were still more pernicious to the disorderly throng. They climbed with toil and danger the steep and slippery sides of Mount Taurus: many of the soldiers cast away their arms to secure their foot-steps; and had not terror preceded their van, the long and trembling file might have been driven down the precipice by an handful of resolute enemies. Two of their most respectable chiefs, the duke of Lorraine and the count of Thoulouse, were carried in litters. Raymond was seized, as it is said by miracle, from an hopeless malady; and Godfrey had been torn by a bear, as he pursued that

<sup>83</sup> Mascreant, a word invented by the French crusaders, and confined to that language to its primitive sense. It should seem, that the real cause of an enter-braided bugler, and that they believed it was only never as a mascreant. A similar prejudice still lurks in the minds of many who think the Latins Christians.

<sup>84</sup> Bohemond is credited a very doubtful letter to his brother Roger (A. B. 1098, No. 15). The enemies consisted of Medo-Persians, Chaldeans, &c. &c. The last attack was curia nostra a monasterio, true and tender. But who Godfrey of Bouillon and Hugh in thens? Tancred is styled fratru, of whom? certainly not of Roger, nor of Bohemond.

<sup>85</sup> Verumtamen dumtaxat se esse de Francorum genere me; et quia nullus homo naturaliter debet esse miles nisi Francus et Turci (Gesta Francorum, p. 7). The same community of blood and valour is attributed to the Latins by Muratori, Antiq. tom. ii. lib. i. p. 571, 572. In the which he describes under the name of francus, was unknown in the East (x. p. 201.). By an humane misapprehension, the pope strove to prohibit it in Christian wars. <sup>87</sup> The curious reader may compare the classic harrowing of Callistrus, and the geographical science of D'Anville. William of Tyre is the only historian of the crusades who has any knowledge of antiquity, and M. D'Anville almost in the borders of the Franks from Constantinople to Antioch (Voyage en Turquie et en Perse, tom. i. p. 55-55.).

rough and perilous chace in the mountains of Pisidia.

To improve the general consternation, the cousin of Bohemond and the brother of Godfrey were detached from the main army with their respective squadrons of five, and of seven, hundred knights. They over-ran in a rapid career the hills and sea-coast of Cilicia, from Cogni to the Syrian gates: the Norman standard was first planted on the walls of Tarsus and Malmistra; but the proud injustice of Baldwin at length provoked the patient and generous Italian; and they turned their consecrated swords against each other in a private and profane quarrel. Honour was the motive, and fame the reward, of Tancred; but fortune smiled on the more selfish enterprise of his rival.<sup>88</sup> He was called to the assistance of a Greek or Armenian tyrant, who had been suffered under the Turkish yoke to reign over the Christians of Edessa. Baldwin accepted the character of his son and champion; but no sooner was he introduced into the city, than he inflamed the people to the massacre of his father, occupied the throne and treasure, extended his conquests over the hills of Armenia and the plain of Mesopotamia, and founded the first principality of the Franks or Latins, which subsisted fifty-four years beyond the Euphrates.<sup>89</sup>

Before the Franks could enter Syria, the summer, and even the autumn, were completely wasted: the siege of Antioch, or the separation and repose of the army during the winter season, was strongly debated in their council: the love of arms and the holy sepulchre urged them to advance; and reason perhaps was on the side of resolution. Since every hour of delay abates the fame and force of the invader, and multiplies the resources of defensive war. The capital of Syria was protected by the river Orontes; and the von ladder, of nine miles, derives its name from the massy gates of the two towers which are constructed at either end. They were opened by the sword of the duke of Normandy: his victory gave entrance to three hundred thousand crusaders, an account which may allow some scope for losses and desertion, but which clearly detects much exaggeration in the review of Nice. In the description of Antioch,<sup>90</sup> it is not easy to define a middle term between her ancient magnificence, under the successors of Alexander and Augustus, and the modern aspect of Turkish desolation. The Tetrachols, or four cities, if they retained their name and position, must have left a large vacancy in a circumference of twelve miles; and that measure, as well as the number of four hundred towers, are not perfectly consistent with the five gates, so often mentioned in the history of the siege. Yet Antioch must have still flourished as a great and populous capital. At the head of the Turkish emirs, Baghisian, a veteran chief, commanded in the place: his garrison was composed of six or seven thousand horse, and fifteen or twenty thousand foot: one hundred thousand Moslems are said to have fallen by the sword; and their numbers were probably inferior to the Greeks, Armenians, and Syrians, who had been no more than fourteen years the slaves of the house of Seljuk. From the remains of a solid and stately wall, it appears to have arisen to the height of threescore feet in the valleys; and wherever less art and labour had been applied, the ground was supposed to be defended by the river, the morass, and the mountains. Notwithstanding these fortifications, the city had been repeatedly taken by the Persians, the Arabs, the Greeks, and the Turks; so large a circuit must have yielded many pervious points of attack; and in a siege that was formed about the middle of October, the vigour of the execution could alone justify the boldness of the attempt. Whatever strength and valour could perform in the field was abundantly discharged by the champions of the cross. In the frequent occasions of sallies, of forage, of the attack and defence of convoys, they were often victorious; and we can only complain, that their exploits are sometimes enlarged beyond the scale of probability and truth. The sword of Godfrey<sup>91</sup> divided a Turk from the shoulder to the haunch; and one half of the infidel fell to the ground, while the other was transported by his horse to the city gate. As Robert of Normandy rode against his antagonist, "I devote thy head," he proudly exclaimed, "to the demons of hell;" and that head was instantly cloven to the breast by the resistless stroke of his descending falchion. But the reality or the report of such gigantic prowess<sup>92</sup> must have taught the Moslems to keep within their walls; and against those walls of earth or stone, the sword and the lance were unavailing weapons. In the slow and successive labours of a siege, the crusaders were supine and ignorant, without skill to contrive, or money to purchase, or industry to use, the artificial engines and implements of assault. In the conquest of Nice, they had been powerfully assisted by the wealth and knowledge of the Greek emperor: his absence was poorly supplied by some Genoese and Prasan vessels, that were attracted by religion or trade to the coast of Syria: the stores were scanty, the return precarious, the communication difficult and dangerous. Indolence or weakness had prevented the Franks from investing the entire circuit; and the perpetual freedom of two gates relieved the wants and recruited the garrison of the city. At the end

<sup>88</sup> This detailed conquest of Edessa is best represented by Fulcher of Chartres, crus. lib. 11. in the list of Bohemond, Tancred, and Mortemner, the second champion of Robert of Normandy, crus. lib. 1. p. 12, 13. In the notes of that prince with Tancred, his party is encountered by the port of Bohemond Ladiness, the soldier and his train of the giant marquis.

<sup>89</sup> Crus. lib. 1. p. 12, 13. In the list of Bohemond, Tancred, and Mortemner, the second champion of Robert of Normandy, crus. lib. 1. p. 12, 13.

<sup>90</sup> part. 1.
<sup>91</sup> lib. 1.
<sup>92</sup> lib. 1.

<sup>91</sup> From the sword of Godfrey, part. 1. p. 12, 13. In the list of Bohemond, Tancred, and Mortemner, the second champion of Robert of Normandy, crus. lib. 1. p. 12, 13. In the notes of that prince with Tancred, his party is encountered by the port of Bohemond Ladiness, the soldier and his train of the giant marquis.

<sup>92</sup> See the exploits of Robert, Raymond, and the modest Tancred, who opposed silence to his dispute. Raymond, lib. 1. p. 12, 13.

his youngest son. In his southern province, the count of St. Giles and Thoulouse faintly recognised the supremacy of the king of France, a prince of a foreign nation and language. At the head of an hundred thousand men, he declared that he was the soldier and servant of Christ alone, and that the Greek might be satisfied with an equal treaty of alliance and friendship. His obstinate resistance enhanced the value and the price of his submission; and he shone, says the princess Anne, among the barbarians, as the sun amidst the stars of heaven. His disgust of the noise and insolence of the French, his suspicions of the designs of Bohemond, the emperor imparted to his faithful Raymond; and that aged statesman might clearly discern, that, however false in friendship, he was sincere in his enmity.<sup>61</sup> The spirit of chivalry was last subdued in the person of Tancred; and none could deem themselves dishonoured by the imitation of that gallant knight. He disdained the gold and flattery of the Greek monarch; assaulted in his presence an insolent patrician; escaped to Asia in the habit of a private soldier; and yielded with a sigh to the authority of Bohemond and the interest of the Christian cause. The best and most ostensible reason was the impossibility of passing the sea and accomplishing their vow, without the licence and the vessels of Alexius; but they cherished a secret hope, that as soon as they trod the continent of Asia, their swords would obliterate their shame, and dissolve the engagement, which on his side might not be very faithfully performed. The ceremony of their homage was grateful to a people who had long since considered pride as the substitute of power. High on his throne, the emperor sat mute and immovable; his majesty was adored by the Latin princes; and they submitted to kiss either his feet or his knees, an indignity which their own writers are ashamed to confess, and unable to deny.<sup>62</sup>

Private or public interest suppressed the murmurs of the dukes and counts; but a French baron (he is supposed to be Robert of Paris<sup>63</sup>) presumed to ascend the throne, and to place himself by the side of Alexius. The sage reproof of Baldwin provoked him to exclaim, in his barbarous idiom, "Who is this rustic, that keeps his seat, while so many valiant captains are standing round him?" The emperor maintained his silence, dissembled his indignation, and questioned his interpreter concerning the meaning of the words, which he partly suspected from the universal language of gesture and countenance. Before the departure of the pilgrims, he endeavoured to learn the name and condition of the audacious baron. "I am a Frenchman," replied Robert, "of the purest and most ancient nobility of my country. All that I know is, that there is a church in my neighbourhood;<sup>64</sup> the resort of those who are desirous of approving their valour in single combat. Till an enemy appears, they address their prayers to God and his saints. That church I have frequently visited, but never have I found an antagonist who dared to accept my defiance." Alexius dismissed the challenger with some prudent advice for his conduct in the Turkish warfare; and history repeats with pleasure this lively example of the manners of his age and country.

The conquest of Asia was undertaken and achieved by Alexander, <sup>their review, and numbers, A. D. 1097, May,</sup> with thirty-five thousand Macedonians and Greeks;<sup>65</sup> and his best hope was in the strength and discipline of his phalanx of infantry. The principal force of the crusaders consisted in their cavalry; and when that force was mustered in the plains of Bithynia, the knights and their martial attendants on horseback amounted to one hundred thousand fighting men, completely armed with the helmet and coat of mail. The value of these soldiers deserved a strict and authentic account; and the flower of European chivalry might furnish, in a first effort, this formidable body of heavy horse. A part of the infantry might be enrolled for the service of scouts, pioneers, and archers; but the promiscuous crowd were lost in their own disorder; and we depend not on the eyes or knowledge, but on the belief and fancy, of a chaplain of count Baldwin,<sup>66</sup> in the estimate of six hundred thousand pilgrims able to bear arms, besides the priests and monks, the women and children, of the Latin camp. The reader starts; and before he is recovered from his surprise. I shall add, on the same testimony, that if all who took the cross had accomplished their vow, above six millions would have migrated from Europe to Asia. Under this oppression of faith, I derive some relief from a more sagacious and thinking writer,<sup>67</sup> who, after the same review of the cavalry, accuses the credulity of the priest of Chartres, and even doubts whether the Cisalpine regions (in the geography of a Frenchman) were sufficient to produce and pour forth such incredible multitudes. The coolest scepticism will remember, that of these religious volunteers great numbers never beheld Constantinople and Nice. Of enthusiasm the influence is irregular and transient: many were detained at home by reason or cowardice, by poverty or weakness; and many were repulsed by the obstacles of the

<sup>61</sup> Senat vetus regnandi, fides in amore, odia non facere. Tacit. vi. 44.

<sup>62</sup> The proud historians of the crusades do not stumble over this humiliating step. Yet, one of the horse-knights to salute the emperor as he sat motionless on his throne, it is said, that this knight had been wounded either in his feet or knees. It is only singular, that Anna Comnena should not have amply supplied the silence or ambiguity of the Latins. The abatement of their princes would have added a new chapter to the Comnenale Jule Brummer.

<sup>63</sup> He called himself le comte de Paris (Alexis, l. x. p. 501). What a title of nobility of the 14th century, if any one could now prove his inheritance! Anna Comnena, with visible pleasure, that the swelling barbarian, Araxas regem, was killed, of wounded, etc. (p. 502). His tomb in the kyrie of Barbarum (l. x. p. 517). This circumstance may justify the suspicion of DuRoi (Not. p. 562), that he was no other than Robert of Paris, of the most most peculiar, styled the Duke of France (Cité de Paris).

<sup>64</sup> With the same penetration, DuRoi discovers his church to be that of St. Martin, or, more properly, of St. Martin, which still is not a new name. puelles qui ad in morum ipsi (his loab) perantur in vestis redit, ut de Burgundis et Italia talis nec esset confugit, ut r adum. duin. Southern MSS. Epist. 139.

<sup>65</sup> There is some diversity on the numbers of his army; but no authority can be compared with that of Ptolemy, who states it at five thousand horse and thirty thousand foot (see Usher's Annals, p. 132).

<sup>66</sup> Fulcher Carnotensis, p. 587. He enumerates nineteen nations of the crusaders, and adds, et alii multi, but does not clearly specify the names of the nations, Galli, Itali and Arabi.

<sup>67</sup> The deserters. position implies an immense multitude. By Urban II in the fervour of his zeal, it is only rated at 500,000 pilgrims (Epist. xvi. Concil. tom. xii. p. 731).

duke of Normandy was recalled from the sea-shore by the censures of the church; Hugh the Great, though he led the vanguard of the battle, embraced an ambiguous opportunity of returning to France; and Stephen count of Chartres basely deserted the standard which he bore, and the council in which he presided. The soldiers were discouraged by the flight of William viscount of Melun, surnamed the Carpenter, from the weighty strokes of his axe; and the saints were scandalised by the fall of Peter the Hermit, who, after arming Europe against Asia, attempted to escape from the penance of a necessary fast. Of the multitude of recreant warriors, the names (says an historian) are blotted from the book of life; and the opprobrious epithet of the rope-dancers was applied to the deserters who dropped in the night from the walls of Antioch. The emperor Alexius, who seemed to advance to the succour of the Latins, was dismayed by the assurance of their hopeless condition. They expected their fate in silent despair; oaths and punishments were tried without effect; and to rouse the soldiers to the defence of the walls, it was found necessary to set fire to their quarters.

For their salvation and victory, <sup>Legend of the Holy Lance.</sup> they were indebted to the same fanaticism which had led them to the brink of ruin. In such a cause, and in such an army, visions, prophecies, and miracles, were frequent and familiar. In the distress of Antioch, they were repeated with unusual energy and success: St. Ambrose had assured a pious ecclesiastic, that two years of trial must precede the season of deliverance and grace; the deserters were stopped by the presence and reproaches of Christ himself; the dead had promised to arise and combat with their brethren; the Virgin had obtained the pardon of their sins; and their confidence was revived by a visible sign, the seasonable and splendid discovery of the HOLY LANCE. The policy of their chiefs has on this occasion been admired, and might surely be excused; but a pious fraud is seldom produced by the cool conspiracy of many persons: and a voluntary impostor might depend on the support of the wise and the credulity of the people. Of the diocese of Marseilles, there was a priest of low cunning and loose manners, and his name was Peter Bartholomy. He presented himself at the door of the council-chamber, to disclose an apparition of St. Andrew, which had been thrice reiterated in his sleep, with a dreadful menace, if he presumed to suppress the commands of Heaven. "At Antioch," said the apostle, "in the church of my brother St. Peter, near the high altar, is concealed the steel head of the Lance that pierced the side of our Redeemer. In three days, that instrument of eternal, and now of temporal, salvation, will be manifested to his disciples. Search and ye shall find. bear it aloft in battle; and that mystic weapon shall pene"trate the souls of the miscreants." The pope's legate, the bishop of Puy, affected to listen with coldness and distrust; but the revelation was eagerly accepted by count Raymond, whom his faithful subject, in the name of the apostle, had chosen for the guardian of the holy lance. The experiment was resolved; and on the third day, after a due preparation of prayer and fasting, the priest of Marseilles introduced twelve trusty spectators, among whom were the count and his chaplain; and the church-doors were barred against the impetuous multitude. The ground was opened in the appointed place; but the workmen, who relieved each other, dug to the depth of twelve feet without discovering the object of their search. In the evening, when count Raymond had withdrawn to his post, and the weary assistants began to murmur, Bartholomy, in his shirt, and without his shoes, boldly descended into the pit; the darkness of the hour and of the place enabled him to secrete and deposit the head of a Saracen lance; and the first sound, the first gleam, of the steel was saluted with a devout rapture. The holy lance was drawn from its recess, wrapped in a veil of silk and gold, and exposed to the veneration of the crusaders; their anxious suspense burst forth in a general shout of joy and hope, and the desponding troops were again inflamed with the enthusiasm of valour. Whatever had been the arts, and whatever might be the sentiments of the chiefs, they skillfully improved this fortunate revolution by every aid that discipline and devotion could afford. The soldiers were dismissed to their quarters, with an injunction to fortify their minds and bodies for the approaching conflict, freely to bestow their last pittance on themselves and their horses, and to expect with the dawn of day the signal of victory. On the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul, the gates of Antioch were thrown open; a martial psalm, "Let the Lord arise, and let his enemies be scattered!" was chanted by a procession of priests and monks; the battle array was marshalled in twelve divisions, in honour of the twelve apostles; and the holy lance, in the absence of Raymond, was intrusted to the hands of his chaplain. The influence of this relic or trophy was felt by the servants, and perhaps by the enemies, of Christ;<sup>98</sup> and its potent energy was heightened by an accident, a stratagem, or a rumour, of a miraculous complexion. Three knights in white garments, and resplendent arms, <sup>CECILIUS WATERTON.</sup> either issued, or seemed to issue, from the hills, the voice of Adhemar, the pope's legate, proclaimed them as the martyrs St. George, St. Theodore, and St. Maurice; the tumult of battle allowed no time for doubt or scrutiny; and the welcome apparition dazzled the eyes or the imagination of a frantic army. In the season of danger and triumph, the revelation of Bartholomy of Marseilles was unanimously asserted; but as soon as the temporary service was accomplished, the personal dignity and liberal aims which the count of Thoulouse derived from the custody of the holy lance, provoked the envy, and awakened the reason, of his rivals. A Norman clerk presumed to sift, with a philosophic spirit, the truth of the legend, the circumstances of the discovery, and the character of the prophet; and the pious Bohemond ascribed their deliverance to the merits and intercession of Christ alone. For a while, the Provincials defended their national palladium with clamours and arms: and new visions condemned to death and hell the profane sceptics, who presumed to scrutinise the truth and merit of the discovery. The prevalence of incredulity compelled the author to submit his life and veracity to the judgment of God. A pile of dry faggots, four feet high, and fourteen long, was erected in the midst of the camp; the flames burnt fiercely to the elevation of thirty cubits; and a narrow path of twelve inches was left for the perilous trial. The unfortunate priest of Marsilles traversed the fire with dexterity and speed; but his thighs and belly were scorched by the intense heat; he expired the next day; and the logic of believing minds will pay some regard to his dying protestations of innocence and truth. Some efforts were made by the Provincials to substitute a cross, a ring, or a tabernacle, in the place of the holy lance, which soon vanished in contempt and oblivion.<sup>100</sup> Yet the revelation of Antioch is gravely asserted by succeeding historians; and such is the progress of credulity, that miracles, most doubtful on the spot and at the moment, will be received with implicit faith at a convenient distance of time and space.

<sup>98</sup> See the progress of the crusade, the retreat of Alexius, the victory of Antioch, and the conquest of Jerusalem, in the Voyage, l. i. c. 17. 327. Anna was so prone to exaggeration, that she magnified the exploits of the Latins.

<sup>99</sup> The Mahometan Aboulmahasen (apud de Guignes, tom. ii.

part. i. p. 57) is more correct in his account of the holy lance than the Christian. Amalric, count and viceroy of the Greek empire, surrounded with a crowd of the cross-bearers, p. 324, the Jacobite patriarch, with St. Peter's staff, p. 242.

The state of the Turks and caliph of Egypt. The prudence or fortune of the Franks had delayed their invasion till the decline of the Turkish empire.<sup>101</sup> Under the manly government of the three first sultans, the kingdoms of Asia were united in peace and justice: and the innumerable armies which they led in person were equal in courage, and superior in discipline, to the barbarians of the West. But at the time of the crusades, the influence of Malek Shaw was disputed by his four sons; their private ambition was sensible of the public danger; and, in the vicissitudes of civil faction, the royal vessels were ignorant, or regardless, of the true object of their allegiance. The twenty-eight emirs who marched with the standard of Kalebaga, were his rivals or enemies; four hundred thousand were drawn from the towns and tents of Mesopotamia and Syria; and the Turkish veterans were employed or consumed in the civil wars beyond the Tigris. The caliph of Egypt embraced this opportunity of weakness and discord, to recover his ancient possessions; and his sultan Aphlad besieged Jerusalem and Tyre, expelled the children of Ortok, and restored in Palestine the civil and ecclesiastical authority of the Fatimites.<sup>102</sup> They heard with astonishment of the vast armies of Christians that had passed from Europe to Asia, and rejoiced in the sieges and battles which broke the power of the Turks, the adversaries of their sect and monarchy. But the same Christians were the enemies of the prophet; and from the overthrow of Nice and Antioch, the motive of their enterprise, which was gradually understood, would urge them forwards to the banks of the Jordan, or perhaps of the Nile. An intercourse of epistles and embassies, which rose and fell with the events of war, was maintained between the throne of Cairo and the camp of the Latins; and their adverse pride was the result of ignorance and enthusiasm. The ministers of Egypt declared in an haughty, or in insinuated in a milder, tone, that their sovereign, the true and lawful commander of the faithful, had rescued Jerusalem from the Turkish yoke; and that the pilgrims, if they would divide their numbers, and lay aside their arms, should find a safe and hospitable reception at the sepulchre of Jesus. In the belief of their lost condition, the caliph Mostali despised their arms and imprisoned their deputies; the conquest and victory of Antioch prompted him to solicit those formidable champions with gifts of horses and silk robes, of vases, and purses of gold and silver; and in his estimate of their merit or power, the first place was assigned to Bohemond, and the second to Godfrey. In either fortune the answer of the crusaders was firm and uniform; they disdained to enquire into the private claims or possessions of the followers of Mahomet: whatsoever was his name or nation, the usurper of Jerusalem was their enemy; and instead of prescribing the mode and terms of their pilgrimage, it was only by a timely surrender of the city and province, their sacred right, that he could deserve their alliance, or deprecate their impending and irresistible attack.<sup>103</sup>

Yet this attack, when they were within the view and reach of their glorious prize, was suspended above ten months after the defeat of Kalebaga. The zeal and courage of the crusaders were chilled in the moment of victory; and, instead of marching to improve the consternation, they hastily dispersed to enjoy the luxury of Syria. The causes of this strange delay may be traced in the want of strength and subordination. In the painful and various service of Antioch, the cavalry was annihilated; many thousands of every rank had been lost by famine, sickness, and desertion; the same abuse of plenty had been productive of a third famine; and the alternative of intemperance and distress, had generated a pestilence, which swept away above fifty thousand of the pilgrims. Few were able to command, and none were willing to obey: the

<sup>100</sup> The antagonists who express the most intimate knowledge and the strongest conviction of the sacred and of the profane, are R. de Montecassino, and R. de Maritima; the one attributed the count of Thoulouse, the other to the Norman prince Fulcherus of Chartres, president to the council of Jerusalem, and author of the Itinerarium. The first is a Frenchman, the second a Norman. The rest of the herd are loud and strong.

<sup>101</sup> See M. de Guignes (tom. ii. part. ii. p. 225 &c.), and the articles of Isa. Karak, Mohammed, Sungur, in D'Hierbois.

<sup>102</sup> The same caliph succeeded Jerusalem and Tyre, A.D. 1099.

<sup>103</sup> See the transactions between the caliph of Egypt and the crusaders, in W. of Tyre, lib. vi. c. 21. lib. vii. c. 10. and Albert Aquevius de vita c. 10. who are more sensible of their importance, than the contemporary writers.

domestic feuds, which had been stifled by common fear, were again renewed in acts, or at least in sentiments, of hostility; the fortune of Baldwin and Bohemond excited the envy of their companions; the bravest knights were enlisted for the defence of their new principalities; and count Raymond exhausted his troops and treasures in an idle expedition into the heart of Syria. The winter was consumed in discord and disorder; a sense of honour and religion was rekindled in the spring; and the private soldiers, less susceptible of ambition and jealousy, awakened with

Their march to Jerusalem,
A. D. 1099,
May 13—
June 6.

angry clamours the indolence of their chiefs. In the month of May, the reliefs of this mighty host proceeded from Antioch to Laodicea; about forty thousand Latins, of whom no more than fifteen hundred horse, and twenty thousand foot, were capable of immediate service. Their easy march was continued between Mount Libanus and the sea-shore; their wants were liberally supplied by the coasting traders of Genoa and Pisa; and they drew large contributions from the emirs of Tripoli, Tyre, Sidon, Acre, and Caesarea, who granted a free passage, and promised to follow the example of Jerusalem. From Caesarea they advanced into the midland country; their clerks recognised the sacred geography of Lydda, Ramla, Emaus, and Bethlem, and as soon as they descried the holy city, the crusaders forgot their toils and claimed their reward.<sup>104</sup>

Siege and conquest of Jerusalem,
A. D. 1099,
June 7—
July 13.

Jerusalem has derived some reputation from the number and importance of her memorable sieges. It was not till after a long and obstinate contest that Babylon and Rome could prevail against the obstinacy of the people, the craggy ground that might supersede the necessity of fortifications, and the walls and towers that would have fortified the most accessible plain.<sup>105</sup> These obstacles were diminished in the age of the crusades. The bulwarks had been completely destroyed and imperfectly restored; the Jews, their nation, and worship, were for ever banished; but nature is less changeable than man, and the site of Jerusalem, though somewhat softened and somewhat removed, was still strong against the assaults of an enemy. By the experience of a recent siege, and a three years' possession, the Saracens of Egypt had been taught to discern, and in some degree to remedy, the defects of a place, which religion as well as honour forbade them to resign. Aladin, or Istikhar, the caliph's lieutenant, was intrusted with the defence: his policy strove to restrain the native Christians by the dread of their own ruin and that of the holy sepulchre; to animate the Moslems by the assurance of temporal and eternal rewards. His garrison is said to have consisted of forty thousand Turks and Arabians; and if he could muster twenty thousand of the inhabitants, it must be confessed that the besieged were more numerous than the besieging army.<sup>106</sup> Had the diminished strength and numbers of the Latins allowed them to grasp the whole circumference of four thousand yards (about two English miles and an half),<sup>107</sup> to what useful purpose should they have descended into the valley of Ben Hinnon and torrent of Cedron,<sup>108</sup> or approached the precipices of the south and east, from whence they had nothing either to hope or fear? Their siege was more reasonably directed against the northern and western sides of the city. Godfrey of Bouillon erected his standard on the first swell of Mount Calvary: to the left, as far as St. Stephen's gate, the line of attack was continued by Tancred and the two Roberts; and count Raymond established his quarters from the citadel to the foot of Mount Zion, which was no longer included within the precincts of the city. On the fifth day, the crusaders made a general assault, in the fanatic hope of battering down the walls without engines, and of scaling them without ladders. By the dint of brutal force, they burst the first barrier, but they were driven back with shame and slaughter to the camp, the influence of vision and prophecy was cadenced by the too frequent abuse of those pious stratagems; and time and labour were found to be the only means of victory. The time of the siege was indeed fulfilled in forty days, but they were forty days of calamity and anguish. A repetition of the old complaint of famine may be imputed in some degree to the voracious or disorderly appetite of the Franks; but the stony soil of Jerusalem is almost destitute of water; the scanty springs and hasty torrents were dry in the summer season; nor was the thirst of the besiegers relieved, as in the city, by the artificial supply of cisterns and aqueducts. The circumjacent country is equally destitute of trees for the uses of shade or building: but some large beams were discovered in a cave by the crusaders: a wood near Sichem, the enchanted grove of Tasso,<sup>109</sup> was cut down: the necessary timber was transported to the camp by the vigour and dexterity of Tancred; and the engines were framed by some Genoese artists, who had fortunately landed in the harbour of Jaffa. Two moveable turrets were constructed at the expense, and in the stations, of the duke of Lorraine and the count of Thoulouse, and rolled forwards with devout labour, not to the most accessible, but to the most neglected, parts of the fortification. Raymond's tower was re-

<sup>104</sup> The greater part of the narrative of the Franks' march, and most accurately traced, in Maundrell's Journal (see Appendix A, p. 163). The Journal of 1757, p. 105, contains a more complete and correct account of this event. D'Anville's Mem. sur les croisades, tom. i. p. 37.

<sup>105</sup> See the masterly description of Tacitus in the Annals, lib. 13, who supposes, that the Jewish high-priest held out for a perpetual state of hostility against the rest of mankind.

<sup>106</sup> The lively scepticism of Voltaire is favoured with sense and erudition by the French author of the Essai sur les moeurs, &c. p. 286—288, who observes, that, according to the Arabians, the number of inhabitants of Jerusalem must have exceeded 100,000, that in the case of Titus, Josephus numbers 1,700,000 Jews, that if they were settled by Tacitus himself at 100,000, and that the largest defect from that history, more can justify, will still leave them more numerous than the Roman army.

<sup>107</sup> Maundrell, who diligently perambulated the walls, found a circumference of 1070 paces; but Fock has calculated 1070, 1100, from an authentic plan. D'Anville computes the circumference only six miles, of 1020 French paces, p. 37. These observations are valuable, for the topography of Jerusalem, see Relat. d'Aladin, tom. i. p. 522—523.

<sup>108</sup> Jerusalem was possessed only of the torrent of Cedron, from an annual flood of the winter, and of brooks of snow. Reland, tom. i. p. 107, 108. Both strangers and natives are provided with the water of the Cedron, and in the case of war, water is carried to the city. The Christians maintain a perpetual fire, and aqueduct, and cisterns for the water. The aqueduct is conveyed from the Tyber, Tekoa, or Ephraim, which is likewise mentioned by Bebedan, in the Voy. de Sicile, p. 108.

<sup>109</sup> The Genius of the Literary, tom. vi. It is pleasant to observe that the Genius has copied and embellished the most delicate of the Genius.

duced to ashes by the fire of the besieged, but his colleague was more vigilant and successful; the enemies were driven by his archers from the rampart; the drawbridge was let down; and on a Friday at three in the afternoon, the day and hour of the Passion, Godfrey of Bouillon stood victorious on the walls of Jerusalem. His example was followed on every side by the emulation of valour; and about four hundred and sixty years after the conquest of Omar, the holy city was rescued from the Mahometan yoke. In the pillage of public and private wealth, the adventurers had agreed to respect the exclusive property of the first occupant; and the spoils of the great mosque, seventy lamps and massy vases of gold and silver, rewarded the diligence, and displayed the generosity, of Tancred. A bloody sacrifice was offered by his mistaken votaries to the God of the Christians: resistance might provoke, but neither age nor sex could mollify, their implacable rage; they indulged themselves three days in a promiscuous massacre; <sup>110</sup> and the infection of the dead bodies produced an epidemical disease. After seventy thousand Moslems had been put to the sword, and the harmless Jews had been burnt in their synagogue, they could still reserve a multitude of captives, whom interest or lassitude persuaded them to spare. Of these savage heroes of the cross, Tancred alone betrayed some sentiments of compassion; yet we may praise the more selfish lenity of Raymond, who granted a capitulation and safe-conduct to the garrison of the citadel.<sup>111</sup> The holy sepulchre was now free; and the bloody victors prepared to accomplish their vow. Bare-headed and barefoot, with contrite hearts, and in an humble posture, they ascended the hill of Calvary, amidst the loud anthems of the clergy; kissed the stone which had covered the Saviour of the world; and bedewed with tears of joy and penitence the monument of their redemption. This union of the fiercest and most tender passions has been variously considered by two philosophers: by the one,<sup>112</sup> as easy and natural; by the other,<sup>113</sup> as absurd and incredible. Perhaps it is too rigorously applied to the same persons and the same hour—the example of the virtuous Godfrey awakened the piety of his companions; while they elained their bodies, they purified their minds; nor shall I believe that the most ardent in slaughter and rapine were the foremost in the procession to the holy sepulchre.

Eight days after this memorable event, which pope Urban did not live to hear, the Latin chiefs proceeded to the election of a king, to guard and govern their conquests in Palestine. Hugh the Great, and Stephen of Chartres, had retired with some loss of reputation, which they strove to regain by a second crusade and an honourable death. Baldwin was established at Edessa, and Bohemond at Antioch; and two Roberts, the duke of Normandy<sup>114</sup> and the count of Flanders, preferred their fair inheritance in the West to a doubtful competition or a barren sceptre. The jealousy and ambition of Raymond were condemned by his own followers, and the free, the just, the unanimous voice of the army, proclaimed Godfrey of Bouillon the first and most worthy of the champions of Christendom. His magnanimity accepted a trust as full of danger as of glory; but in a city where his Saviour had been crowned with thorns, the devout pilgrim, rejected the name and ensigns of royalty; and the founder of the kingdom of Jerusalem contented himself with the modest title of Defender and Baron of the Holy Sepulchre. His government of a single year,<sup>115</sup> too short for the public happiness, was interrupted in the first fortnight by a summons to the field, by the approach of the vizir or sultan of Egypt, who had been too slow to prevent, but who was impatient to avenge, the loss of Jerusalem. His total overthrow in the battle of Ascalon sealed the establishment of the Latins in Syria, and signalled the valour of the French princes, who in this action bade a long farewell to the holy wars. Some glory might be derived from the prodigious inequality of numbers, though I shall not count the myriads of horse and foot on the side of the Fatimites; but, except three thousand Ethiopians or blacks, who were armed with flails or scourges of iron, the barbarians of the South fled on the first onset, and afforded a pleasing comparison between the active valour of the Turks and the sloth and effeminacy of the natives of Egypt. After suspending before the holy sepulchre the sword and standard of the sultan, the new king (he deserves the title) embraced his departing companions, and could retain only with the gallant Tancred three hundred knights, and two thousand foot-soldiers, for the defence of Palestine. His sovereignty was soon attacked by a new enemy, the only one against whom Godfrey was a coward. Adhemar, bishop of Puy, who excelled both in council and action, had been swept away in the last plague of Antioch: the remaining ecclesiastics preserved only the pride and avarice of their character; and their seditious clamours had required that the choice of a bishop should precede that of a king. The revenue and jurisdiction of the lawful patriarch were usurped by the Latin clergy: the exclusion of the Greeks and Syrians was justified by the reproach of heresy or schism;<sup>116</sup> and, under the iron yoke of their deliverers, the Oriental Christians regretted the tolerating go-

Battle of Ascalon.
A.D. 1099,
August 12.

Election and entry of Godfrey of Bouillon.
A.D. 1099,
July 25—
A.D. 1100,
July 18.

<sup>110</sup> B-side the Latins, who are not accused of the massacre, see Elmasni (Hist. Saracen. p. 267), Abulpharag. (Hist. nat. p. 413), and M. de Guignes (Mem. p. 110), p. 110, from Abulpharag. Hist. nat. p. 413.

<sup>111</sup> The old tower of the city, in the middle ages, was named Castellum Primum, from the p. 110, from Abulpharag. Hist. nat. p. 413. The ruins of the Turkish city, a.d. 1099, were a prospect of the head sea, Judea, and Arabia Deserta, p. 110, 25. It was likewise called the Tower of David, p. 110, 25, 26.

<sup>112</sup> Hume, in his History of England, vol. i. p. 511, 512, calls it easy.

<sup>113</sup> Voltaire, in his Essai sur l'Histoire Générale, tom. ii. c. 51. p. 345, 346.

<sup>114</sup> The English agents to Robert of Normandy, and the French agents to Raymond of Toulouse, were both of the house of the count of Flanders, but the honest voice of the count of Flanders, who died at the siege of Tripoli, which was possessed by his descendants.

<sup>115</sup> See the election, the battle of Ascalon, &c. in William of Tyre, l. iv. c. 1-12, and in the conclusion of the Latin historians of the first crusade.

<sup>116</sup> Renaudot, Hist. Patriarch Alex. p. 479.

verment of the Arabian caliphs. Daimbert, archbishop of Pisa, had long been trained in the secret policy of Rome : he brought a fleet of his countrymen to the succour of the Holy Land, and was installed, without a competitor, the spiritual and temporal head of the church. The new patriarch <sup>117</sup> immediately grasped the sceptre which had been acquired by the toil and blood of the victorious pilgrims ; and both Godfrey and Bohemond submitted to receive at his hands the investiture of their fensual possessions. Nor was this sufficient ; Daimbert claimed the immediate property of Jerusalem and Jaffa : instead of a firm and generous refusal, the hero negotiated with the priest ; a quarter of either city was ceded to the church ; and the modest bishop was satisfied with an eventual reversion of the rest, on the death of Godfrey without children, or on the future acquisition of a new seat at Cairo or Damascus.

Without this indulgence, the conqueror would have almost been stripped of his infant kingdom, which consisted only of Jerusalem and Jaffa, with about twenty villages and towns of the adjacent country.<sup>118</sup> Within this narrow verge, the Mahometans were still lodged in some impregnable castles; and the husbandman, the trader, and the pilgrim, were exposed to daily and domestic hostility. By the arms of Godfrey himself, and of the two Baldwins, his brother and cousin, who succeeded to the throne, the Latins breathed with more ease and safety; and at length they equalled, in the extent of their dominions, though not in the millions of their subjects, the ancient princes of Judah and Israel.<sup>119</sup> After the reduction of the maritime cities of Laodicea, Tripoli, Tyre, and Ascalon,<sup>120</sup> which were powerfully assisted by the fleets of Venice, Genoa, and Pisa, and even of Flanders and Norway,<sup>121</sup> the range of sea-coast from Scanderoon to the borders of Egypt was possessed by the Christian pilgrims. If the prince of Antioch disclaimed his supremacy, the counts of Edessa and Tripoli owned themselves the vassals of the king of Jerusalem: the Latins reigned beyond the Euphrates; and the four cities of Hems, Hamah, Damascus, and Aleppo, were the only

117 See the claims of the patriarch Damiert, in Wil turn of Tyre (1 ix c. 15-18, x 4, 7<sup>9</sup>), who asserts with invariable candour the independence of the conquerors and king of Jerusalem.

118 Waldern, Tyr. I, x, 19. The Historia Hieronymiana of Jacobus a Vitruvio (1140-51-56), and the Secreta Historiarum of Marinus Sacerdotis (fl. ca. p. 114), describe the state and conquests of the Caran kingdom of Jerusalem.

[illegible]

<sup>120</sup> These songs are related, each in its proper place, in the great history of William of Wyke, from the birth in the south-west, and more briefly told by Herrardus Theoricus de Aquitane Terra Sancte c. 50, pp. 7-22, 70-90. Some details fall in with material in the Chronicle of Fisi, Grou, and Venus, in the eighth, ninth, and tenth parts of Mur too.

1422. Bencelator, apud de Guines, Hist. des Hôis, tom. i. part. i. p. 156, f. 1. A. B. 157. He is said to have been a champion of King Henry the First, and to have been killed in the battle of Brunanburh, in 1041. He is said to have been a champion of King Henry the First, and to have been killed in the battle of Brunanburh, in 1041. He is said to have been a champion of King Henry the First, and to have been killed in the battle of Brunanburh, in 1041.

relics of the Mahometan conquests in Syria.<sup>122</sup> The laws and language, the manners and titles, of the French nation and Latin church, were introduced into these transmarine colonies. According to the feudal jurisprudence, the principal states and subordinate baronies descended in the line of male and female succession,<sup>123</sup> but the children of the first conquerors,<sup>124</sup> a motley and degenerate race, were dissolved by the luxury of the climate; the arrival of new crusaders from Europe was a doubtful hope and a casual event. The service of the feudal tenures<sup>125</sup> was performed by six hundred and sixty six knights, who might expect the aid of two hundred more under the banner of the count of Tripoli; and each knight was attended to the field by four squires or archers on horseback,<sup>126</sup> Five thousand and seventy-five serjeants, most probably foot-soldiers, were supplied by the churches and cities; and the whole legal militia of the kingdom could not exceed eleven thousand men, a slender defence against the surrounding myriads of Saracens and Turks.<sup>127</sup> But the firmest bulwark of Jerusalem was founded on the knights of the hospital of St. John,<sup>128</sup> and of the temple of Solomon;<sup>129</sup> on the strange association of a monastic and military life, which fanaticism might suggest, but which policy must approve. The flower of the nobility of Europe aspired to wear the cross, and to profess the vows, of these respectable orders; their spirit and discipline were immortal; and the speedy donation of twenty-eight thousand farms, or manors,<sup>130</sup> enabled them to support a regular force of cavalry and infantry for the defence of Palestine. The austerity of the convent soon evaporated in the exercise of arms; the world was scandalised by the pride, avarice, and corruption of these Christian soldiers; their claims of immunity and jurisdiction disturbed the harmony of the church and state; and the public peace was endangered by their jealous emulation. But in their most dis-solute period, the knights of the hospital and temple maintained their fearlessness and fanatic character: they neglected to live, but they were prepared to die, in the service of Christ; and the spirit of chivalry, the parent and offspring of the crusades, has been transplanted

124 They were called by derivation Poullains, Pullini, and their name never pronounced without content of (but again, gloss I am not v. p. 533) and observations on Jonville, p. 81, 82, Jacob a Vienne, Hist. Haroué, 1. 1. c. 47, 72, and Sirey, 1. 1. p. 101, c. 2, p. 124. The name is also found at Terre-Sainte . . . habitation in 1811, in the name of the place . . . in the name of the place, and in the name of the place.

125 This parchment is extracted from the Assises de Jerusalem c. 1141-1161 (Summit 1141 p. 111, c. 1 p. 171) reckons only 618 knights, and 1375 fideiwers.

126. The num totid. and the num totid. ascertain the service of the three great heroes at Lou-kung-tsu-chi, and the text of the Yü-wei, which extends the number to 300, can only be justified by this supposition.

125. Yet on great evening (1895, 1896, 1897) the barons brought a volume of Chalcididae (mostly Chalcididae) in a volume of Chalcididae.

A. B. 1909, No. 11, 151. The assured the profession of arms

124 See St. Lawrence and St. Norbert Monks' Temple, composed

The Mother Pine, Pin. mitis, p. 344. He agrees to the description of 1899, but the leaf is "rather more" and of much higher proportion. However, his name is different in the first than in the French edition. Alnus as a lordship, manor, a dwelling.

evidence (according to the supposition of Montesquieu);<sup>119</sup> but in every case the right to offer battle was founded on the right to pursue by arms the redress of an injury; and the judicial combat was fought on the same principle, and with the same spirit, as a private duel. Champions were only allowed to women, and to men maimed or past the age of sixty. The consequence of a defeat was death to the person accused, or to the champion or witness, as well as to the accuser himself; but in civil cases, the defendant was punished with infamy and the loss of his suit, while his witness and champion suffered an ignominious death. In many cases it was in the option of the judge to award or to refuse the combat: but two are specified, in which it was the inevitable result of the challenge; if a faithful vassal gave the lie to his compeer, who unjustly claimed any portion of their lord's dues; or if an unsuccessful suitor presumed to impeach the judgment and veracity of the court. He might impeach them, but the terms were severe and perilous: in the same day he successively fought all the members of the tribunal, even those who had been absent: a single defeat was followed by death and infamy; and where none could hope for victory, it is highly probable that none would adventure the trial. In the Assise of Jerusalem, the legal subtlety of the count of Jaffa is more laudably employed to elude, than to facilitate, the judicial combat, which he derives from a principle of honour rather than of superstition.<sup>120</sup>

Among the causes which enfranchised the plebeians from the yoke of feudal tyranny, the institution of cities and corporations is one of the most powerful; and if those of Palestine are coeval with the first crusade, they may be ranked with the most ancient of the Latin world. Many of the pilgrims had escaped from their lords under the banner of the cross; and it was the policy of the French princes to tempt their stay by the assurance of the rights and privileges of freemen. It is expressly declared in the Assise of Jerusalem, that after instituting, for his knights and barons, the court of peers, in which he presided himself, Godfrey of Bouillon established a second tribunal, in which his person was represented by his viscount. The jurisdiction of this inferior court extended over the burghesses of the kingdom; and it was composed of a select number of the most discreet and worthy citizens, who were sworn to judge, according to the laws, of the actions and fortunes of their equals.<sup>11</sup> In the conquest and settlement of new cities, the example of Jeru-salern was initiated by the kings and their great vassals; and above thirty similar corporations were founded before the loss of the Holy Land. Another class of subjects, the Syrians,<sup>142</sup> or Oriental Christians, were oppressed by the zeal of the clergy, and protected by the toleration of the state. Godfrey listened to their reasonable prayer, that they might be judged by their own national laws. A third court was instituted for their use, of limited and domestic jurisdiction. The sworn members were Syrians, in blood, language, and religion; but the office of the president (in Arabic, of the raia) was sometimes exercised by the viscount of the city. At an immeasurable distance below the nobles, the burgesses, and the strangers, the Assise of Jerusalem condescends to mention the villains and slaves, the peasants of the land and the captives of war, who were almost equally considered as the objects of property. The relief or protection of these unhappy men was not esteemed worthy of the care of the legislator; but he diligently provides for the recovery, though not indeed for the punishment, of the fugitives. Like hounds, or hawks, who had strayed from the lawful owner, they might be lost and claimed: the slave and falcon were of the same value; but three slaves, or twelve oxen, were accumulated to equal the price of the war-horse; and a sum of three hundred pieces of gold was fixed, in the age of chivalry, as the equivalent of the more noble animal.<sup>143</sup>

CLAP. LIN.

Præface of the Greek Empire. — Numbers, Progress, and Extent of the Second and Third Crusades. — St. Bernard. — Reign of Saladin in Egypt and Syria. — His Conquest of Jerusalem. — Naval Crusades. — Richard the First of England. — Pope Innocent the Third; and the Fourth and Fifth Crusades. — The Emperor Frederic the Second. — Louis the Ninth of France, and the two last Crusades. — Expulsion of the Latins or Franks by the Mamelukes.

Is a style less grave than that of history, I should perhaps compare the emperor Alexis<sup>1</sup> to the jackall, who is said to follow the steps, and to devour the carcases, of the lion. Whatever had been his fears and toils in the passage of the first campaign, they were amply recompensed by the subsequent benefits which he derived from the exploits of the Franks. His dexterity and vigilance secured their first conquest of Nice; and from this

Success of Alexius,
A. D. 1077. 1118

17. See "Fugate's Fox," Exciter. In the fifty years since its publication, this work has been re-read and re-issued, and its story of a people which has existed, is not the least of our debts to the author.

110 For the negligence of this obscure and obsolete newspaper, I am deeply indebted to the friendship of a friend, who, although on inaccurate and disarming posterity has preserved the photographic history of law. By his studies, posterity might be reminded of the merit of the orator and the judge can be protected by his example.

1. The French king, who is considered as the father of the nation in France, did not begin his reign till nine years. A.D. 1871 after losing a battle with Austria, 27 Feb. For a longer and fuller account of the same, see remarks of Dr. Robertson (History of Charles I. 1790, 2nd ed., 100, 101, 102, 103).

112 Every reader conversant with the history of the church will be ready to find in the people of Saragossa, the fragments of a people who were once a nation, who had all adopted the rule of the Apostles and into a nation.

1178, the Assyrian king, Sardanapallus (705-711-713). The plays were created a line as the car 130, in the kingdom of 131. In the same century, the reign of Edward I. I understand, from a... of... to... of... R... of... that the price of... were... in the... of... England.

1. A vector norm  $\|\cdot\|$  is for fathers consists in  $A$  as  $M$  is  $r$ .
 Alex did  $\|x\| = 1 - 1 = 0$  for  $p = 11$ . The same was for Peter and Bill to find  $p = 8$  and  $p = 10$  the sum of four and to  $\|x\| = 11 - 10 = 1$  and  $\|x\| = 11 - 10 = 1$  and  $\|x\| = 11 - 10 = 1$
 $\|x\| = 11 - 10 = 1$

threatening station the Turks were compelled to evacuate the neighbourhood of Constantinople. While the crusaders, with blind valour, advanced into the midland countries of Asia, the crafty Greek improved the favourable occasion when the emirs of the sea-coast were recalled to the standard of the sultan. The Turks were driven from the isles of Rhodes and Chios, the cities of Ephesus and Smyrna, of Sardes, Philadelphia, and Laodicea, were restored to the empire, which Alexius enlarged from the Hellespont to the banks of the Meander, and the rocky shores of Pamphylia. The churches resumed their splendour; the towns were rebuilt and fortified; and the desert country was peopled with colonies of Christians, who were gently removed from the more distant and dangerous frontier. In these paternal cares, we may forgive Alexius, if he forgot the deliverance of the holy sepulchre; but, by the Latins, he was stigmatised with the foul reproach of treason and desertion. They had sworn fidelity and obedience to his throne; but he had promised to assist their enterprise in person, or, at least, with his troops and treasures: his base retreat dissolved their obligations; and the sword, which had been the instrument of their victory, was the pledge and title of their just independence. It does not appear that the emperor attempted to revive his obsolete claims over the kingdom of Jerusalem;<sup>2</sup> but the borders of Cilicia and Syria were more recent in his possession, and more accessible to his arms. The great army of the crusaders was annihilated or dispersed; the principality of Antioch was left without a head, by the surprise and captivity of Bohemond: his ransom had oppressed him with a heavy debt; and his Norman followers were insufficient to repel the hostilities of the Greeks and Turks. In this distress, Bohemond embraced a magnanimous resolution, of leaving the defence of Antioch to his kinsman, the faithful Tancred; of arming the West against the Byzantine empire, and of executing the design which he inherited from the lessons and example of his father Guiscard. His embarkation was clandestine; and if we may credit a tale of the princess Anne, he passed the hostile sea, closely secreted in a coffin.<sup>3</sup> But his reception in France was dignified by the public applause, and his marriage with the king's daughter: his return was glorious, since the bravest spirits of the age enlisted under his veteran command; and he repassed the Hadriatic at the head of five thousand horse and forty thousand foot, assembled from the most remote climates of Europe.<sup>4</sup> The strength of Durazzo and prudence of Alexius, the progress of famine and approach of winter, eluded his ambitious hopes; and the venal confederates were seduced from his standard. A treaty of peace<sup>5</sup> suspended the fears of the Greeks; and they were finally delivered by the death of an adversary, whom neither oaths could bind, nor dangers could appal, nor prosperity could satiate. His children succeeded to the principality of Antioch; but the boundaries were strictly defined, the homage was clearly stipulated, and the cities of Tarsus and Malmitra were restored to the Byzantine emperors. Of the coast of Anatolia, they possessed the entire circuit from Tiebizond to the Syrian gates. The Seljukian dynasty of Roum<sup>6</sup> was separated on all sides from the sea and their Musulman brethren; the power of the sultans was shaken by the victories, and even the defeats, of the Franks; and after the loss of Nice, they removed their throne to Cogni or Iconium, an obscure and inland town above three hundred miles from Constantinople.<sup>7</sup> Instead of trembling for their capital, the Comnenian princes waged an offensive war against the Turks, and the first crusade prevented the fall of the declining empire.

In the twelfth century, three great emigrations marched by land from the West to the relief of Palestine. The soldiers and pilgrims of Lombardy, France, and Germany, were excited by the example and success of the first crusade.<sup>8</sup> Forty-eight years after the deliverance of the holy sepulchre, the emperor, and the French king, Conrad the Third, and Louis the Seventh, undertook the second crusade to support the falling fortunes of the Latins.<sup>9</sup> A grand division of the third crusade was led by the emperor Frederic Barbarossa,<sup>10</sup> who sympathised with his brothers of France and England in the common loss of Jerusalem. These three expeditions may be compared in their resemblance of the greatness of numbers, their passage through the Greek empire, and the nature and event of their Turkish warfare, and a brief parallel may save the repetition of a tedious narrative. However splendid it may seem, a regular story of the crusades would exhibit the perpetual return of the same causes and effects; and the frequent attempts for the defence or recovery of the Holy Land, would appear so many faint and unsuccessful copies of the original.

I. Of the swarms that so closely trod in the footsteps of the first pilgrims, the chiefs were equal in rank, though un-

Their numbers.

<sup>2</sup> The king of Jerusalem submitted, however, to a non-interdependence, and in the title of patriarchate, gave to the church of Bethlehem, this respectable place before that city, the name of the reigning emperor (Bosquet, Dissertation sur Jérusalem, xxvii. p. 719).

<sup>3</sup> Anna Comnena adds, that in our plot of the situation, he was shut up with a dead cock, and indeed, it is to wonder how the barbarian could endure the torment and putrefaction. This absurd tale is unknown to the Latins.

<sup>4</sup> Aro (see, in the Byzantine geography, must mean England, yet we are more credibly informed, that our Henry I. would not suffer him to levy any troops in his kingdom (Bosquet, Not. ad Alexiad. p. 41).

<sup>5</sup> The copy of the treaty (Alexiad. l. xii. p. 406–414) is an original and curious piece, which would require, and might afford, a good map of the province of Antioch.

<sup>6</sup> See in the history of the king of the Bulgars (tom. ii. part. ii.) the history of this people.

<sup>7</sup> The

(trabes,

Expeditions by land the first crusade, A.D. 1099; the second, of Conrad III. and Louis VII., A.D. 1147; the third, of Frederic I., A.D. 1189.

with the ambiguous title of Euphrates (Collartus, tom. ii. p. 121). Yet St. Basil found in that place a multitude (revelation of Jews and Gentiles). Under the corrupt name of Kempis, it is described as a great city, with a river and gardens, three leagues from the mountains, and decorated (it knows not why) with Plato's tomb (Athenæa, edidit. xv. p. 307, see Bosquet, and the Index Geographicus of Scylitzus from Ibn Saad).

<sup>8</sup> For this supplement to the first crusade, see Anna Comnena

namus, l. ii. p. 11–49.

<sup>10</sup> For the third crusade, of Frederic Barbarossa, see Nicetas in Isaac Angeli, l. i. c. 7–9, p. 157; and Nicetas in Isaac Angeli, l. i. c. 7–9, p. 157; and two historians, who preface their tom. ii. p. 106–111, peditores Anacris Fred. I. p. 429–32, edit. Basnage).

equal in fame and merit, to Godfrey of Bouillon and his fellow adventurers. At their head were displayed the banners of the dukes of Burgundy, Bavaria, and Aquitaine; the first a descendant of Hugh Capet, the second a father of the Brunswick line: the archbishop of Milan, a temporal prince, transported, for the benefit of the Turks, the treasures and ornaments of his church and palace; and the veteran crusaders, Hugh the Great, and Stephen of Chartres, returned to consummate their unfinished vow. The huge and disorderly bodies of their followers moved forwards in two columns; and if the first consisted of two hundred and sixty thousand persons, the second might possibly amount to sixty thousand horse, and one hundred thousand foot.<sup>11</sup> The armies of the second crusade might have claimed the conquest of Asia. the nobles of France and Germany were animated by the presence of their sovereigns; and both the rank and personal characters of Conrad and Louis gave a dignity to their cause, and a discipline to their force, which might be vainly expected from the feudatory chiefs. The cavalry of the emperor, and that of the king, was each composed of seventy thousand knights, and their immediate attendants in the field;<sup>12</sup> and if the light-armed troops, the peasant infantry, the women and children, the priests and monks, be rigorously excluded, the full account will scarcely be satisfied with four hundred thousand souls. The West, from Rome to Britain, was called into action; the kings of Poland and Bohemia obeyed the summons of Conrad; and it is affirmed by the Greeks and Latins, that in the passage of a strait or river, the Byzantine agents, after a tale of nine hundred thousand, desisted from the endless and formidable computation.<sup>13</sup> In the third crusade, as the French and English preferred the navigation of the Mediterranean, the host of Frederic Barbarossa was less numerous. Fifteen thousand knights, and as many squires, were the flower of the German chivalry. sixty thousand horse, and one hundred thousand foot, were mustered by the emperor in the plains of Hungary; and after such repetitions, we shall no longer be startled at the six hundred thousand pilgrims, which credulity has ascribed to this last emigration.<sup>14</sup> Such extravagant reckonings prove only the astonishment of contemporaries; but their astonishment most strongly bears testimony to the existence of an enormous though indefinite multitude. The Greeks might applaud their superior knowledge of the arts and stratagems of war, but they confessed the strength and courage of the French cavalry, and the infantry of the Germans,<sup>15</sup> and the strangers are described as an iron race, of gigantic stature, who darted fire from their eyes, and spilt blood like water on the ground. Under the banners of Conrad, a troop of females rode in the attitude and armour of men; and the chief of these Amazons, from her gilt spurs and buskins, obtained the epithet of the Golden-footed Dame.

11. The numbers and character <sup>Page 29 through</sup> of the strangers was an object of the Greek empire, <sup>the Greek empire.</sup> terror to the effeminate Greeks, and the sentiment of fear is nearly allied to that of hatred. This aversion was suspended or softened by the apprehension of the Turkish power; and the invectives of the Latins will not bias our more candid belief, that the emperor Alexius dissuembled their insolence, eluded their hostilities, counselled their rashness, and opened to their ardour the road of pilgrimage and conquest. But when the Turks had been driven from Nice and the sea-coast, when the Byzantine princes no longer dreaded the distant sultans of Cogni, they felt with pure indignation the free and frequent passage of the Western barbarians, who violated the majesty, and endangered the safety, of the empire. The second and third crusades were undertaken under the reign of Manuel Comnenus and Isaac Angelus. Of the former, the passions were always impetuous, and often malevolent; and the natural union of a cowardly and a mischievous temper was exemplified in the latter, who, without merit or mercy, could punish a tyrant, and occupy his throne. It was secretly, and perhaps tacitly, resolved by the prince and people, to destroy, or at least to discourage, the pilgrims, by every species of injury and oppression; and their want of prudence and discipline continually afforded the pretence or the opportunity. The Western monarchs had stipulated a safe passage and fair market in the country of their Christian brethren; the treaty had been ratified by oaths and hostages; and the poor soldier of Frederic's army was furnished with three marks of silver to defray his expenses on the road. But every engagement was violated by treachery and injustice; and the complaints of the Latins are attested by the honest confession of a Greek historian, who has dared to prefer truth to his country.<sup>15</sup> Instead of an hospitable reception, the gates of the cities, both in Europe and Asia, were closely barred against the crusaders; and the scanty pittance of food was let down in baskets from the walls. Experience or foresight might excuse this timid jealousy; but the common duties of humanity prohibited the mixture of chalk, or other poisonous ingredients, in the bread; and should Manuel be acquitted of any foul connivance, he is guilty of coining base money for the purpose of trading with the pilgrims. In every step of their march they were stopped or misled: the governors had private orders to 11 Anne, who states, these later swarms at 1,000 have an average of 400 to 500 more than 800 eggs, and places at their disposal 1000 of 1000000. The Greys have a record of 1000 of the same, but also, and possibly, as of the 1000000.

[illegible]

———— Numerum et pescere quærit;

Melba mollera n. sp.

14. This extract is correct as given by Albert of Seck and Strickland. The number of citations is increased from twelve of Alder to twenty. The names of the editors and Bernard the monk are left as printed. The original writers are absent. The Million comes from the 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 20th, 21st, 22nd, 23rd, 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th, 31st, 32nd, 33rd, 34th, 35th, 36th, 37th, 38th, 39th, 40th, 41st, 42nd, 43rd, 44th, 45th, 46th, 47th, 48th, 49th, 50th, 51st, 52nd, 53rd, 54th, 55th, 56th, 57th, 58th, 59th, 60th, 61st, 62nd, 63rd, 64th, 65th, 66th, 67th, 68th, 69th, 70th, 71st, 72nd, 73rd, 74th, 75th, 76th, 77th, 78th, 79th, 80th, 81st, 82nd, 83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 87th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 93rd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 97th, 98th, 99th, 100th, 101st, 102nd, 103rd, 104th, 105th, 106th, 107th, 108th, 109th, 110th, 111th, 112th, 113th, 114th, 115th, 116th, 117th, 118th, 119th, 120th, 121st, 122nd, 123rd, 124th, 125th, 126th, 127th, 128th, 129th, 130th, 131st, 132nd, 133rd, 134th, 135th, 136th, 137th, 138th, 139th, 140th, 141st, 142nd, 143rd, 144th, 145th, 146th, 147th, 148th, 149th, 150th, 151st, 152nd, 153rd, 154th, 155th, 156th, 157th, 158th, 159th, 160th, 161st, 162nd, 163rd, 164th, 165th, 166th, 167th, 168th, 169th, 170th, 171st, 172nd, 173rd, 174th, 175th, 176th, 177th, 178th, 179th, 180th, 181st, 182nd, 183rd, 184th, 185th, 186th, 187th, 188th, 189th, 190th, 191st, 192nd, 193rd, 194th, 195th, 196th, 197th, 198th, 199th, 200th, 201st, 202nd, 203rd, 204th, 205th, 206th, 207th, 208th, 209th, 210th, 211th, 212th, 213th, 214th, 215th, 216th, 217th, 218th, 219th, 220th, 221st, 222nd, 223rd, 224th, 225th, 226th, 227th, 228th, 229th, 230th, 231st, 232nd, 233rd, 234th, 235th, 236th, 237th, 238th, 239th, 240th, 241st, 242nd, 243rd, 244th, 245th, 246th, 247th, 248th, 249th, 250th, 251st, 252nd, 253rd, 254th, 255th, 256th, 257th, 258th, 259th, 260th, 261st, 262nd, 263rd, 264th, 265th, 266th, 267th, 268th, 269th, 270th, 271st, 272nd, 273rd, 274th, 275th, 276th, 277th, 278th, 279th, 280th, 281st, 282nd, 283rd, 284th, 285th, 286th, 287th, 288th, 289th, 290th, 291st, 292nd, 293rd, 294th, 295th, 296th, 297th, 298th, 299th, 300th, 301st, 302nd, 303rd, 304th, 305th, 306th, 307th, 308th, 309th, 310th, 311th, 312th, 313th, 314th, 315th, 316th, 317th, 318th, 319th, 320th, 321st, 322nd, 323rd, 324th, 325th, 326th, 327th, 328th, 329th, 330th, 331st, 332nd, 333rd, 334th, 335th, 336th, 337th, 338th, 339th, 340th, 341st, 342nd, 343rd, 344th, 345th, 346th, 347th, 348th, 349th, 350th, 351st, 352nd, 353rd, 354th, 355th, 356th, 357th, 358th, 359th, 360th, 361st, 362nd, 363rd, 364th, 365th, 366th, 367th, 368th, 369th, 370th, 371st, 372nd, 373rd, 374th, 375th, 376th, 377th, 378th, 379th, 380th, 381st, 382nd, 383rd, 384th, 385th, 386th, 387th, 388th, 389th, 390th, 391st, 392nd, 393rd, 394th, 395th, 396th, 397th, 398th, 399th, 400th, 401st, 402nd, 403rd, 404th, 405th, 406th, 407th, 408th, 409th, 410th, 411th, 412th, 413th, 414th, 415th, 416th, 417th, 418th, 419th, 420th, 421st, 422nd, 423rd, 424th, 425th, 426th, 427th, 428th, 429th, 430th, 431st, 432nd, 433rd, 434th, 435th, 436th, 437th, 438th, 439th, 440th, 441st, 442nd, 443rd, 444th, 445th, 446th, 447th, 448th, 449th, 450th, 451st, 452nd, 453rd, 454th, 455th, 456th, 457th, 458th, 459th, 460th, 461st, 462nd, 463rd, 464th, 465th, 466th, 467th, 468th, 469th, 470th, 471st, 472nd, 473rd, 474th, 475th, 476th, 477th, 478th, 479th, 480th, 481st, 482nd, 483rd, 484th, 485th, 486th, 487th, 488th, 489th, 490th, 491st, 492nd, 493rd, 494th, 495th, 496th, 497th, 498th, 499th, 500th, 501st, 502nd, 503rd, 504th, 505th, 506th, 507th, 508th, 509th, 510th, 511th, 512th, 513th, 514th, 515th, 516th, 517th, 518th, 519th, 520th, 521st, 522nd, 523rd, 524th, 525th, 526th, 527th, 528th, 529th, 530th, 531st, 532nd, 533rd, 534th, 535th, 536th, 537th, 538th, 539th, 540th, 541st, 542nd, 543rd, 544th, 545th, 546th, 547th, 548th, 549th, 550th, 551st, 552nd, 553rd, 554th, 555th, 556th, 557th, 558th, 559th, 560th, 561st, 562nd, 563rd, 564th, 565th, 566th, 567th, 568th, 569th, 570th, 571st, 572nd, 573rd, 574th, 575th, 576th, 577th, 578th, 579th, 580th, 581st, 582nd, 583rd, 584th, 585th, 586th, 587th, 588th, 589th, 590th, 591st, 592nd, 593rd, 594th, 595th, 596th, 597th, 598th, 599th, 600th, 601st, 602nd, 603rd, 604th, 605th, 606th, 607th, 608th, 609th, 610th, 611th, 612th, 613th, 614th, 615th, 616th, 617th, 618th, 619th, 620th, 621st, 622nd, 623rd, 624th, 625th, 626th, 627th, 628th, 629th, 630th, 631st, 632nd, 633rd, 634th, 635th, 636th, 637th, 638th, 639th, 640th, 641st, 642nd, 643rd, 644th, 645th, 646th, 647th, 648th, 649th, 650th, 651st, 652nd, 653rd, 654th, 655th, 656th, 657th, 658th, 659th, 660th, 661st, 662nd, 663rd, 664th, 665th, 666th, 667th, 668th, 669th, 670th, 671st, 672nd, 673rd, 674th, 675th, 676th, 677th, 678th, 679th, 680th, 681st, 682nd, 683rd, 684th, 685th, 686th, 687th, 688th, 689th, 690th, 691st, 692nd, 693rd, 694th, 695th, 696th, 697th, 698th, 6

The German names of the first, second and third crosses are the same as the German names of the books which they represent. The first is Die Kunst der Germanen, the Praxis and Rechtslehre, and the last is Freiheit, which represents the Verfassungsgeschichte of Germany. He likewise names the Erziehungsgeschichte of Germany, which is the second cross, and the Grundriss der Geschichte der Menschheit, which is the last, as the important part of Philosophy, Germania is not only a national and productive study.

fortify the passes and break down the bridges against them; the stragglers were pillaged and murdered; the soldiers and horses were pierced in the woods by arrows from an invisible hand; the sick were burnt in their beds; and the dead bodies were hung on gibbets along the high-ways. These injuries exasperated the champions of the cross, who were not endowed with evangelical patience; and the Byzantine princes, who had provoked the unequal conflict, promoted the embarkation and march of these formidable guests. On the verge of the Turkish frontier Barbarossa spared the guilty Philadelphia,<sup>17</sup> rewarded the hospitable Laodicea, and deplored the hard necessity that had stained his sword with any drops of Christian blood. In their intercourse with the monarchs of Germany and France, the pride of the Greeks was exposed to an anxious trial. They might boast that on the first interview the seat of Louis was a low stool, beside the throne of Manuel;<sup>18</sup> but no sooner had the French king transported his army beyond the Bosphorus, than he refused the offer of a second conference, unless his brother would meet him on equal terms, either on the sea or land. With Conrad and Frederic, the ceremonial was still nicer and more difficult: like the successors of Constantine, they styled themselves emperors of the Romans;<sup>19</sup> and firmly maintained the purity of their title and dignity. The first of these representatives of Charlemagne would only converse with Manuel on horse-back in the open field; the second, by passing the Hellespont rather than the Bosphorus, declined the view of Constantinople and its sovereign. An emperor, who had been crowned at Rome, was reduced in the Greek epistles to the humble appellation of Rex, or prince of the Alemauni; and the vain and feeble Angelus affected to be ignorant of the name of one of the greatest men and monarchs of the age. While they viewed with hatred and suspicion the Latin pilgrims, the Greek emperors maintained a strict, though secret, alliance with the Turks and Saracens. Isaac Angelus complained, that by his friendship for the great Saladin he had incurred the enmity of the Franks; and a mosque was founded at Constantinople for the public exercise of the religion of Mahomet.<sup>20</sup>

Turkish warfare

III. The swarms that followed the first crusade, were destroyed in Anatolia by famine, pestilence, and the Turkish arrows; and the princes only escaped with some squadrons of horse to accomplish their lamentable pilgrimage. A just opinion may be formed of their knowledge and humanity; of their knowledge, from the design of subduing Persia and Chormasan in their way to Jerusalem; of their humanity, from the massacre of the Christian people, a friendly city, who came out to meet them with palms and crosses in their hands. The arms of Conrad and Louis were less cruel and imprudent; but the event of the second crusade was still more ruinous to Christendom; and the Greek Manuel is accused by his own subjects of giving seasonable intelligence to the sultan, and treacherous guides to the Latin princes. Instead of crushing the common foe, by a double attack at the same time but on different sides, the Germans were urged by emulation, and the French were retarded by jealousy. Louis had scarcely passed the Bosphorus when he was met by the returning emperor, who had lost the greatest part of his army in glorious, but unsuccessful, actions on the banks of the Meander. The contrast of the pomp of his rival hastened the retreat of Conrad, the desertion of his independent vassals reduced him to his hereditary troops; and he borrowed some Greek vessels to execute by sea the pilgrimage of Palestine. Without studying the lessons of experience, or the nature of the war, the king of France advanced through the same country to a similar fate. The vanguard, which bore the royal banner and the oriflamme of St. Denis,<sup>21</sup> had doubled their march with rash and inconsiderate speed; and the rear, which the king commanded in person, no longer found their companions in the evening camp. In darkness and disorder, they were encompassed, assaulted, and overwhelmed, by the innumerable host of Turks, who in the art of war were superior to the Christians of the twelfth century. Louis, who climbed a tree in the general discomfiture, was saved by his own valour and the ignorance of his adversaries; and with the dawn of day he escaped alive, but almost alone, to the camp of the vanguard. But, instead of pursuing his expedition by land, he was rejoiced to shelter the relics of his army in the friendly sea-port of Satalia. From thence he embarked for Antioch; but so penurious was the supply of Greek vessels, that they could only afford room for his knights and nobles; and the plebeian crowd of infantry was left to perish at the foot of the Pamphylian hills. The emperor and the king embarked and wept at Jerusalem; their martial trains, the remnant of mighty armies, were joined to the Christian powers of Syria, and a fruitless siege of Damascus was the final effort of the second crusade. Conrad and Louis embarked for Europe with the personal fame of piety and courage; but the Orientals had braved these potent monarchs of the Franks, with whose names and military forces they had been so often threatened.<sup>22</sup> Perhaps they had still more to fear from the veteran genius of Frederic the First, who in his youth had served in 17 The conduct of the Philadelphians is blamed by Nicaetus, while the anonymous German accuses the rudeness of his countrymen (vol. ii. p. 104). History would be pleased, if it were endeavoured to show by such contradictions. It is likewise from Nicaetus that we learn the pious and saintly sorrow of Frederic.

18 Stilbae is a name which Constantine translates into Latin to the word Zealot. This usage is very hard to save his king and country from such ignominy (our Joanville, Chrestien vol. ii. p. 512). The latter is inserted on a mistake in more exact, not an exception, according to the frequent realisation of some MSS.

19 Ego Romanorum imperator summus, the Roman emperor (Anonym. Caus. p. 124). The public and historical style of the Greeks was the same as the prince's. Yet Constantine owns, that imperator is proper to the emperor.

20 In the Epistles of Innocent III. (sup. p. 181), and the History of Bohdan (p. 124, 125), see the views of a pope and a cardinal on this singular toleration.

21 As counts of Vexin, the kings of France were the vassals and advocates of the monastery of St. Denis. The saint's peculiar banner, which they received from the abbot, was of a square form, and a red or flaming colour. The oriflamme appeared at the head of the French army from the sixth to the xvth century (Ducaugny sur Joinville, Disc. sur p. 221, 222).

22 The excellent French History of the second crusade are the Gesta (sup. p. 131) and the Chronique (sup. p. 132) of Joinville, the Chronique of the same volume contains more original letters of the king, of Roger his master, &c., the best documents of authentic history.

Asia under his uncle Conrad. Forty campaigns in Germany and Italy had taught Barbarossa to command; and his soldiers, even the princes of the empire, were accustomed under his reign to obey. As soon as he lost sight of Philadelpia and Laodicea, the last cities of the Greek frontier he plunged into the salt and barren desert, a land (says the historian) of horror and tribulation.<sup>23</sup> During twenty days, every step of his fainting and sickly march was besieged by the invincible hordes of Turkman,<sup>24</sup> whose numbers and fury increased after each defeat to multiply and inflame. The emperor continued to struggle and to suffer; and such was the measure of his calamities, that when he reached the gates of Iconium, no more than one thousand knights were able to serve on horseback. By a sudden and resolute assault he defeated the guards, and stormed the capital of the sultan,<sup>25</sup> who humbly sued for pardon and peace. The road was now open, and Frederic advanced in a career of triumph, till he was unfortunately drowned in a petty torrent of Cilicia.<sup>26</sup> The remainder of his Germans was consumed by sickness and desertion; and the emperor's son expired with the greatest part of his Swabian vassals at the siege of Acre. Among the Latin heroes, Godfrey of Bouillon and Frederic Barbarossa could alone achieve the passage of the Lesser Asia; yet even their success was a warning; and in the last and most experienced age of the crusades, every nation preferred the sea to the toils and perils of an inland expedition.<sup>27</sup>

The enthusiasm of the first crusade is a natural and simple event, while hope was fresh, danger untried, and enterprise congenial to the spirit of the times. But the obstinate perseverance of Europe was indeed excited our pity and admiration; that no instruction should have been drawn from constant and adverse experience; that the same confidence should have repeatedly grown from the same failures; that six succeeding generations should have rushed headlong down the precipice that was open before them; and that men of every condition should have staked their public and private fortunes on the desperate adventure of possessing or recovering a tomb-stone two thousand miles from their country. In a period of two centuries after the council of Clermont, each spring and summer produced a new emigration of pilgrim warriors for the defence of the Holy Land; but the seven great armaments or crusades were excited by some impending or recent calamity: the nations were moved by the authority of their pontiffs, and the example of their kings: their zeal was kindled, and their reason was silenced, by the voice of their holy orators; and among these, Bernard,<sup>28</sup> the monk, or the saint, may claim the most honourable place. About eight years before the first conquest of Jerusalem, he was born of a noble family in Burgundy; at the age of three and twenty he buried himself in the monastery of Cîteaux, then in the primitive fervour of the institution; at the end of two years he led forth her third colony, or daughter, to the valley of Clairvaux<sup>21</sup> in Champagne; and was content, till the hour of his death, with the humble station of abbot of his own community. A philosophic age has abolished, with too liberal and indiscriminate disdain, the honours of these spiritual heroes. The meanest among them are distinguished by some energies of the mind; they were at least superior to their votaries and disciples; and, in the race of superstition, they attained the prize for which such numbers contended. In speech, in writing, in action, Bernard stood high above his rivals and contemporaries; his compositions are not devoid of wit and eloquence; and he seems to have preserved as much reason and humanity as may be reconciled with the character of a saint. In a secular life, he would have shared the seventh part of a private inheritance; by a vow of poverty and penance, by closing his eyes against the visible world,<sup>30</sup> by the refusal of all ecclesiastical dignities, the abbot of Clairvaux became the oracle of Europe, and the founder of one hundred and sixty convents. Princes and pontiffs trembled at the freedom of his apostolical censures. France, England, and Milan, consulted and obeyed his judgment in a session of the church: the debt was repaid by the gratitude of Innocent the Second; and his successor, Eugenius the Third, was the friend and disciple of the holy Bernard. It was in the proclamation of the second crusade that he shone as the missionary and prophet of God, who called the nations to the defence of his holy sepulchre.<sup>31</sup> At the parliament of Vezelay he spoke before the king; and Louis the Seventh, with his nobles, received their crosses from his hand. The abbot of Clairvaux then marched to the less easy conquest of the emperor Conrad: a phlegmatic people, ignorant of his language, was transported by the pathetic vehemence of his tone and gestures; and his progress, from Constance to Cologne, was the

$$\begin{aligned} \text{FIP} &= \frac{\sum_{i=1}^n \text{Firm}_i \text{Turnover}_i}{\sum_{i=1}^n \text{Firm}_i \text{Sales}_i} \times 100 \\ \text{FIP} &= \frac{\sum_{i=1}^n \text{Firm}_i \text{Turnover}_i}{\sum_{i=1}^n \text{Firm}_i \text{Sales}_i} \times 100 \\ \text{FIP} &= \frac{\sum_{i=1}^n \text{Firm}_i \text{Turnover}_i}{\sum_{i=1}^n \text{Firm}_i \text{Sales}_i} \times 100 \end{aligned}$$

1. The first part of the paper is devoted to the study of the asymptotic behavior of the solutions of the system (1) as  $t \rightarrow \infty$ . It is shown that the solutions of the system (1) are bounded and tend to zero as  $t \rightarrow \infty$ .

[illegible]

27. M. J. S. Smith, J. Biol. Chem., 235, 135 (1960). In this paper, the authors state that the rate of polymerization is proportional to the concentration of the monomer, and that the rate of polymerization is proportional to the concentration of the monomer.

28. The most authentic edition of St. Bernard's letters is from the earliest printed edition of the Opera by M. de la Haye, and reprinted at Venice 1775, in six volumes in Latin. We never the above could reflect or suggest, it could add, is contained in the new, 1993, exhibits, as the old, 1991, exhibit is continuing to be used in the new exhibit, by exhibit in the papers of the late Dr. J. Edgar Hoover.

[illegible][illegible]

$\lim_{n \rightarrow \infty} \frac{1}{n} \sum_{k=0}^{n-1} f(T^k x) = \int_X f d\mu$

“but I still possess three shops in the city of “Hems: these you may take; and these alone “can I bestow.” His chamber of justice was the terror of the great and the refuge of the poor. Some years after the sultan’s death, an oppressed subject called aloud in the streets of Damascus. “O Nouredin, Nouredin, where “art thou now? Arise, arise, to pity and pro“tect us!” A tumult was apprehended, and a living tyrant blushed or trembled at the name of a departed monarch.

Conquest of Egypt by the Turks.
A.D. 1165—1169.

By the arms of the Turks and Franks the Fatimites had been deprived of Syria. In Egypt the decay of their character and influence was still more essential. Yet they were still revered as the descendants and successors of the prophet; they maintained their invisible state in the palace of Cairo; and their person was seldom violated by the profane eyes of subjects or strangers. The Latin ambassadors have described their own introduction through a series of gloomy passages, and glittering porticoes <sup>41</sup> the scene was enlivened by the warbling of birds and the murmur of fountains: it was enriched by a display of rich furniture, and rare animals; of the imperial treasures, something was shown, and much was supposed; and the long order of unfolding doors was guarded by black soldiers and domestic counsellors. The sanctuary of the presence chamber was veiled with a curtain; and the vizir, who conducted the ambassadors, laid aside his cimeter, and prostrated himself three times on the ground; the veil was then removed; and they beheld the commander of the faithful, who signified his pleasure to the first slave of the throne. But this slave was his master the vizir or sultan had usurped the supreme administration of Egypt; the claims of the rival candidates were decided by arms; and the name of the most worthy, of the strongest, was inscribed in the royal patent of command. The factions of Dargham and Shawer alternately expelled each other from the capital and country; and the weaker side implored the dangerous protection of the sultan of Damascus or the king of Jerusalem, the perpetual enemies of the sect and monarchy of the Fatimites. By his arms and religion the Turk was most formidable; but the Frank, in an easy direct march, could advance from Gaza to the Nile; while the intermediate situation of his realm compelled the troops of Nour-eddin to wheel round the skirts of Arabia, a long and painful circuit, which exposed them to thirst, fatigue, and the burning winds of the desert. The secret zeal and ambition of the Turkish prince aspired to reign in Egypt under the name of the Abbassides; but the restoration of the suppliant Shawer was the ostensible motive of the first expedition; and the success was intrusted to the emir Shiroonah, a valiant and veteran commander. Dargham was oppressed and slain; but the ingratitude, the jealousy, the just apprehensions, of his more fortunate rival, soon provoked him to invite the king of Jerusalem to deliver Egypt from his insolent benefactors. To this union the forces of Shiracouh were unequal; he relinquished the premature conquest; and the evacuation of Belbeis or Pelusium was the condition of his safe retreat. As the Turks defiled before the enemy, and their general closed the rear, with a vigilant eye, and a hart caxe in his hand, a Frank presumed to ask him if he were not afraid of an attack? "It is doubtless in your power to begin the attack," replied the intrepid emir; "but rest assured, that not one of my soldiers will go to paradise till he has sent an infidel to hell." His report of the riches of the land, the effeminacy of the natives, and the disorders of the government, revived the hopes of Noureddin; the caliph of Bagdad applauded the pious design; and Shiracouh descended into Egypt a second time, with twelve thousand Turks and eleven thousand Arabs. Yet his forces were still inferior to the confederate armies of the Franks and Saracens; and I can discern an unusual degree of military art in his passage of the Nile, his retreat into Thebais, his masterly evolutions in the battle of Babain, the surprise of Alexandria, and his marches and counter-marches in the flats and valley of Egypt, from the tropic to the sea. His conduct was seconded by the courage of his troops; and on the eve of action a Mamaluke<sup>42</sup> exclaimed, "If we cannot wrest Egypt from the Christian dogs, why do we not renounce the honours and rewards of the sultan, and retire to labour with the peasants, or to spin with the females of the harem?" Yet, after all his efforts in the field, after the obstinate defence of Alexandria<sup>43</sup> by his nephew Saladin, an honorable capitulation and retreat concluded the second enterprise of Shiracouh; and Noureddin reserved his abilities for a third and more pretensions occasion. It was soon offered by the ambitious and avastie of Amalric or Amaury, king of Jerusalem, who had imbibed the pernicious maxim, that no faith should be kept with the enemies of God. A religious warrior, the great master of the hospital, encouraged him to proceed; the emperor of Constantinople either gave, or promised, a fleet to act with the armies of Syria; and the perfidious Christian, unsatisfied with spoil and subsidy, aspired to the conquest of Egypt. In this emergency, the Moslems turned their eyes towards the sultan of Damascus; the vizir, whom danger encompassed on all sides, yielded to their unanimous wishes, and Noureddin seemed to be tempted by the fair offer of one third of the revenue of the kingdom. The Franks were already at the gates of Cairo; but the suburbs, the old city, were burnt on their approach; they were deceived by an insidious negotiation, and their vessels were unable to surmount the barriers of the Nile. They preferentially

41 From the ambassador, William Fitzwilliam, on 17.12.15, describes the place of the pearl in the diet of the nobles and a pearl as large as a pigeon's egg, and a pearl as large as a nut, weighing 100 drams, in a round of coral, and a pearl as large as a nut, in any vessel of crystal, and a pearl as large as a nut, in any vessel of crystal.

42. Mimulus, per Mimulus ...
pharic p. 1 and Diller p. 1 ...
presumably ...
at the ... of ...

1. The minimum disk space is 500 MB. The minimum RAM is 1 GB. The minimum system requirements are as follows:
 2. The minimum disk space is 500 MB. The minimum RAM is 1 GB. The minimum system requirements are as follows:
 3. The minimum disk space is 500 MB. The minimum RAM is 1 GB. The minimum system requirements are as follows:
 4. The minimum disk space is 500 MB. The minimum RAM is 1 GB. The minimum system requirements are as follows:
 5. The minimum disk space is 500 MB. The minimum RAM is 1 GB. The minimum system requirements are as follows:
 6. The minimum disk space is 500 MB. The minimum RAM is 1 GB. The minimum system requirements are as follows:
 7. The minimum disk space is 500 MB. The minimum RAM is 1 GB. The minimum system requirements are as follows:
 8. The minimum disk space is 500 MB. The minimum RAM is 1 GB. The minimum system requirements are as follows:
 9. The minimum disk space is 500 MB. The minimum RAM is 1 GB. The minimum system requirements are as follows:
 10. The minimum disk space is 500 MB. The minimum RAM is 1 GB. The minimum system requirements are as follows:

declined a contest with the Turks in the midst of an hostile country; and Amaury retired into Palestine with the shame and reproach that always adhered to unsuccessful injustice. After this deliverance, Shihacouh was invested with a robe of honour, which he soon stained with the blood of the unfortunate Shawer. For a while, the Turkish emir condescended to hold the office of vizir; but this foreign conquest precipitated the fall of the Fatimites themselves; and the bloodless change was accomplished by a message and a word. The caliphs had been degraded by their own weakness and the tyranny of the vizirs: their subjects blushed, when the descendant and successor of the prophet presented his naked hand to the rude gripe of a Latin ambassador; they wept when he sent the hair of his women, a sad emblem of their grief and terror, to excite the pity of the sultan of Damascus. By the command of Noureddin, and the sentence of the doctors, the holy names of Abubeker, Omar, and Othman, were solemnly restored: the caliph Mosthadi, of Bagdad, was acknowledged in the public prayers as the true commander of the faithful; and the green livery of the sons of Ali was exchanged for the black colour of the Abbassides. The last of his race, the caliph Adhed, who survived only ten days, expired in happy ignorance of his fate: his treasures secured the loyalty of the soldiers, and silenced the murmurs of the sectaries; and in all subsequent revolutions, Egypt has never departed from the orthodox tradition of the Moslems.<sup>45</sup>

The hilly country beyond the Tigris is occupied by the pastoral tribes of the Curds;<sup>46</sup> a people hardly, strong, savage, impatient of the yoke, addicted to rapine, and tenacious of the government of their national chief. The resemblance of name, situation, and manners, seems to identify them with the Carduchiens of the Greeks;<sup>47</sup> and they still defend against the Ottoman Porte the antique freedom which they asserted against the successors of Cyrus. Poverty and ambition prompted them to embrace the profession of mercenary soldiers: the service of his father and uncle prepared the reign of the great Saladin;<sup>48</sup> and the son of Job or Ayub, a simple Kurd, magnanimously smiled at his pedigree, which flattery deduced from the Arabian caliphs. So numerous was Noureddin of the impending ruin of his house, that he considered the reluctant youth to follow his uncle Shihacouh into Egypt: his military character was established by the defence of Alexandria; and if we may believe the Latins, he solicited and obtained from the Christian general the profane honours of knighthood.<sup>49</sup> On the death of Shihacouh, the office of grand vizir was bestowed on Saladin, as the youngest and least powerful of the emirs; but with the advice of his father, whom he invited to Cairo, his genius obtained the ascendant over his equals, and attached the army to his person and interest. While Noureddin lived, these ambitious Curds were the most humble of his slaves; and the indiscreet murmurs of the divan were silenced by the prudent Ayub, who loudly protested that at the command of the sultan he himself would lead his son in chains to the foot of the throne. "Such language," he added in private, "was prudent and proper in an assembly of your rivals; but we are now above fear and obedience; and the threats of Noureddin shall not extort the tribute of a sugar-cane." His seasonable death relieved them from the odious and doubtful conflict: his son, a minor of eleven years of age, was left for a while to the emirs of Damascus; and the new lord of Egypt was decorated by the caliph with every title<sup>51</sup> that could sanctify his usurpation in the eyes of the people. Nor was Saladin long content with the possession of Egypt; he despoiled the Christians of Jerusalem, and the Atabeks of Damascus, Aleppo, and Diarbekir: Mecca and Medina acknowledged him for their temporal protector; his brother subdued the distant regions of Yemen, or the happy Arabia; and at the hour of his death, his empire was spread from the African Tripoli to the Tigris, and from the Indian Ocean to the mountains of Armenia. In the judgment of his character, the reproaches of treason and ingratitude strike forcibly on our minds, impressed, as they are, with the principle and experience of law and loyalty. But his ambition may in some measure be excused by the revolutions of Asia,<sup>52</sup> which had crased every notion of legitimate succession; by the recent example of the Atabeks themselves; by his reverence to the son of his benefactor, his humane and generous behaviour to the collateral branches; by their incapacity and his merit; by the approbation of the caliph, the sole source of all legitimate power; and, above all, by the wishes and interest of the people, whose happiness is the first object of government. In his virtues, and in those of his patron, they admired the singular union of the hero and the saint; for both Noureddin and Saladin are ranked among the Mahometan saints; and the constant meditation of the holy war appears to have shed a serious and sober colour over their lives and actions. The youth of the latter<sup>53</sup> was addicted to wine and

<sup>45</sup> For the most recent history of Egypt, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118. For the history of Egypt, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118. For the history of Egypt, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118.

<sup>46</sup> For the Curds, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118. For the Curds, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118. For the Curds, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118.

<sup>47</sup> See the Carduchi of Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118. For the Carduchi, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118.

<sup>48</sup> For the history of Saladin, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118. For the history of Saladin, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118.

<sup>49</sup> For the history of Saladin, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118. For the history of Saladin, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118.

<sup>50</sup> For the history of Saladin, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118. For the history of Saladin, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118.

<sup>51</sup> For the history of Saladin, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118. For the history of Saladin, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118.

<sup>52</sup> For the history of Saladin, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118. For the history of Saladin, see Volney, Essai sur l'usage de l'Alphabet, p. 117-118.

<sup>53</sup> See his life and character in Renaudot, p. 537-545.

women ; but his aspiring spirit soon renounced the temptations of pleasure, for the graver follies of fame and dominion : the garment of Saladin was of coarse woollen ; water was his only drink ; and, while he exultated the temperance, he surpassed the chastity, of his Arabian prophet. Both in faith and practice he was a rigid Muslim ; he ever deplored that the defence of religion had not allowed him to accomplish the pilgrimage of Mecca ; but at the stated hours, five times each day, the sultan devoutly prayed with his brethren : the involuntary omission of fasting was scrupulously repaid ; and his perusal of the Koran, on horseback between the approaching armies, may be quoted as a proof, how ever ostentatious, of piety and courage.<sup>54</sup> The superstitious doctrine of the sect of Shafei was the only study that he deigned to encourage. the poets were safe in his contempt ; but all profane science was the object of his aversion ; and a philosopher, who had vented some speculative novelties, was seized and strangled by the command of the royal saint. The justice of his divan was accessible to the meanest suppliant against himself and his ministers ; and it was only for a kingdom that Saladin would deviate from the rule of equity. While the descendants of Seljuk and Zenghi held his stirrup and smoothed his garments, he was affable and patient with the meanest of his servants. So boundless was his liberality, that he distributed twelve thousand horses at the siege of Acre ; and, at the time of his death, no more than forty-seven drams of silver and one piece of gold coin were found in the treasury ; yet, in a martial reign, the tributes were diminished, and the wealthy citizens enjoyed without fear or danger the fruits of their industry. Egypt, Syria, and Arabia, were adorned by the royal foundations of hospitals, colleges, and mosques ; and Cairo was fortified with a wall and citadel ; but his works were consecrated to public use,<sup>55</sup> nor did the sultan indulge himself in a garden or palace of private luxury. In a fanatic age, himself a fanatic, the genuine virtues of Saladin commanded the esteem of the Christians : the emperor of Germany gloried in his friendship ;<sup>56</sup> the Greek emperor solicited his alliance ;<sup>57</sup> and the conquest of Jerusalem diffused, and perhaps magnified, his fame both in the East and West.

During its short existence, the kingdom of Jerusalem<sup>18</sup> was supported by the discord of the Turks and Saracens; and both the Fatimite caliphs and the sultans of Damascus were tempted to sacrifice the cause of their religion to the more considerations of private and present advantage. But the powers of Egypt, Syria, and Arabia, were now united by an homo, whose nature and fortune had armed against the Christians. All without, now bore the most threatening aspect;

and all was feeble and hollow in the internal state of Jerusalem. After the two first Baldwins, the brother and cousin of Godfrey of Bouillon, the sceptre devolved by female succession to Melisenda, daughter of the second Baldwin, and her husband Fulk, count of Anjou, the father, by a former marriage, of our English Plantagenets. Their two sons, Baldwin the Third, and Amaury, waged a strenuous, and not unsuccessful, war against the infidels; but the son of Amaury, Baldwin the Fourth, was deprived, by the leprosy, a gift of the crusades, of the faculties both of mind and body. His sister Sybilla, the mother of Baldwin the Fifth, was his natural heiress; after the suspicious death of her child, she crowned her second husband, Guy of Lusignan, a prince of a handsome person, but of such base renown, that his own brother Jeffrey was heard to exclaim, "Since they have made him a king, surely they would have made me a god!" The choice was generally blamed; and the most powerful vassal, Raymond count of Tripoli, who had been excluded from the succession and regency, entertained an implacable hatred against the king, and exposed his honour and conscience to the temptations of the sultan. Such were the guardians of the holy city; a leper, a child, a woman, a coward, and a traitor: yet its fate was delayed twelve years by some supplies from Europe, by the valour of the military orders, and by the distant or domestic avocations of their great enemy. At length, on every side, the sinking state was encircled and pressed by an hostile line; and the truce was violated by the Franks, whose existence it protected. A soldier of fortune, Reginald of Chatillon, had seized a fortress on the edge of the desert, from whence he pillaged the caravans, insulted Mahomet, and threatened the cities of Mecca and Medina. Saladin condemned to complain; rejoiced in the denial of justice; and at the head of four-score thousand horse and foot invaded the Holy Land. The choice of Tiberias for his first siege was suggested by the count of Tripoli, to whom it belonged; and the king of Jerusalem was persuaded to drain his garrisons, and to arm his people for the relief of that important place.<sup>59</sup> By the advice of the perfidious Raymond, the Christians were betrayed into a camp destitute of water: he fled on the first onset, with the curses of both nations;<sup>60</sup> Lusignan was overthrown, with the loss of thirty thousand men; and the wood of the true cross, a dire misfortune! was left in the power of the infidels. The royal captive was conducted to the tent of Saladin; and as he fainted with thirst and terror, the generous victor presented him with a cup of sherbet, cooled in snow, without sufficing his companion, Reginald of Chatillon, to partake of this pledge of hospitality and pardon. "The person and dignity of a king," said the sultan, 54 The axial and regions that are attached to the first paper of the cone are 70% the same as the second paper of the cone. The other two papers are 10% the same as the first paper of the cone and the other two papers are 10% the same as the second paper of the cone.

18 North Lankford Road, Fort Worth, Texas 76104 19 The above information was obtained from the files of the 20 Federal Bureau of Investigation, Dallas, Texas, and is being furnished to you for your information.
 21 Very truly yours,
 22 Special Agent in Charge

[illegible]

"are sacred; but this impious robber must instantly acknowledge the prophet, whom he has blasphemed, or meet the death which he has so often deserved." On the proud or conscientious refusal of the Christian warrior, Saladin struck him on the head with his cimeter, and Reginald was despatched by the guards.<sup>61</sup> The trembling Lusignan was sent to Damascus, to an honourable prison and speedy ransom; but the victory was stained by the execution of two hundred and thirty knights of the hospital, the intrepid champions and martyrs of their faith. The kingdom was left without a head; and of the two grand masters of the military orders, the one was slain and the other was a prisoner. From all the cities, both of the sea-coast and the inland country, the garrisons had been drawn away for this fatal field: Tyre and Tripoli alone could escape the rapid inroad of Saladin; and three months after the battle of Tiberias, he appeared in arms before the gates of Jerusalem.<sup>62</sup>

He might expect, that the siege of a city so venerable on earth and in heaven, so interesting to Europe and Asia, would rekindle the last sparks of enthusiasm; and that, of sixty thousand Christians, every man would be a soldier, and every soldier a candidate for martyrdom. But queen Sybilla trembled for herself and her captive husband, and the barons and knights, who had escaped from the sword and chains of the Turks, displayed the same factious and selfish spirit in the public ruin. The most numerous portion of the inhabitants was composed of the Greek and Oriental Christians, whom experience had taught to prefer the Mahometan before the Latin yoke;<sup>63</sup> and the holy sepulchre attracted a base and needy crowd, without arms or courage, who subsisted only on the charity of the pilgrims. Some feeble and hasty efforts were made for the defence of Jerusalem; but in the space of fourteen days, a victorious army drove back the sallies of the besieged, planted their engines, opened the wall to the breadth of fifteen cubits, applied their scaling-ladders, and erected on the breach twelve banners of the prophet and the sultan. It was in vain that a barefoot procession of the queen, the women, and the monks, implored the Son of God to save his tomb and his inheritance from impious violation. Their sole hope was in the mercy of the conqueror, and to their first suppliant deputation that mercy was sternly denied. "He had sworn to avenge the patience and long-suffering of the Moslems; the hour of forgiveness was elapsed, and the moment was now arrived to expiate, in blood, the innocent blood which had been spilt by Godfrey and the first crusaders." But a desperate and successful struggle of the Franks admonished the sultan that his triumph was not yet secure; he listened with reverence to a solemn adjuration in the name of the common father of mankind; and a sentiment of human sympathy mollified the ri-gour of fanaticism and conquest. He consented to accept the city, and to spare the inhabitants. The Greek and Oriental Christians were permitted to live under his dominion; but it was stipulated, that in forty days all the Franks and Latins should evacuate Jerusalem, and be safely conducted to the sea-ports of Syria and Egypt; that ten pieces of gold should be paid for each man, five for each woman, and one for every child; and that those who were unable to purchase their freedom should be detained in perpetual slavery. Of some writers it is a favourite and invidious theme to compare the humanity of Saladin with the massacre of the first crusade. The difference would be merely personal; but we should not forget that the Christians had offered to capitulate, and that the Mahometans of Jerusalem sustained the last extremities of an assault and storm. Justice is indeed due to the fidelity with which the Turkish conqueror fulfilled the conditions of the treaty; and he may be deservedly praised for the glance of pity which he cast on the misery of the vanquished. Instead of a rigorous exaction of his debt, he accepted a sum of thirty thousand byzants, for the ransom of seven thousand poor; two or three thousand more were dismissed by his gratuitous clemency; and the number of slaves was reduced to eleven or fourteen thousand persons. In his interview with the queen, his words, and even his tears, suggested the kindest consolations; his liberal alms were distributed among those who had been made orphans or widows by the fortune of war; and while the knights of the hospital were in arms against him, he allowed their more pious brethren to continue, during the term of a year, the care and service of the sick. In these acts of mercy the virtue of Saladin deserves our admiration and love: he was above the necessity of dissimulation, and his stern fanaticism would have prompted him to dissemble, rather than to affect, this profane compassion for the enemies of the Koran. After Jerusalem had been delivered from the presence of the strangers, the sultan made his triumphant entry, his banners waving in the wind, and to the harmony of martial music. The great mosch of Omar, which had been converted into a church, was again consecrated to one God and his prophet Mahomet; the walls and pavement were purified with rose-water; and a pulpit, the labour of Nouredin, was erected in the sanctuary. But when the golden cross that glittered on the dome was cast down, and dragged through the streets, the Christians of every sect uttered a lamentable groan, which was answered by the joyful shouts of the Moslems. In four ivory chests the patriarch had collected the crosses, the images, the vases, and the relics of the holy place: they were seized by the conqueror, who was desirous of presenting the caliph with the trophies of Christian idolatry. He was persuaded, however, to intrust them to the patriarch and prince of Antioch; and the most sacrificed, in 1187, p. 721. Belsham and Arnold, p. 275, insert two original letters of knight templar to Renaud, Hist. Patriarch. Alex. p. 515.

<sup>61</sup> Renaud, Reginald, or Arnold de Châtillon, is celebrated by the Latins for his life and death: but the various stories of the latter are, notwithstanding, united by Belsham and Arnold; and, for the first time, de St. Louis, p. 701. Châtillon's great enemy Saladin, after having put to death a prisoner who had tasted his bread and salt. Some of the

pious pledge was redeemed by Richard of England, at the expense of fifty-two thousand byzants of gold.<sup>64</sup>

The nations might fear and hope the immediate and final expulsion of the Latins from Syria; which was yet delayed above a century after the death of Saladin.<sup>65</sup> In the career of victory, he was first checked by the resistance of Tyre; the troops and garrisons, which had capitulated, were imprudently conducted to the same port:
their numbers were adequate to the defence of the place; and the arrival of Conrad of Montferrat inspired the disorderly crowd with confidence and union. His father, a venerable pilgrim, had been made prisoner in the battle of Tiberias; but that disaster was unknown in Italy and Greece, when the son was urged by ambition and piety to visit the inheritance of his royal nephew, the infant Baldwin. The view of the Turkish banners wound him from the hostile coast of Jaffa; and Conrad was unanimously hailed as the prince and champion of Tyre, which was already besieged by the conqueror of Jerusalem. The firmness of his zeal, and perhaps his knowledge of a generous foe, enabled him to brave the threats of the sultan, and to declare, that should his aged parent be exposed before the walls, he himself would discharge the first arrow, and glory in his descent from a Christian martyr.<sup>66</sup>
The Egyptian fleet was allowed to enter the harbour of Tyre; but the chain was suddenly drawn, and five galleys were either sunk or taken: a thousand Turks were slain in a sally; and Saladin, after burning his engines, concluded a glorious campaign by a disgraceful retreat to Damascus. He was soon assailed by a more formidable tempest. The pathetic narratives, and even the pictures, that represented in lively colours the servitude and profanation of Jerusalem, awakened the torpid sensibility of Europe. the emperor Frederic Barbarossa, and the kings of France and England, assumed the cross; and the tardy magnitude of their armaments was anticipated by the maritime states of the Mediterranean and the Ocean.
The skilful and provident Italians first embarked in the ships of Genoa, Pisa, and Venice.
They were speedily followed by the most eager pilgrims of France, Normandy, and the Western Isles. The powerful succour of Flanders, Frise, and Denmark, filled near an hundred vessels;
and the Northern warriors were distinguished in the field by a lofty stature and a ponderous battle-axe.<sup>67</sup> Their increasing multitudes could no longer be confined within the walls of Tyre, or remain obedient to the voice of Conrad.
They pitied the misfortunes, and revered the dignity, of Lusignan, who was released from prison, perhaps to divide the army of the Franks.

He proposed the recovery of Ptolemais, or Acre, thirty miles to the south of Tyre; and the place was first invested by two thousand horse and thirty thousand foot under his nominal command. I shall not expatiate on the story of this memorable siege; in which lasted near two years, and consumed, in a narrow space, the forces of Europe and Asia. Never did the flame of enthusiasm burn with <sup>Siege of Acre, A.D. 1189, July—A.D. 1191, July</sup> fiercer and more destructive rage; nor could the true believers, a common appellation, who consecrated their own martyrs, refuse some applause to the mistaken zeal and courage of their adversaries. At the sound of the holy trumpet, the Moslems of Egypt, Syria, Arabia, and the Oriental provinces, assembled under the servant of the prophet.<sup>68</sup> his camp was pitched and removed within a few miles of Acre; and he laboured, night and day, for the relief of his brethren and the annoyance of the Franks. Nine battles, not unworthy of the name, were fought, in the neighbourhood of Mount Carmel, with such vicissitude of fortune, that in one attack the sultan forced his way into the city; that in one sally, the Christians penetrated to the royal tent. By the means of divers and pigeons, a regular correspondence was maintained with the besieged: and, as often as the sea was left open, the exhausted garrison was withdrawn, and a fresh supply was poured into the place. The Latin camp was thinned by famine, the sword, and the climate; but the tents of the dead were replenished with new pilgrims, who exaggerated the strength and speed of their approaching countrymen. The vulgar was astonished by the report, that the pope himself, with an innumerable crusade, was advanced as far as Constantinople. The march of the emperor filled the East with more serious alarms; the obstacles which he encountered in Asia, and perhaps in Greece, were raised by the policy of Saladin; his joy on the death of Barbarossa was measured by his esteem; and the Christians were rather dismayed than encouraged at the sight of the duke of Swabia and his way-worn remnant of five thousand Germans. At length, in the spring of the second year, the royal fleets of France and England cast anchor in the bay of Acre, and the siege was more vigorously prosecuted by the youthful emulation of the two kings, Philip Augustus and Richard Plantagenet. After every resource had been tried, and every hope was exhausted, the defenders of Acre submitted to their fate; a capitulation was granted, but their lives and liberties were taxed at the hard conditions of a ransom of two hundred thousand pieces of gold, the deliverance of one hundred nobles, and fifteen hundred inferior captives, and the restoration of the wood of the holy cross. Some doubts in the agreement, and some delay in the execution, rekindled the fury fact, by Vertot, who adopts without reluctance a romantic tale, the old literature is definitely exposed to the glare of the historical.

61 For the complex of Artemesia, Polytrichum sp. 75 and Allylaria sp. 10-17, see our Microtus notes. On the other hand, Bernard Triturus sp. 131-133 is the most copious and authentic, see below. Mytilus (Page 14) of 123.

67. Northernmost of the three, it is the only salmonid species that occurs in the district of September 1961. It is a small, slender, silvery fish, with a maximum length of 10 cm. It is found in the upper reaches of the river, where it is common.

As the history of the movement is well known, it is not necessary to repeat it here. I do, however, feel the need to mention the names of M. J. and G. J. Jones, the founders, and the thought against which they

of the Franks, and three thousand Moslems, almost in the sultan's view, were beheaded by the command of the sanguinary Richard.<sup>69</sup> By the conquest of Acre, the Latin powers acquired a strong town and a convenient harbour; but the advantage was most dearly purchased. The minister and historian of Saladin computes, from the report of the enemy, that their numbers, at different periods, amounted to five or six hundred thousand; that more than one hundred thousand Christians were slain; that a far greater number was lost by disease or shipwreck; and that a small portion of this mighty host could return in safety to their native country.<sup>70</sup>

Richard of England, in the First, are the only kings of A.D. 1191, 1192. France and England, who have fought under the same banners; but the holy service, in which they were enlisted, was incessantly disturbed by their national jealousy; and the two factions, which they protected in Palestine, were more averse to each other than to the common enemy. In the eyes of the Orientals, the French monarch was superior in dignity and power; and, in the emperor's absence, the Latins revered him as their temporal chief.<sup>71</sup> His exploits were not adequate to his fame. Philip was brave, but the statesman predominated in his character; he was soon weary of sacrificing his health and interest on a barren coast; the surrender of Acre became the signal of his departure; nor could he justify this unpopular desertion, by leaving the duke of Burgundy, with five hundred knights, and ten thousand foot, for the service of the Holy Land. The king of England, though inferior in dignity, surpassed his rival in wealth and military renown;<sup>72</sup> and if heroism be confined to brutal and ferocious valour, Richard Plantagenet will stand high among the heroes of the age. The memory of Cœur de Lion, of the lion-hearted prince, was long dear and glorious to his English subjects; and, at the distance of sixty years, it was celebrated in proverbial sayings by the grandsons of the Turks and Saracens, against whom he had fought: his tremendous name was employed by the Syrian mothers to silence their infants; and if an horse suddenly started from the way, his rider was wont to exclaim, "Dost thou think king Richard is in that bush?"<sup>73</sup> His cruelty to the Mohammedans was the effect of temper and zeal; but I cannot believe that a soldier, so free and fearless in the use of his lance, would have descended to what a dagger against his valiant brother Conrad of Montferrat, who was slain at Tyre by some secret assassins.<sup>74</sup> After the surrender of Acre, and the departure of Philip, the king of England led the crusaders to the recovery of the sea-coast; and the cities of Caesarea and Jaffa were added to the fragments of the kingdom of Lusignan. A march of one hundred miles from Acre to Ascalon, was a great and perpetual battle of eleven days. In the disorder of his troops, Saladin remained on the field with seventeen guards, without lowering his standard, or suspending the sound of his brazen kettle-drum: he again rallied and renewed the charge; and his preachers or heralds called aloud on the unitarians, manfully to stand up against the Christian idolaters. But the progress of these idolaters was irresistible, and it was only by demolishing the walls and buildings of Ascalon, that the sultan could prevent them from occupying an important fortress on the confines of Egypt. During a severe winter, the armies slept; but in the spring, the Franks advanced within a day's march of Jerusalem, under the leading standard of the English king, and his active spirit intercepted a convoy, or caravan, of seven thousand camels. Saladin<sup>75</sup> had fixed his station in the holy city; but the city was struck with consternation and discord: he fasted; he prayed; he preached; he offered to share the dangers of the siege; but his Mamelukes, who remembered the fate of their companions at Acre, pressed the sultan, with loyal or seditious clamours, to reserve his person and their courage for the future defence of the religion and empire.<sup>76</sup> The Moslems were delivered by the sudden, or, as they deemed, the miraculous, retreat of the Christians.<sup>77</sup> and the laurels of Richard were blasted by the prudence, or envy, of his companions. The hero, ascending an hill, and veiling his face, exclaimed with an indignant voice, "Those who are unwilling to rescue, are unworthy to view, the sepulchre of Christ!" After his return to Acre, on the news that Jaffa was surprised by the sultan, he sailed with some merchant vessels, and leaped foremost on the beach; the castle was relieved by his presence; and sixty thousand Turks and Saracens fled before his arms. The discovery of his weakness provoked them to return in the morning; and they found him carelessly encamped before the gates with only seventeen knights and three hundred archers. Without counting their numbers, he sustained

<sup>69</sup> Richard of England, with a small party of knights, killed a great number of the Moslems, and took a great number of captives. See the account of this battle in the Chronicle of Richard I. p. 1191. and in the Chronicle of Philip Augustus p. 1191. and in the Chronicle of Saladin p. 1191.

<sup>70</sup> Richard of England, p. 1191. He says, that he saw a great number of Christians killed, and a great number of Moslems taken. He also says, that he saw a great number of Christians taken, and a great number of Moslems killed.

<sup>71</sup> Richard of England, p. 1191. He says, that he saw a great number of Christians killed, and a great number of Moslems taken. He also says, that he saw a great number of Christians taken, and a great number of Moslems killed.

<sup>72</sup> Richard of England, p. 1191. He says, that he saw a great number of Christians killed, and a great number of Moslems taken. He also says, that he saw a great number of Christians taken, and a great number of Moslems killed.

<sup>73</sup> Richard of England, p. 1191. He says, that he saw a great number of Christians killed, and a great number of Moslems taken. He also says, that he saw a great number of Christians taken, and a great number of Moslems killed.

<sup>74</sup> Richard of England, p. 1191. He says, that he saw a great number of Christians killed, and a great number of Moslems taken. He also says, that he saw a great number of Christians taken, and a great number of Moslems killed.

<sup>75</sup> Richard of England, p. 1191. He says, that he saw a great number of Christians killed, and a great number of Moslems taken. He also says, that he saw a great number of Christians taken, and a great number of Moslems killed.

<sup>76</sup> Richard of England, p. 1191. He says, that he saw a great number of Christians killed, and a great number of Moslems taken. He also says, that he saw a great number of Christians taken, and a great number of Moslems killed.

<sup>77</sup> Richard of England, p. 1191. He says, that he saw a great number of Christians killed, and a great number of Moslems taken. He also says, that he saw a great number of Christians taken, and a great number of Moslems killed.

their charge; and we learn from the evidence of his enemies, that the king of England, grasping his lance, rode furiously along their front, from the right to the left wing, without meeting an adversary who dared to encounter his career.<sup>78</sup> Am I writing the history of Orlando or Amadis?

During these hostilities, a languid and tedious negotiation<sup>79</sup> between the Franks and Moslems was started, and continued, and broken, and again resumed, and again broken. Some acts of royal courtesy, the gift of snow and fruit, the exchange of Norway hawks and Arabian horses, softened the asperity of religious war: from the vicissitude of success, the monarchs might learn to suspect that Heaven was neutral in the quarrel; nor, after the trial of each other, could either hope for a decisive victory.<sup>80</sup> The health both of Richard and Saladin appeared to be in a declining state; and they respectively suffered the evils of distant and domestic warfare: Plantagenet was impatient to punish a perfidious rival who had invaded Normandy in his absence; and the indefatigable sultan was subdued by the cries of the people, who was the victim, and of the soldiers, who were the instruments, of his martial zeal. The first demands of the king of England were the restitution of Jerusalem, Palestine, and the true cross; and he firmly declared, that himself and his brother pilgrims would end their lives in the pious labour, rather than return to Europe with ignominy and remorse. But the conscience of Saladin refused, without some weighty compensation, to restore the idols, or promote the idolatry, of the Christians: he asserted, with equal firmness, his religious and civil claim to the sovereignty of Palestine; descended on the importance and sanctity of Jerusalem; and rejected all terms of the establishment, or partition, of the Latins. The marriage which Richard proposed, of his sister with the sultan's brother, was defeated by the difference of faith: the princess abhorred the embraces of a Turk; and Adil, or Saphadin, would not easily renounce a plurality of wives. A personal interview was declined by Saladin, who alleged their mutual ignorance of each other's language; and the negotiation was managed with much art and delay by their interpreters and envoys. The final agreement was equally disapproved by the zealots of both parties, by the Roman pontiff and the caliph of Bagdad. It was stipulated that Jerusalem and the holy sepulchre should be open, without tribute or vexation, to the pilgrimage of the Latin Christians; that, after the demolition of Ascalon, they should inclusively possess the sea-coast from Jaffa to Tyre; that the count of Tripoli and the prince of Antioch should be comprised in the truce; and that, during three years and three months, all hostilities should cease. The principal chiefs of the two armies swore to the observance of the treaty; but the monarchs were satisfied with giving their word and their right hand; and the royal majesty was excused from an oath, which always implies some suspicion of falsehood and dishonour. Richard embarked for Europe, to seek a long captivity and a premature grave; and the space of a few months concluded the life and glories of Saladin. The Orientals describe his edifying death, which happened at Damascus; but they seem ignorant of the equal distribution of his alms among the three religions,<sup>81</sup> or of the display of a shroud, instead of a standard, to admonish the East of the instability of human greatness. The unity of empire was dissolved by his death; his sons were oppressed by the stronger arm of their uncle Saphadin; the hostile interests of the sultans of Egypt, Damascus, and Aleppo,<sup>82</sup> were again revived; and the Franks or Latins stood, and breathed, and hoped, in their fortresses along the Syrian coast.

The noblest monument of a conqueror's fame, and of the terror A.D. 1199-1216. Innocent III. which he inspired, is the Saladine tenth, a general tax, which was imposed on the laity, and even the clergy, of the Latin church for the service of the holy war. The practice was too lucrative to expire with the occasion; and this tribute became the foundation of all the tithes and tenths on ecclesiastical benefices, which have been granted by the Roman pontiffs to Catholic sovereigns, or reserved for the immediate use of the apostolic see.<sup>83</sup> This pecuniary emolument must have tended to increase the interest of the popes in the recovery of Palestine: after the death of Saladin they preached the crusade, by their epistles, their legates, and their missionaries; and the accomplishment of the pious work might have been expected from the zeal and talents of Innocent the Third.<sup>84</sup> Under that young and ambitious priest, the successors of St. Peter attained the full meridian of their greatness; and in a reign of eighteen years, he exercised a despotic command over the emperors and kings, whom he raised and deposed; over the nations, whom an interdict of months or years deprived, for the offence of their rulers, of the exercise of Christian worship. In the council of the Lateran he acted as the ecclesiastical, almost as the temporal, sovereign of the East and West. It was at the feet of his legate that John of England surrendered his Death of Saladin.

A.D. 1193,
March 4

Innocent III.

<sup>78</sup> The exploits of King Richard, from 1191 to 1195, are recorded by R. de B. p. 181-209; and Geoffrey of V. p. 140-141. The progress of the crusade, from the march of St. Albans to the capture of the city, is described in the chronicle of the province of Rouen, A.D. 1191-1195, p. 142-143. The Monarchie, p. 177-178, and the Chronique, p. 142-143, contain a full and accurate account of the events of this year.

<sup>79</sup> The negotiations between the two monarchs are described in the Chronique, p. 142-143, and in the Monarchie, p. 177-178. The Chronique, p. 142-143, and the Monarchie, p. 177-178, contain a full and accurate account of the events of this year.

<sup>80</sup> The negotiations between the two monarchs are described in the Chronique, p. 142-143, and in the Monarchie, p. 177-178. The Chronique, p. 142-143, and the Monarchie, p. 177-178, contain a full and accurate account of the events of this year.

<sup>81</sup> The account of the death of Saladin is given by R. de B. p. 181-209, and by Geoffrey of V. p. 140-141.

<sup>82</sup> The account of the death of Saladin is given by R. de B. p. 181-209, and by Geoffrey of V. p. 140-141.

<sup>83</sup> The account of the death of Saladin is given by R. de B. p. 181-209, and by Geoffrey of V. p. 140-141.

<sup>84</sup> The account of the death of Saladin is given by R. de B. p. 181-209, and by Geoffrey of V. p. 140-141.

erown; and Innocent may boast of the two most signal triumphs over sense and humanity, the establishment of transubstantiation, and the origin of the inquisition. At his voice, two crusades, the fourth and the fifth, were undertaken; but, except a king of Hungary, the princes of the second order were at the head of the pilgrims; the forces were inadequate to the design; nor did the effects correspond with the hopes and wishes of the pope and the people.

The fourth crusade was diverted from Syria to Constantinople; and the conquest of the Greek or Roman empire by the Latins will form the proper and important subject of the next chapter. In

The fourth crusade
A.D. 1205.

In the fifth,<sup>85</sup> two hundred thousand A.D. 1218. Franks were landed at the eastern mouth of the Nile. They reasonably hoped that Palestine must be subdued in Egypt, the seat and storehouse of the sultan; and, after a siege of sixteen months, the Moslems deplored the loss of Damietta. But the Christian army was ruined by the pride and insolence of the legate Pelagius, who, in the pope's name, assumed the character of general: the sickly Franks were encompassed by the waters of the Nile and the Oriental forces; and it was by the evacuation of Damietta that they obtained a safe retreat, some concessions for the pilgrims, and the tardy restitution of the doubtful relic of the true cross. The failure may in some measure be ascribed to the abuse and multiplication of the crusades, which were preached at the same time against the Pagans of Livonia, the Moors of Spain, the Albigeois of France, and the kings of Sicily of the Imperial family.<sup>86</sup> In these meritorious services, the volunteers might acquire at home the same spiritual indulgence, and a larger measure of temporal rewards; and even the popes, in their zeal against a domestic enemy, were sometimes tempted to forget the distress of their Syrian brethren. From the last age of the crusades they derived the occasional command of an army and revenue; and some deep reasoners have suspected that the whole enterprise, from the first synod of Placentia, was contrived and executed by the policy of Rome. The suspicion is not founded either in nature or in fact. The successors of St. Peter appear to have followed, rather than guided, the impulse of manners and prejudice; without much foresight of the seasons, or cultivation of the soil, they gathered the ripe and spontaneous fruits of the superstition of the times. They gathered these fruits without toil or personal danger: in the council of the Lateran, Innocent the Third declared an ambiguous resolution of animating the crusaders by his example; but the pilot of the sacred vessel could not abandon the helm; nor was Palestine ever blessed with the presence of a Roman pontiff.<sup>87</sup>

The persons, the families, and estates of the pilgrims, were under the immediate protection of the popes; and these spiritual patrons soon claimed the prerogative of directing their operations, and enforcing, by commands and censures, the accomplishment of their vow. Frederic the Second,<sup>88</sup> the grandson of Barbarossa, was successively the pupil, the enemy, and the victim of the church. At the age of twenty-one years, and in obedience to his guardian Innocent the Third, he assumed the cross; the same promise was repeated at his royal and Imperial coronations; and his marriage with the heiress of Jerusalem for ever bound him to defend the kingdom of his son Conrad. But as Frederic advanced in age and authority, he repented of the rash engagements of his youth: his liberal sense and knowledge taught him to despise the phantoms of superstition and the crowns of Asia. He no longer entertained the same reverence for the successors of Innocent; and his ambition was occupied by the restoration of the Italian monarchy from Sicily to the Alps. But the success of this project would have reduced the popes to their primitive simplicity; and, after the delays and excuses of twelve years, they urged the emperor, with entreaties and threats, to fix the time and place of his departure for Palestine. In the harbours of Sicily and Apulia, he prepared a fleet of one hundred galleys, and of one hundred vessels, that were framed to transport and land two thousand five hundred knights, with their horses and attendants; his vassals of Naples and Germany formed a powerful army; and the number of English crusaders was magnified to sixty thousand by the report of fame. But the inevitable, or affected, slowness of these mighty preparations, consumed the strength and provisions of the more indigent pilgrims; the multitude was thinned by sickness and desertion, and the sultry summer of Calabria anticipated the mischiefs of a Syrian campaign. At length the emperor hoisted sail at Brundisium, with a fleet and army of forty thousand men; but he kept the sea no more than three days; and his hasty retreat, which was ascribed by his friends to a grievous indisposition, was accused by his enemies as a voluntary and obstinate disobedience. For suspending his vow was Frederic excommunicated by Gregory the Ninth; for presuming, the next year, to accomplish his vow, he was again excommunicated by the same pope.<sup>89</sup> While he sailed under the banner of the cross, a crusade was preached against him in Italy; and after his return he was compelled to ask pardon for the injuries which he had suffered. The clergy and military orders of Palestine were previously instructed to renounce his communion and dispute his commands; and in his own kingdom, the emperor was

The emperor
Frederic II.
in Palestine.
A.D. 1228.

<sup>85</sup> See the 4th crusade, and the siege of Damietta, in Jacobus a Vitro cor. l. iii. p. 1124-1139, and the gesta Dei of Bonvassini, in ead. vitros. Bernardi Theaur. mus. in Script. Muratori, tom. vi. p. 87-91.

<sup>86</sup> To those who took the cross against Manfre, the pope (A.D. 1255) granted plenissimum peccatorum remissionem. Fideles mirabantur quod tantum eis promitteret pro sanguine Christianorum effundendo quantum pro cruce infidelium aliquando (Matthew Paris, p. 753). A high flight for the reason of the fifth century.

<sup>88</sup> The origin drawn from the Ital. tom. vi. p. 202, 203. T. tom. xvii. Ve (istoria civile d'Italia, tom. x.)

<sup>89</sup> Poor Muratori knows what to think, but knows not what to say. "Chano qui il capto, &c. p. 724."

<sup>89</sup> The orig. of Script. Rerum. 286, 291, 304. (Hist. Eccles. iii.) Giannone. iratori (Annali forced to consent that the orders of the camp should be issued in the name of God and of the Christian republic. Frederic entered Jerusalem in triumph; and with his own hands (for no priest would perform the office) he took the crown from the altar of the holy sepulchre. But the patriarch cast an interdict on the church which his presence had profaned; and the knights of the hospital and temple informed the sultan how easily he might be surprised and slain in his unguarded visit to the river Jordan. In such a state of fanaticism and faction, victory was hopeless, and defence was difficult; but the conclusion of an advantageous peace may be imputed to the discord of the Mahometans, and their personal esteem for the character of Frederic. The enemy of the church is accused of maintaining with the miscreants an intercourse of hospitality and friendship, unworthy of a Christian; of despising the barrenness of the land; and of indulging a profane thought, that if Jehovah had seen the kingdom of Naples, he never would have selected Palestine for the inheritance of his chosen people. Yet Frederic obtained from the sultan the restitution of Jerusalem, of Bethlem and Nazareth, of Tyre and Sidon: the Latins were allowed to inhabit and fortify the city; an equal code of civil and religious freedom was ratified for the sectaries of Jesus and those of Mahomet; and, while the former worshipped at the holy sepulchre, the latter might pray and preach in the mosque of the temple;<sup>9</sup> from whence the prophet undertook his nocturnal journey to heaven. The clergy deplored this scandalous toleration; and the weaker Moslems were gradually expelled; but every rational object of the crusades was accomplished without bloodshed; the churches were restored, the monasteries were replenished; and, in the space of fifteen years, the Latins of Jerusalem exceeded the number of six thousand. This peace and prosperity, for which they were ungrateful to their benefactor, was terminated by the irruption of the strange and savage hordes of Carizmians.<sup>11</sup> Flying from the arms of invasion of the Caspian sea.

 A. D. 1213.

Of the seven crusades, the two last were undertaken by Louis the Ninth, king of France; who lost his liberty in Egypt, and his life on the coast of Africa. Twenty-eight years after his death, he was canonised at Rome; and sixty-five miracles were readily found, and solemnly attested, to justify the claim of the royal saint.<sup>42</sup> The voice of history renders a more honourable testimony that he united the virtues of a king, an hero, and a man; that his martial spirit was tempered by the love of private and public justice; and that Louis was the father of his people, the friend of his neighbours, and the terror of the infidels. Superstition alone, in all the extent of her baleful influence,<sup>43</sup> corrupted his understanding and his heart; his devotion stooped to admire and imitate the begging friars of Francis and Dominic; he pursued with blind and cruel zeal the enemies of the faith; and the best of kings twice descended from his throne to seek the adventures of a spiritual knight-errant. A monkish historian would have been content to applaud the most despicable part of his character; but the noble and gallant Joinville,<sup>44</sup> who shared the friendship and captivity of Louis, has traced with the pencil of nature the free portrait of his virtues as well as of his failings. From this intimate knowledge, we may learn to suspect the political views of depressing their great vassals, which are so often imputed to the royal authors of the crusades. Above all the princes of the middle ages, Louis the Ninth successfully laboured to restore the prerogatives of the crown; but it was at home, and not in the East, that he acquired for himself and his posterity; his vow was the result of enthusiasm and sickness; and if he were the promoter, he was likewise the victim, of this holy madness. For the invasion of Egypt, France was exhausted of her troops and treasures; he covered the sea of Cyprus with eighteen hundred sails; the most modest enumeration amounts to fifty thousand men; and, if we might trust his own confession, as it is reported by Oriental vanity, he disembarked nine thousand five hundred horse, and one hundred and thirty thousand foot, who performed their pilgrimage under the shadow of his power.<sup>45</sup>

In complete armour, the oriflamme waving before him, Louis leaped foremost on the beach; and the strong city of Damietta, which had cost his predecessors a siege of sixteen months, was abandoned on the first assault by the trembling Moslems. But Damietta was the first and the last of his conquests; and in the fifth and sixth crusades, the same causes, almost on the same ground, were productive of similar calamities. <sup>6</sup>

90 The clergy artfully confounded the messiah or church of the temple with the Messiah, and their wilful error has deceived both Yeret and Mar-ton.

94 The irruption of the Carmanas, or Carmanas, is related by Matthew Paris (p. 546, 547), and by Joinville, Nages, and the Arabians (p. 111, 312, 191, 192, 198, 250).

<sup>52</sup> Read, if you can, the Lives and Miracles of St. Irenaeus, by the confessor of queen Margaret (p. 24) — (25) de Bonville, and I have ne s'y forme, descri-

sent et

9411 has two editions of Jouglaire, the one Paris, 1763 from a sale after the observations of this paper, the other Paris and Le Havre, 1764 most probably for the pure and authentic text, a MS of which has been recently discovered. The last editor proves, that the history of St. Louis was finished A. D. 1760, without explaining, or even adorning, the age of the author, who must have exceeded ninety years (Biblioth. de la Société d'agriculture de France, p. 375).

[illegible]

After a ruinous delay, which introduced into the camp the seeds of an epidemical disease, the Franks advanced from the sea-coast towards the capital of Egypt, and strove to surmount the unseasonable inundation of the Nile, which opposed their progress. Under the eye of their intrepid monarch, the barons and knights of France displayed their invincible contempt of danger and discipline: his brother, the count of Artois, stormed with inconsiderate valour the town of Massoura; and the carrier pigeons announced to the inhabitants of Cairo that all was lost. But a soldier, who afterwards usurped the sceptre, rallied the flying troops: the main body of the Christians was far behind their vanguard; and Artois was overpowered and slain. A shower of Greek fire was incessantly poured on the invaders; the Nile was commanded by the Egyptian galleys, the open country by the Arabs; all provisions were intercepted; each day aggravated the sickness and famine; and about the same time a retreat was found to be necessary and impracticable. The Oriental writers confess, that Louis might have escaped, if he would have deserted his subjects: he was made prisoner, with the greatest part of his nobles; all who could not redeem their lives by service or ransom were inhumanly massacred; and the walls of Cairo were decorated with a circle of Christian heads.<sup>97</sup> The king of France was loaded with chains; April 3–May 6, but the generous victor, a great-grandson of the brother of Saladin, sent a robe of honour to his royal captive, and his deliverance, with that of his soldiers, was obtained by the restitution of Damietta,<sup>98</sup> and the payment of four hundred thousand pieces of gold. In a soft and luxurious climate, the degenerate children of the companions of Nourreddin and Saladin were incapable of resisting the flower of European chivalry: they triumphed by the arms of their slaves or Mamalukes, the hardy natives of Tartary, who at a tender age had been purchased of the Syrian merchants, and were educated in the camp and palace of the sultan. But Egypt soon afforded a new example of the danger of pratorian bands; and the rage of these ferocious animals, who had been let loose on the strangers, was provoked to devour their benefactor. In the pride of conquest, Toman Shaw, the last of his race, was murdered by his Mamalukes; and the most daring of the assassins entered the chamber of the captive king, with drawn cineters, and their hands insubred in the blood of their sultan. The firmness of Louis commanded their respect; their avaiice prevailed over cruelty and zeal; the treaty was accomplished; and the king of France, with the relics of his army, was permitted to embark for Palestine. He wasted four years within the walls of Acre, unable to visit Jerusalem, and unwilling to return without glory to his native country.

The memory of his defeat excited Louis, after sixteen years of wisdom and repose, to undertake the seventh and last of the crusades. His finances were restored, his kingdom was enlarged, a new generation of warriors had arisen, and he embarked with fresh confidence at the head of six thousand horse and thirty thousand foot. The loss of Antioch had provoked the enterprise: a wild hope of baptizing the king of Tunis, tempted him to steer for the African coast; and the report of an immense treasure reconciled his troops to the delay of their voyage to the Holy Land. Instead of a pro-clyte, he found a siege; the French panted and died on the burning sands; St. Louis expired in his tent; and no sooner had he closed his eyes, than his son and successor gave the signal of the retreat.<sup>99</sup> "It is thus," says a lively writer, "that a Christian king died near the ruins of Carthage, waging war against the sectaries of Mahomet, in a land to which Dido had introduced the deities of Syria."<sup>101</sup>

A more unjust and absurd constitution cannot be devised, than that which condemns the natives of a country to perpetual servitude, under the arbitrary dominion of strangers and slaves. Yet such has been the state of Egypt above five hundred years. The most illustrious sultans of the Baharite and Borgite dynasties,<sup>102</sup> were themselves promoted from the Tartar and Circassian bands; and the four and twenty beys, or military chiefs, have ever been succeeded, not by their sons, but by their servants. They produce the great charter of their liberties, the treaty of Selim the First with the republic;<sup>103</sup> and the Othman emperor still accepts from Egypt a slight acknowledgment of tribute and subjection. With some breathing intervals of peace and order, the two dynasties are marked as a period of rapine and bloodshed;<sup>104</sup> but their throne, however shaken, reposed on the two pillars of discipline and valour; their sway extended over Egypt, Nubia, Arabia, and Syria; their Mamalukes were multiplied from eight hundred to twenty-five thousand horse; and their numbers were increased by a provincial militia of one hundred and seven thousand foot, and the occasional aid of sixty-

<sup>97</sup> Savary, in his admirable Lettres sur l'Égypte, has given a description of Damietta taken on the spot, p. 242–243, and a narrative of the expedition of St. Louis, tom. i. p. 300–311.

<sup>98</sup> For the capture of St. Louis, a million of Egypt was a kind of gratuity, but the sultans generously denied that gratuity to the king, who here is used by Juvénal at 100,000 French livres of his own time, and expressed by Matthew Paris by 100,000 in value of silver (this usage, see Journal).

<sup>99</sup> The idea of the errors to which Louis's troops were exposed is remarkably attested by Juvénal, p. 77, 78, and does not appear to me to be contradicted by St. Louis's Journal (the Journal is tom. ii. p. 389, 397). The Mamelukes themselves were strange, rebels, and equis, they had felt his valor, they hoped his conversion, and such a nation, which was not so seconded, might be made, perhaps by a secret Christian, in their tumultuous isle.

<sup>100</sup> See the expedition in the Annals of St. Louis, by William de Nangis, p. 270–281, and the Arabic Extracts, p. 545, 553, of the Journal edition of Juvénal.

<sup>101</sup> Voltaire, Hist. Generale, tom. ii. p. 391.

<sup>102</sup> The Chronique of the two dynasties of Mamelukes, the Baharites, a tribe of Turks of Kipchak, and the Borgites, Circassians, is given by P. de La Harpe, of Turbithurg, p. 71 and De Guignes, tom. i. p. 261–270, their history, from Alutteda, M. enri, &c. to the decline of the sixth century, by the same M. de Guignes, tom. ii. p. 110, 128.

<sup>103</sup> Savary, Lettres sur l'Égypte, tom. i. lettre xv. p. 189–208. I much question the authenticity of this copy, yet it is true, that Sultan Selim concluded a treaty with the Circassians or Mamelukes of Egypt, and left them in possession of arms, riches, and power. See a new Abrégé de l'Histoire Ottomane, composed in Egypt, and translated by M. de Genon, tom. i. p. 55–58, Paris, 1781, a curious, and entire, and curious history.

<sup>104</sup> St. Louis, upon regnum acceptum tempus respiciens, presertim quod iam prout superius dicitur, p. 242, n. 10, inquit, et regnum reuertitur (Al. Juvénal and De Guignes, p. 71). The ruin of Mohammed (A. D. 1311–1314) affords an happy exception (De Guignes, tom. ii. p. 208–210).

His death before Tunis, in the seventh crusade.
A. D. 1270, Aug. 25.

The Mamalukes of Egypt.
A. D. 1250–1517.

six thousand Arabs.<sup>1, 5</sup> Princes of such power and spirit could not long endure on their coast an hostile and independent nation; and if the ruin of the Franks was postponed about forty years, they were indebted to the ears of an unsettled reign, to the invasion of the Mogols, and to the occasional aid of some warlike pilgrims. Among these, the English reader will observe the name of our first Edward, who assumed the cross in the lifetime of his father Henry. At the head of a thousand soldiers, the future conqueror of Wales and Scotland delivered Acre from a siege; marched as far as Nazareth with an army of nine thousand men; ennobled the fame of his uncle Richard; extorted, by his valour, a ten years' truce; and escaped, with a dangerous wound, from the danger of a fanatic assassin.<sup>1-6</sup>

Antioch,<sup>107</sup> whose situation had been less exposed to the calamities of the holy war, was finally occupied and ruined by Bonduchar, or Bilbars, sultan of Egypt and Syria; and the Latin principality was extinguished; and the first seat of the Christian name was despoiled by the slaughter of seven-ten, and the captivity of one hundred thousand of her inhabitants. The maritime towns of Lacedicea, Gabala, Tripoli, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, and Jaffa, and the stronger castles of the Hospitallers and Templars, successively fell; and the whole existence of the Franks was confined to the city and colony of St. John of Acre, which is sometimes described by the more classic title of Ptolemais.

After the loss of Jerusalem, Acre,<sup>118</sup> which is distant about seventy miles, became the metropolis of the Latin Christians, and was adorned with strong and stately buildings, with aqueducts, an artificial port, and a double wall. The population was increased by the incessant streams of pilgrims and fugitives, in the pauses of hostility the trade of the East and West was attracted to this convenient station; and the market could offer the produce of every clime and the interpreters of every tongue. But in this conflux of nations, every vice was propagated and practised: of all the disciples of Jesus and Mahomet, the male and female inhabitants of Acre were esteemed the most corrupt; nor could the abuse of religion be corrected by the discipline of law. The city had many sovereigns, and no government. The kings of Jerusalem and Cyprus, of the house of Lusignan, the princes of Antioch, the counts of Tripoli and Sidon, the great masters of the hospital, the temple, and the Teutonic order, the republics of Venice, Genoa, and Pisa, the pope's legate, the kings of France and England, assumed an independent command. seventeen tribunals exercised the power of life and death; every criminal was protected in the adjacent quarter; and the perpetual jealousy of the nations often burst forth in acts of violence and blood. Some adventurers, who disowned the ensign of the cross, compensated their want of pay by the plunder of the Mahometan villages. nineteen Syrian merchants, who traded under the public faith, were despoiled and hanged by the Christians; and the denial of satisfaction justified the arms of the sultan Khalil. He marched against Acre, at the head of sixty thousand horse and one hundred and forty thousand foot; his train of artillery if I may use the word, was numerous and weighty; the separate timbers of a single engine were transported in one hundred wagons; and the royal historian Abulfeda, who served with the troops of Hama, was himself a spectator of the holy war. Whatever might be the vices of the Franks, their courage was rekindled by enthusiasm and despair; but they were torn by the discord of seventeen chiefs, and overwhelmed on all sides by the powers of the sultan. After a siege of thirty-three days, the double wall was forced by the Moslems; the principal tower yielded to their engines; the Mandukes made a general assault; the city was stormed; and death or slavery was the lot of sixty thousand Christians. The convent, or rather fortress, of the Templars resisted three days longer; but the great master was pierced with an arrow; and, of five hundred knights, only ten were left alive, less happy than the victims of the sword, if they lived to suffer on a scaffold in the unjust and cruel proscription of the whole order. The king of Jerusalem, the patriarch, and the great master of the hospital, effected their retreat to the shore; but the sea was rough, the vessels were insufficient; and great numbers of the fugitives were drowned before they could reach the isle of Cyprus, which might comfort Lusignan for the loss of Palestine. By the command of the sultan, the churches and fortifications of the Latin cities were demolished; a motive of avarice or fear still opened the holy sepulchre to some devout and defenceless pilgrims; and a mournful and solitary silence prevailed along the coast which had so long resounded with the world's de-

THE LOSS OF
ACRE, AND THE FALL OF THE HOLY LAND,
A.D. 1187.

DATE, 169

CHAP. LX.

Schism of the Greeks and Latins. — State of Constantinople. — Revolt of the Bulgarians. — Isaac Angelus dethroned by his Brother Alexius. — Origin of the Fourth Crusade. — Alliance of the French and Venetians with the Son of Isaac. — The mutual Expedition to Constantinople. — The two Sieges and final Conquest of the City by the Latins.

The restoration of the Western empire by Charlemagne was speedily followed by the separation of the Greek and Latin churches.<sup>1</sup> A religious and national

105 They are now reduced to 8,000. But the expense of each Mameluke may be rated at 100 m. and Egypt groans under the avarice and insolence of these strangers. (Voyages de Volney, t. iii. p. 204, 1787.)

100. See Charles's History of England, vol. II, p. 174, 175 and his original authors, Thomas Wikes and Walter Hemmingsford (1570-74, 55), in Gales Collection (from II, p. 67-68, 69-70). They are both ignorant of the princess Eleanor's part in the murder of the poor wound, and save our hero at the risk of her own life.

The loss of Aure and the
H. 1201.
A. H. 1201,
May 18.

Scheme of the Lesson

The State of Arizona is numbered as 11 the other pages of the forms are given; especially useful in Arizona is the Arizona

1 In two cases,  $\alpha = 0$  and  $\beta = 1$ , the expression for  $\beta$  is  $\beta = 1 - \alpha$ . In these cases,  $\beta$  is not a function of  $\alpha$  and the expression for  $\beta$  is  $\beta = 1$ .

Photius,<sup>8</sup> an ambitious layman, the captain of the guards and principal secretary, was promoted by merit and favour to the more desirable office of patriarch of Constantinople. In science, even ecclesiastical science, he surpassed the clergy of the age; and the purity of his morals has never been impeached: but his ordination was hasty, his rise was irregular; and Ignatius, his abdicated predecessor, was yet supported by the public compassion and the obstinacy of his adherents. They appealed to the tribunal of Nicholas the First, one of the proudest and most aspiring of the Roman pontiffs, who embraced the welcome opportunity of judging and condemning his rival of the East. Their quarrel was embittered by a conflict of jurisdiction over the king and nation of the Bulgarians; nor was their recent conversion to Christianity of much avail to either prelate, unless he could number the proselytes among the subjects of his power.

With the aid of his court, the Greek patriarch was victorious; but in the furious contest he deposed in his turn the successor of St. Peter, and involved the Latin church in the reproach of heresy and schism. Photius sacrificed the peace of the world to a short and precarious reign: he fell with his patron, the Cæsar Bardas; and Basil the Macedonian performed an act of justice in the restoration of Ignatius, whose age and dignity had not been sufficiently respected. From his monastery, or prison, Photius solicited the favour of the emperor by pathetic complaints and artful flattery; and the eyes of his rival were scarcely closed, when he was again restored to the throne of Constantinople. After the death of Basil, he experienced the vicissitudes of courts and the ingratitude of a royal pupil: the patriarch was again deposed, and in his last solitary hours he might regret the freedom of a secular and studious life. In each revolution, the breath, the nod, of the sovereign had been accepted by a submissive clergy; and a synod of three hundred bishops was always prepared to hail the triumph, or to stigmatise the fall, of the holy, or the execrable Photius.<sup>9</sup> By a delusive promise of succour or reward, the popes were tempted to countenance these various proceedings; and the synods of Constantinople were ratified by their epistles or legates. But the court and the people, Ignatius and Photius, were equally adverse to their claims; their ministers were insulted or imprisoned; the procession of the Holy Ghost was forgotten; Bulgaria was for ever annexed to the Byzantine throne; and the schism was prolonged by their rigid censure of all the multiplied ordinations of an irregular patriarch. The darkness and corruption of the tenth century suspended the intercourse, without reconciling the minds, of the two nations. But when the Norman sword restored the churches of Apulia to the jurisdiction of Rome, the departing flock was warned, by a petulant epistle of the Greek patriarch, to avoid and abhor the errors of the Latins. The rising majesty of Rome could no longer brook the insolence of a rebel; and Michael Cerularius was excommunicated in the heart of Constantinople by the pope's legates. Shaking the dust from their feet, they deposited on the altar of St. Sophia a dreadful anathema,<sup>10</sup> which enumerates the seven mortal heresies of the Greeks, and devotes the guilty teachers, and their unhappy secretaries, to the eternal society of the devil and his angels. According to the emergencies of the church and state, a friendly correspondence was sometimes resumed; the language of charity and concord was sometimes affected; but the Greeks have never recanted their errors; the popes have never repealed their sentence; and from this thunderbolt we may date the consummation of the schism. It was enlarged by each ambitious step of the Roman pontiffs: the emperors blushed and trembled at the ignominious fate of their royal brethren of Germany; and the people was scandalised by the temporal power and military life of the Latin clergy.<sup>11</sup>

The aversion of the Greeks and Latins was nourished and manifested in the three first expeditions to the Holy Land. Alexius Comnenus contrived the absence at least of the formidable pilgrims: his successors, Manuel and Isaac Angelus, conspired with the Moslems for the ruin of the greatest princes of the Franks; and their crooked and malignant policy was seconded by the active and voluntary obedience of every order of their subjects. Of this hostile temper, a large portion may doubtless be ascribed to the difference of language, dress, and manners, which severs and alienates the nations of the globe. The pride, as well as the prudence, of the sovereign was deeply wounded by the intrusion of foreign armies, that claimed a right of traversing his dominions, and passing under the walls of his capital; his subjects were insulted and plundered by the rude strangers of the West; and the hatred of the pusillanimous Greeks was sharpened by secret envy of the bold and pious enterprises of the Franks. But these profane causes of national enmity were fortified and inflamed by the venom of religious zeal. Instead of a kind embrace, an hospitable reception, from their Christian brethren of the East, every tongue was taught to repeat the names of schismatic and heretic, more odious to an orthodox ear than those of pagan and infidel: instead of being loved for the general conformity of faith and worship, they were abhorred for some rules of discipline, some questions of theology, in which themselves or their teachers might differ from the Oriental church. In the crusade of Louis the Seventh, the Greek clergy washed and purified the altars which had been defiled by the sacrifice of a French priest. The companions of Frederic Barbarossa deplore the injuries which they endured, both in word and deed, from the peculiar rancour of the bishops and monks. Their prayers and sermons excited

The popes excommunicate the patriarch of Constantinople and the Greeks. A. D. 1054, July 10.

Enmity of the Greeks and Latins. A. D. 1100-1200.

<sup>8</sup> The xth volume of the Venice edition of the Constitutiones contains the acts of the synods, and breve de Photio, times in 1042-43, with a short notice of the schism of Photius, b. 1, in c. 1 and 2.

<sup>9</sup> The synod of Constantinople, held in the year 1059, is a dispute of the general council, the last in series of the Eastern schism, as mentioned by the Roman church. See the Constitutiones, b. 1, c. 1, and 2, of the years 8 and 9, in c. 1, in 1059. However, it is not clear that they were far from it, but it is not so.

<sup>10</sup> See this anathema in the Constitutiones, tom. xi. p. 147-149.

<sup>11</sup> Anecdotes of the schism of 1054, p. 74-75, represents the anathema, and the Constitutiones, b. 1, c. 1, in 1054, for the Greek, A. D. 1100, and the Latin, in 1200. The story of the schism is told in the Constitutiones, b. 1, c. 1, in 1054, and in the Constitutiones, b. 1, c. 1, in 1054, and in the Constitutiones, b. 1, c. 1, in 1054.

far as Stagyra in Macedonia; but the fugitive, without an object or a follower, was arrested, brought back to Constantinople, deprived of his eyes, and confined in a lonesome tower, on a scanty allowance of bread and water. At the moment of the revolution, his son Alexius, whom he educated in the hope of empire, was twelve years of age. He was spared by the usurper, and reduced to attend his triumph both in peace and war; but as the army was encamped on the sea-shore, an Italian vessel facilitated the escape of the royal youth; and, in the disguise of a common sailor, he eluded the search of his enemies, passed the Hellespont, and found a secure refuge in the Isle of Sicily. After saluting the threshold of the apostles, and imploring the protection of pope Innocent the Third, Alexius accepted the kind invitation of his sister Irene, the wife of Philip of Swabia, king of the Romans. But in his passage through Italy, he heard that the flower of Western chivalry was assembled at Venice for the deliverance of the Holy Land; and a ray of hope was kindled in his bosom, that their invincible swords might be employed in his father's restoration.

About ten or twelve years after the loss of Jerusalem, the nobles of France were again summoned to the holy war by the voice of a third prophet, less extravagant, perhaps, than Peter the Hermit, but far below St. Bernard in the merit of an orator and a statesman. An illiterate priest of the neighbourhood of Paris, Fulk of Neuilly,<sup>25</sup> forsook his parochial duty, to assume the more flattering character of a popular and itinerant missionary. The fame of his sanctity and miracles was spread over the land; he declaimed, with severity and vehemence, against the vices of the age; and his sermons, which he preached in the streets of Paris, converted the robbers, the usurers, the prostitutes, and even the doctors and scholars of the university. No sooner did Innocent the Third ascend the chair of St. Peter, than he proclaimed in Italy, Germany, and France, the obligation of a new crusade.<sup>26</sup> The eloquent pontiff described the ruin of Jerusalem, the triumph of the Pagans, and the shame of Christendom: his liberality proposed the redemption of sins, a plenary indulgence to all who should serve in Palestine, either a year in person, or two years by a substitute;<sup>27</sup> and among his legates and orators who blew the sacred trumpet, Fulk of Neuilly was the loudest and most successful. The situation of the principal monarchs was adverse to the pious summons. The emperor Frederic the Second was a child; and his kingdom of Germany was disputed by the rival houses of Brunswick and Swabia, the memorable factions of the Guelphs and Ghibelines. Philip Augustus of France had performed, and could not be persuaded to renew, the perilous vow; but as he was not less ambitious of praise than of power, he cheerfully instituted a perpetual fund for the defence of the Holy Land. Richard of England was satiated with the glory and misfortunes of his first adventure, and he presumed to deride the exhortations of Fulk of Neuilly, who was not abashed in the presence of kings. "You advise me," said Plantagenet, "to dismiss my three daughters, pride, avarice, and incontinence: I bequeath them to the most deserving; my pride to the knights templars, my avarice to the monks of Cîteaux, and my incontinence to the prelates." But the preacher was heard and obeyed by the great vassals, the princes of the second order; and Theobald, or Thibaut, count of Champagne, was the foremost in the holy race. The valiant youth, at the age of twenty-two years, was encouraged by the domestic examples of his father, who marched in the second crusade, and of his elder brother, who had ended his days in Palestine with the title of King of Jerusalem: two thousand two hundred owed service and homage to his peerage.<sup>28</sup> the nobles of Champagne excelled in all the exercises of war;<sup>29</sup> and, by his marriage with the heiress of Navarre, Thibaut could draw a band of hardy Gascons from either side of the Pyrenean mountains. His companion in arms was Louis, count of Blois and Chartres; like himself of regal lineage, for both the princes were nephews, at the same time, of the kings of France and England. In a crowd of prelates and barons, who imitated their zeal, I distinguish the birth and merit of Matthew of Montmorency; the famous Simon of Montfort, the scourge of the Albigeois; and a valiant noble, Jeffrey of Villehardouin,<sup>30</sup> marshal of Champagne,<sup>31</sup> who has condescended, in the rude idiom of his age and country,<sup>32</sup> to write or dictate an original narrative of the councils and actions in which he bore a memorable part. At the same time, Baldwin count of Flanders, who had married the sister of Thibaut, assumed the cross at Bruges, with his brother Henry and the principal knights and citizens of that rich and industrious province.<sup>33</sup> The vow which the chiefs had pronounced in churches, they ratified in tournaments: the operations of the embellished by the barons of France.

<sup>25</sup> See Fleury, Hist. Eccles. tom. xvi. p. 26. See and Villehardouin, No. 1 with the observations of DuCange, which I always mean to quote with the original text.

<sup>26</sup> The contemporary life of pope Innocent III. published by Buzurg and Murison (see post. p. 119) is most valuable for the important and original documents which are inserted in the text. The bull of the crusade may be read, c. 51, 55.

<sup>27</sup> Force que cil pardon, fut au crin, si ven eurent mult li cœurs des gentz, et mult s'en croissent, porre que li parlois eut si gran Villehardouin, No. 1. Our philosophers may refine on the causes of the crusades, but such were the genuine feelings of a French knight.

<sup>28</sup> This number of 2200, of which 1500 owed him homage, was enrolled in the church of St. Stephen at Troyes, and attested A. D. 1215, by the marshal and butler of Champagne (DuCange, Observ. p. 234).

<sup>29</sup> Campana, c. 10. multos prolegos singlars, excellit . . . in t. romis . . . prolegos . . . armis, &c. DuCange, p. 219, from the old Chronicle of Jerusalem, A. D. 1177-1199.

<sup>30</sup> The name of Villehardouin was taken from a village and castle in the diocese of Troyes, near the river Aube, between Bar and Arcet. The family was ancient and noble: the elder branch of our history existed after the year 1400, the younger, which secured the primacy of Achaia, merged in the house of Savoy (DuCange, p. 235-245).

<sup>31</sup> This office was held by his father and his descendants, but Thibaut has not hunted it with his usual sagacity. I find that, in the year 1226, it was in the hands of Countess, but these provisions I have been long since eclipsed by the national marshals of France.

<sup>32</sup> This language, of which I shall produce some specimens, is explained by Vossius and DuCange in a version and obscurity. The president Des Broches (Mémoires des Langues, tom. ii. p. 83) gives it as the example of a language which has ceased to be French, and is understood only by grammarians.

<sup>33</sup> His son, and his own sequel, moi qui ceste œuvre dicta (No. 62, &c.) may justify the suspicion more probable than Mr. Wod's on Homer, that he could neither read nor write. Yet Champagne may boast of the two first historians, the noble authors of Errores, Vie de saint Louis, and le Roman.

<sup>34</sup> The crusade and reign of the counts of Flanders, Baldwin and his son, are the subject of a curious history by the Jesuit DuRoi, which is not only published at Turnay, 1659, in 4to, which I have only seen with the eyes of DuCange.

war were debated in full and frequent assemblies; and it was resolved to seek the deliverance of Palestine in Egypt, a country, since Saladin's death, which was almost ruined by famine and civil war. But the fate of so many royal armies displayed the toils and perils of a land expedition; and, if the Flemings dwelt along the ocean, the French barons were destitute of ships and ignorant of navigation. They embraced the wise resolution of choosing six deputies or representatives, of whom Villehardouin was one, with a discretionary trust to direct the motions, and to pledge the faith, of the whole confederacy. The maritime states of Italy were alone possessed of the means of transporting the holy warriors with their arms and horses; and the six deputies proceeded to Venice to solicit, on motives of piety or interest, the aid of that powerful republic.

In the invasion of Italy by Attila, I have mentioned<sup>33</sup> the flight of the Venetians from the fallen cities of the continent, and their obscure shelter in the chain of islands that line the extremity of the Adriatic Gulf. In the midst of the waters, free, indigent, laborious, and inaccessible, they gradually coalesced into a republic: the first foundations of Venice were laid in the island of Riulto; and the annual election of the twelve tribunes was superseded by the permanent office of a duke or doge. On the verge of the two empires, the Venetians exult in the belief of primitive and perpetual independence.<sup>36</sup> Against the Latins, their antique freedom has been asserted by the sword, and may be justified by the pen. Charlemagne himself resigned all claims of sovereignty to the islands of the Adriatic Gulf; his son Pepin was repulsed in the attacks of the luggans or canals, too deep for the cavalry, and too shallow for the vessels; and in every age, under the German Cæsars, the lands of the republic have been clearly distinguished from the kingdom of Italy. But the inhabitants of Venice were considered by themselves, by strangers, and by their sovereigns, as an inalienable portion of the Greek empire;<sup>37</sup> in the ninth and tenth centuries, the proofs of their subjection are numerous, and unquestionable; and the vain titles, the servile honours, the Byzantine court, so ambitionly solicited by their dukes, would have degraded the magistrates of a free people. But the bands of this dependence, which was never absolute or rigid, were imperceptibly relaxed by the ambition of Venice and the weakness of Constantinople. Obedience was softened into respect, privilege ripened into prerogative, and the freedom of domestic government was fortified by the independence of foreign dominion. The maritime cities of Istria and Dalmatia bowed to the sovereigns of the Adriatic; and when they armed against the Normans in the cause of Alexius, the emperor applied, not to the duty of his subjects, but to the gratitude and generosity of his faithful allies. The sea was their patrimony; in the western parts of the Mediterranean, from Tuscany to Gibraltar, were indeed abandoned to their rivals of Pisa and Genoa; but the Venetians acquired an early and lucrative share of the commerce of Greece and Egypt. Their riches increased with the increasing demand of Europe: their manufactures of silk and glass, perhaps the institution of their bank, are of high antiquity; and they enjoyed the fruits of their industry in the magnificence of public and private life. To assert her flag, to avenge her injuries, to protect the freedom of navigation, the republic could launch and man a fleet of an hundred galleys; and the Greeks, the Saracens, and the Normans, were encountered by her naval arms. The Franks of Syria were assisted by the Venetians in the reduction of the sea-coast; but their zeal was neither blind nor disinterested; and in the conquest of Tyre, they shared the sovereignty of a city, the first seat of the commerce of the world. The policy of Venice was marked by the avarice of a trading, and the insolence of a maritime, power; yet her ambition was prudent; nor did she often forget that if armed galleys were the effect and safeguard, merchant vessels were the cause and supply, of her greatness. In her religion, she avoided the schism of the Greeks, without yielding a servile obedience to the Roman pontiff; and a free intercourse with the infidels of every clime appears to have allayed betimes the fever of superstition. Her primitive government was a loose mixture of democracy and monarchy: the doge was elected by the votes of the general assembly; as long as he was popular and successful, he reigned with the pomp and authority of a prince; but in the frequent revolutions of the state, he was deposed, or banished, or slain, by the justice or injustice of the multitude. The twelfth century produced the first rudiments of the wise and jealous aristocracy, which has reduced the doge to a pageant, and the people to a cipher.<sup>39</sup>

When the six ambassadors of the French pilgrims arrived at Venice, they were hospitably entertained in the palace of St. Mark, by the reigning duke: his name was Henry Dandolo;<sup>40</sup> and he shone

70 H. STORV &amp; P. TOUPEL 1986, 1987

The first foundation of independence of Mexico, and Spain's invasion, are shown of by the first foundation in A.D. 1519. The second, and third, are shown of by the second foundation in A.D. 1521. The third, and fourth, are shown of by the third foundation in A.D. 1522. The fourth, and fifth, are shown of by the fourth foundation in A.D. 1523. The fifth, and sixth, are shown of by the fifth foundation in A.D. 1524. The sixth, and seventh, are shown of by the sixth foundation in A.D. 1525. The seventh, and eighth, are shown of by the seventh foundation in A.D. 1526. The eighth, and ninth, are shown of by the eighth foundation in A.D. 1527. The ninth, and tenth, are shown of by the ninth foundation in A.D. 1528. The tenth, and eleventh, are shown of by the tenth foundation in A.D. 1529. The eleventh, and twelfth, are shown of by the eleventh foundation in A.D. 1530. The twelfth, and thirteenth, are shown of by the twelfth foundation in A.D. 1531. The thirteenth, and fourteenth, are shown of by the thirteenth foundation in A.D. 1532. The fourteenth, and fifteenth, are shown of by the fourteenth foundation in A.D. 1533. The fifteenth, and sixteenth, are shown of by the fifteenth foundation in A.D. 1534. The sixteenth, and seventeenth, are shown of by the sixteenth foundation in A.D. 1535. The seventeenth, and eighteenth, are shown of by the seventeenth foundation in A.D. 1536. The eighteenth, and nineteenth, are shown of by the eighteenth foundation in A.D. 1537. The nineteenth, and twentieth, are shown of by the nineteenth foundation in A.D. 1538. The twentieth, and twenty-first, are shown of by the twentieth foundation in A.D. 1539. The twenty-first, and twenty-second, are shown of by the twenty-first foundation in A.D. 1540. The twenty-second, and twenty-third, are shown of by the twenty-second foundation in A.D. 1541. The twenty-third, and twenty-fourth, are shown of by the twenty-third foundation in A.D. 1542. The twenty-fourth, and twenty-fifth, are shown of by the twenty-fourth foundation in A.D. 1543. The twenty-fifth, and twenty-sixth, are shown of by the twenty-fifth foundation in A.D. 1544. The twenty-sixth, and twenty-seventh, are shown of by the twenty-sixth foundation in A.D. 1545. The twenty-seventh, and twenty-eighth, are shown of by the twenty-seventh foundation in A.D. 1546. The twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth, are shown of by the twenty-eighth foundation in A.D. 1547. The twenty-ninth, and thirtieth, are shown of by the twenty-ninth foundation in A.D. 1548. The thirtieth, and thirty-first, are shown of by the thirtieth foundation in A.D. 1549. The thirty-first, and thirty-second, are shown of by the thirty-first foundation in A.D. 1550. The thirty-second, and thirty-third, are shown of by the thirty-second foundation in A.D. 1551. The thirty-third, and thirty-fourth, are shown of by the thirty-third foundation in A.D. 1552. The thirty-fourth, and thirty-fifth, are shown of by the thirty-fourth foundation in A.D. 1553. The thirty-fifth, and thirty-sixth, are shown of by the thirty-fifth foundation in A.D. 1554. The thirty-sixth, and thirty-seventh, are shown of by the thirty-sixth foundation in A.D. 1555. The thirty-seventh, and thirty-eighth, are shown of by the thirty-seventh foundation in A.D. 1556. The thirty-eighth, and thirty-ninth, are shown of by the thirty-eighth foundation in A.D. 1557. The thirty-ninth, and fortieth, are shown of by the thirty-ninth foundation in A.D. 1558. The fortieth, and forty-first, are shown of by the fortieth foundation in A.D. 1559. The forty-first, and forty-second, are shown of by the forty-first foundation in A.D. 1560. The forty-second, and forty-third, are shown of by the forty-second foundation in A.D. 1561. The forty-third, and forty-fourth, are shown of by the forty-third foundation in A.D. 1562. The forty-fourth, and forty-fifth, are shown of by the forty-fourth foundation in A.D. 1563. The forty-fifth, and forty-sixth, are shown of by the forty-fifth foundation in A.D. 1564. The forty-sixth, and forty-seventh, are shown of by the forty-sixth foundation in A.D. 1565. The forty-seventh, and forty-eighth, are shown of by the forty-seventh foundation in A.D. 1566. The forty-eighth, and forty-ninth, are shown of by the forty-eighth foundation in A.D. 1567. The forty-ninth, and fiftieth, are shown of by the forty-ninth foundation in A.D. 1568. The fiftieth, and fifty-first, are shown of by the fifty-first foundation in A.D. 1569. The fifty-first, and fifty-second, are shown of by the fifty-second foundation in A.D. 1570. The fifty-second, and fifty-third, are shown of by the fifty-third foundation in A.D. 1571. The fifty-third, and fifty-fourth, are shown of by the fifty-fourth foundation in A.D. 1572. The fifty-fourth, and fifty-fifth, are shown of by the fifty-fifth foundation in A.D. 1573. The fifty-fifth, and fifty-sixth, are shown of by the fifty-sixth foundation in A.D. 1574. The fifty-sixth, and fifty-seventh, are shown of by the fifty-seventh foundation in A.D. 1575. The fifty-seventh, and fifty-eighth, are shown of by the fifty-eighth foundation in A.D. 1576. The fifty-eighth, and fifty-ninth, are shown of by the fifty-ninth foundation in A.D. 1577. The fifty-ninth, and sixtieth, are shown of by the sixtieth foundation in A.D. 1578. The sixtieth, and sixty-first, are shown of by the sixty-first foundation in A.D. 1579. The sixty-first, and sixty-second, are shown of by the sixty-second foundation in A.D. 1580. The sixty-second, and sixty-third, are shown of by the sixty-third foundation in A.D. 1581. The sixty-third, and sixty-fourth, are shown of by the sixty-fourth foundation in A.D. 1582. The sixty-fourth, and sixty-fifth, are shown of by the sixty-fifth foundation in A.D. 1583. The sixty-fifth, and sixty-sixth, are shown of by the sixty-sixth foundation in A.D. 1584. The sixty-sixth, and sixty-seventh, are shown of by the sixty-seventh foundation in A.D. 1585. The sixty-seventh, and sixty-eighth, are shown of by the sixty-eighth foundation in A.D. 1586. The sixty-eighth, and sixty-ninth, are shown of by the sixty-ninth foundation in A.D. 1587. The sixty-ninth, and seventieth, are shown of by the seventieth foundation in A.D. 1588. The seventieth, and seventy-first, are shown of by the seventy-first foundation in A.D. 1589. The seventy-first, and seventy-second, are shown of by the seventy-second foundation in A.D. 1590. The seventy-second, and seventy-third, are shown of by the seventy-third foundation in A.D. 1591. The seventy-third, and seventy-fourth, are shown of by the seventy-fourth foundation in A.D. 1592. The seventy-fourth, and seventy-fifth, are shown of by the seventy-fifth foundation in A.D. 1593. The seventy-fifth, and seventy-sixth, are shown of by the seventy-sixth foundation in A.D. 1594. The seventy-sixth, and seventy-seventh, are shown of by the seventy-seventh foundation in A.D. 1595. The seventy-seventh, and seventy-eighth, are shown of by the seventy-eighth foundation in A.D. 1596. The seventy-eighth, and seventy-ninth, are shown of by the seventy-ninth foundation in A.D. 1597. The seventy-ninth, and eightieth, are shown of by the eightieth foundation in A.D. 1598. The eightieth, and eighty-first, are shown of by the eighty-first foundation in A.D. 1599. The eighty-first, and eighty-second, are shown of by the eighty-second foundation in A.D. 1600. The eighty-second, and eighty-third, are shown of by the eighty-third foundation in A.D. 1601. The eighty-third, and eighty-fourth, are shown of by the eighty-fourth foundation in A.D. 1602. The eighty-fourth, and eighty-fifth, are shown of by the eighty-fifth foundation in A.D. 1603. The eighty-fifth, and eighty-sixth, are shown of by the eighty-sixth foundation in A.D. 1604. The eighty-sixth, and eighty-seventh, are shown of by the eighty-seventh foundation in A.D. 1605. The eighty-seventh, and eighty-eighth, are shown of by the eighty-eighth foundation in A.D. 1606. The eighty-eighth, and eighty-ninth, are shown of by the eighty-ninth foundation in A.D. 1607. The eighty-ninth, and ninetieth, are shown of by the ninetieth foundation in A.D. 1608. The ninetieth, and one hundred, are shown of by the one hundred foundation in A.D. 1609. The one hundred, and one hundred and one, are shown of by the one hundred and one foundation in A.D. 1610. The one hundred and one, and one hundred and two, are shown of by the one hundred and two foundation in A.D. 1611. The one hundred and two, and one hundred and three, are shown of by the one hundred and three foundation in A.D. 1612. The one hundred and three, and one hundred and four, are shown of by the one hundred and four foundation in A.D. 1613. The one hundred and four, and one hundred and five, are shown of by the one hundred and five foundation in A.D. 1614. The one hundred and five, and one hundred and six, are shown of by the one hundred and six foundation in A.D. 1615. The one hundred and six, and one hundred and seven, are shown of by the one hundred and seven foundation in A.D. 1616. The one hundred and seven, and one hundred and eight, are shown of by the one hundred and eight foundation in A.D. 1617. The one hundred and eight, and one hundred and nine, are shown of by the one hundred and nine foundation in A.D. 1618. The one hundred and nine, and one hundred and ten, are shown of by the one hundred and ten foundation in A.D. 1619. The one hundred and ten, and one hundred and eleven, are shown of by the one hundred and eleven foundation in A.D. 1620. The one hundred and eleven, and one hundred and twelve, are shown of by the one hundred and twelve foundation in A.D. 1621. The one hundred and twelve, and one hundred and thirteen, are shown of by the one hundred and thirteen foundation in A.D. 1622. The one hundred and thirteen, and one hundred and fourteen, are shown of by the one hundred and fourteen foundation in A.D. 1623. The one hundred and fourteen, and one hundred and fifteen, are shown of by the one hundred and fifteen foundation in A.D. 1624. The one hundred and fifteen, and one hundred and sixteen, are shown of by the one hundred and sixteen foundation in A.D. 1625. The one hundred and sixteen, and one hundred and seventeen, are shown of by the one hundred and seventeen foundation in A.D. 1626. The one hundred and seventeen, and one hundred and eighteen, are shown of by the one hundred and eighteen foundation in A.D. 1627. The one hundred and eighteen, and one hundred and nineteen, are shown of by the one hundred and nineteen foundation in A.D. 1628. The one hundred and nineteen, and one hundred and twenty, are shown of by the one hundred and twenty foundation in A.D. 1629. The one hundred and twenty, and one hundred and twenty-one, are shown of by the one hundred and twenty-one foundation in A.D. 1630. The one hundred and twenty-one, and one hundred and twenty-two, are shown of by the one hundred and twenty-two foundation in A.D. 1631. The one hundred and twenty-two, and one hundred and twenty-three, are shown of by the one hundred and twenty-three foundation in A.D. 1632. The one hundred and twenty-three, and one hundred and twenty-four, are shown of by the one hundred and twenty-four foundation in A.D. 1633. The one hundred and twenty-four, and one hundred and twenty-five, are shown of by the one hundred and twenty-five foundation in A.D. 1634. The one hundred and twenty-five, and one hundred and twenty-six, are shown of by the one hundred and twenty-six foundation in A.D. 1635. The one hundred and twenty-six, and one hundred and twenty-seven, are shown of by the one hundred and twenty-seven foundation in A.D. 1636. The one hundred and twenty-seven, and one hundred and twenty-eight, are shown of by the one hundred and twenty-eight foundation in A.D. 1637. The one hundred and twenty-eight, and one hundred and twenty-nine, are shown of by the one hundred and twenty-nine foundation in A.D. 1638. The one hundred and twenty-nine, and one hundred and thirty, are shown of by the one hundred and thirty foundation in A.D. 1639. The one hundred and thirty, and one hundred and thirty-one, are shown of by the one hundred and thirty-one foundation in A.D. 1640. The one hundred and thirty-one, and one hundred and thirty-two, are shown of by the one hundred and thirty-two foundation in A.D. 1641. The one hundred and thirty-two, and one hundred and thirty-three, are shown of by the one hundred and thirty-three foundation in A.D. 1642. The one hundred and thirty-three, and one hundred and thirty-four, are shown of by the one hundred and thirty-four foundation in A.D. 1643. The one hundred and thirty-four, and one hundred and thirty-five, are shown of by the one hundred and thirty-five foundation in A.D. 1644. The one hundred and thirty-five, and one hundred and thirty-six, are shown of by the one hundred and thirty-six foundation in A.D. 1645. The one hundred and thirty-six, and one hundred and thirty-seven, are shown of by the one hundred and thirty-seven foundation in A.D. 1646. The one hundred and thirty-seven, and one hundred and thirty-eight, are shown of by the one hundred and thirty-eight foundation in A.D. 1647. The one hundred and thirty-eight, and one hundred and thirty-nine, are shown of by the one hundred and thirty-nine foundation in A.D. 1648. The one hundred and thirty-nine, and one hundred and forty, are shown of by the one hundred and forty foundation in A.D. 1649. The one hundred and forty, and one hundred and forty-one, are shown of by the one hundred and forty-one foundation in A.D. 1650. The one hundred and forty-one, and one hundred and forty-two, are shown of by the one hundred and forty-two foundation in A.D. 1651. The one hundred and forty-two, and one hundred and forty-three, are shown of by the one hundred and forty-three foundation in A.D. 1652. The one hundred and forty-three, and one hundred and forty-four, are shown of by the one hundred and forty-four foundation in A.D. 1653. The one hundred and forty-four, and one hundred and forty-five, are shown of by the one hundred and forty-five foundation in A.D. 1654. The one hundred and forty-five, and one hundred and forty-six, are shown of by the one hundred and forty-six foundation in A.D. 1655. The one hundred and forty-six, and one hundred and forty-seven, are shown of by the one hundred and forty-seven foundation in A.D. 1656. The one hundred and forty-seven, and one hundred and forty-eight, are shown of by the one hundred and forty-eight foundation in A.D. 1657. The one hundred and forty-eight, and one hundred and forty-nine, are shown of by the one hundred and forty-nine troops; the magazines were abundantly replenished with forage and provisions; and the fleet of transports, ships, and galleys, was ready to hoist sail, as soon as the republic had received the price of the freight and armament. But that price far exceeded the wealth of the crusaders who were assembled at Venice. The Flemings, whose obedience to their count was voluntary and precarious, had embarked in their vessels for the long navigation of the ocean and Mediterranean; and many of the French and Italians had preferred a cheaper and more convenient passage from Marseilles and Apulia to the Holy Land. Each pilgrim might complain, that after he had furnished his own contribution, he was made responsible for the deficiency of his absent brethren: the gold and silver plate of the chiefs, which they freely delivered to the treasury of St. Mark, was a generous but inadequate sacrifice; and after all their efforts, thirty-four thousand marks were still wanting to complete the stipulated sum. The obstacle was removed by the policy and patriotism of the doge, who proposed to the barons, that if they would join their arms in reducing some revolted cities of Dalmatia, he would expose his person in the holy war, and obtain from the republic a long indulgence, till some wealthy conquest should afford the means of satisfying the debt. After much scruple and hesitation, they chose rather to accept the offer than to relinquish the enterprise; and the first hostilities of the fleet and army were directed against Zara,<sup>46</sup> a strong

[illegible][illegible]

Siege of Zara.

Nov. 10

city of the Slavonian coast, which had renounced its allegiance to Venice, and implored the protection of the king of Hungary.<sup>47</sup> The crusaders burst the chain or boom of the harbour; landed their horses, troops, and military engines; and compelled the inhabitants, after a defence of five days, to surrender at discretion: their lives were spared, but the revolt was punished by the pillage of their houses and the demolition of their wall. The season was far advanced; the French and Venetians resolved to pass the winter in a secure harbour and plentiful country; but their repose was disturbed by national and tumultuous quarrels of the soldiers and mariners. The conquest of Zara had scattered the seeds of discord and scandal: the arms of the allies had been stained in their outset with the blood, not of infidels, but of Christians: the king of Hungary and his new subjects were themselves enlisted under the banner of the cross, and the scruples of the devout, were melted by the fear or lassitude of the reluctant pilgrims. The pope had excommunicated the false crusaders who had pillaged and massacred their brethren,<sup>48</sup> and only the marquis Boniface and

Simon of Montfort escaped these spiritual thunders; the one by his absence from the siege, the other by his final departure from the camp. Innocent might absolve the simple and submissive penitents of France; but he was provoked by the stubborn reason of the Venetians, who refused to confess their guilt, to accept their pardon, or to allow, in their temporal concerns, the interposition of a priest.

The assembly of such formidable powers by sea and land, had revived the hopes of young<sup>49</sup> Alexius; and, both at Venice and Zara, he solicited the arms of the crusaders, for his own restoration and his father's<sup>50</sup> deliverance. The royal youth was recommended by Philip king of Germany: his prayers and presence excited the compassion of the camp; and his cause was embraced and pleaded by the marquis of Montferrat and the doge of Venice. A double alliance, and the dignity of Cæsar, had connected with the Imperial family the two elder brothers of Boniface.<sup>51</sup> He expected to derive a kingdom from the important service; and the more generous ambition of Dandolo was eager to secure the inestimable benefits of trade and dominion that might accrue to his country.<sup>52</sup> Their influence procured a favourable audience for the ambassadors of Alexius; and if the magnitude of his offers excited some suspicion, the motives and rewards which he displayed might justify the delay and diversion of those forces which had been consecrated to the deliverance of Jerusalem. He promised, in his own and his father's name, that as soon as they should be seated on the throne of Constantinople, they would terminate the long schism of the Greeks, and submit themselves and their people to the lawful supremacy of the Roman church. He engaged to recompense the labours and merits of the crusaders, by the immediate payment of two hundred thousand marks of silver; to accompany them in person to Egypt; or, if it should be judged more advantageous, to maintain, during a year, ten thousand men, and, during his life, five hundred knights, for the service of the Holy Land. These tempting conditions were accepted by the republic of Venice; and the eloquence of the doge and marquis persuaded the counts of Flanders, Blois, and St. Pol, with eight barons of France, to join in the glorious enterprise. A treaty of offensive and defensive alliance was confirmed by their oaths and seals; and each individual, according to his situation and character, was swayed by the hope of public or private advantage; by the honour of restoring an exiled monarch; or by the sincere and probable opinion, that their efforts in Palestine would be alliance of the crusaders with the Greek prince, the young Alexius.

<sup>46</sup> In 1202, the Venetians, under the command of Dandolo, sailed for Zara, and after a siege of five days, they entered the city. The king of Hungary, who had sought the protection of the pope, was forced to surrender. The Venetians then sailed for the Holy Land, and the crusaders followed them.

<sup>47</sup> The Venetians, under the command of Dandolo, sailed for Zara, and after a siege of five days, they entered the city. The king of Hungary, who had sought the protection of the pope, was forced to surrender.

<sup>48</sup> The pope, Innocent III., excommunicated the crusaders who had pillaged and massacred their brethren, and only the marquis Boniface and Simon of Montfort escaped these spiritual thunders.

<sup>49</sup> The young Alexius, son of Isaac II. Comnenus, was the emperor of the Byzantine Empire at the time of the crusade. He was a young man of great energy and ambition.

<sup>50</sup> Alexius's father, Isaac II. Comnenus, had been deposed by his brother, Manuel I. Comnenus, in 1185.

<sup>51</sup> The two elder brothers of Boniface were Philip of Germany and Conrad of Swabia. They were both married to princesses of the Imperial family.

<sup>52</sup> The doge, Enrico Dandolo, was an old man at the time of the crusade. He was a man of great energy and ambition.

<sup>53</sup> The Venetians, under the command of Dandolo, sailed for Zara, and after a siege of five days, they entered the city. The king of Hungary, who had sought the protection of the pope, was forced to surrender.

<sup>54</sup> The Venetians, under the command of Dandolo, sailed for Zara, and after a siege of five days, they entered the city. The king of Hungary, who had sought the protection of the pope, was forced to surrender.

cavalry, the least of which was more numerous than the largest of their divisions. Shame and despair had provoked Alexius to the last effort of a general sally; but he was awed by the firm order and manly aspect of the Latins; and, after skirmishing at a distance, withdrew his troops in the close of the evening. The silence or tumult of the night exasperated his fears; and the timid usurper, collecting a treasure of ten thousand pounds of gold, basely deserted his wife, his people, and his fortune; threw himself into a bark, stole through the Bosporous, and landed in shameful safety in an obscure harbour of Thrace. As soon as they were apprised of his flight, the Greek nobles sought pardon and peace in the dungeon where the blind Isaac expected each hour the visit of the executioner. Again saved and exalted by the vicissitudes of fortune, the captive in his Imperial robes was replaced on the throne, and surrounded with prostrate slaves, whose real terror and affected joy he was incapable of discerning. At the dawn of day hostilities were suspended; and the Latin chiefs were surprised by a message from the lawful and reigning emperor, who was impatient to embrace his son, and to reward his generous deliverers.<sup>67</sup>

Restoration of the empire.
Isaac Comnenus,
first his brother
Alexius.
July 19.

But these generous deliverers were unwilling to release their hostage, till they had obtained from his father the payment, or at least the promise, of their recompence. They chose four ambassadors, Matthew of Montmorency, our historian the marshal of Champagne, and two Venetians to congratulate the emperor. The gates were thrown open on their approach, the streets on both sides were lined with the battle-axes of the Danish and English guard; the presence-chamber glittered with gold and jewels, the false substitutes of virtue and power; by the side of the blind Isaac, his wife was seated, the sister of the king of Hungary; and by her appearance, the noble matrons of Greece were drawn from their domestic retirement, and mingled with the circle of senators and soldiers. The Latins, by the mouth of the marshal, spoke like men, conscious of their merits, but who respected the work of their own hands; and the emperor clearly understood, that his son's engagement with Venice and the pilgrims must be ratified without hesitation or delay. Withdrawing into a private chamber with the empress, a chamberlain, an interpreter, and the four ambassadors, the father of young Alexius enquired with some anxiety into the nature of his stipulations. The submission of the Eastern empire to the pope, the succour of the Holy Land, and a present contribution of two hundred thousand marks of silver — “These conditions are weighty,” was his prudent reply; “they are hard to accept, and difficult to perform. But no conditions can exceed the measure of your services, and de-

"serts." After this satisfactory assurance, the barons mounted on horseback, and introduced the heir of Constantinople to the city and palace: his youth and marvellous adventures engaged every heart in his favour, and Alexius was solemnly crowned with his father in the dome of St. Sophia. In the first days of his reign, the people, already blessed with the restoration of plenty and peace, was delighted by the joyful catastrophe of the tragedy; and the discontent of the nobles, their regret, and their fears, were covered by the polished surface of pleasure and loyalty. The mixture of two discordant nations in the same capital might have been pregnant with mischief and danger; and the suburb of Galata, or Pera, was assigned for the quarters of the French and Venetians. But the liberty of trade and familiar intercourse was allowed between the friendly nations; and each day the pilgrims were tempted by devotion or curiosity to visit the churches and palaces of Constantinople. Their rude minds, insensible perhaps of the finer arts, were astonished by the magnificent scenery; and the poverty of their native towns enhanced the populousness and riches of the first metropolis of Christendom.<sup>68</sup> Descending from his state, young Alexius was prompted by interest and gratitude to repeat his frequent and familiar visits to his Latin allies; and in the freedom of the table, the gay petulance of the French sometimes forgot the emperor of the East.<sup>69</sup> In their most serious conferences, it was agreed, that the re-union of the two churches must be the result of patience and time; but avarice was less tractable than zeal; and a large sum was instantly disbursed to appease the wants, and silence the importunity, of the crusaders.<sup>70</sup> Alexius was alarmed by the approaching hour of their departure, their absence might have relieved him from the engagement which he was yet incapable of performing; but his friends would have left him, naked and alone, to the caprice and prejudice of a perfidious nation. He wished to bribe their stay, the delay of a year, by undertaking to defray their expense, and to satisfy, in their name, the freight of the Venetian vessels. The offer was agitated in the council of the barons; and, after a repetition of their debates and scruples, a majority of votes again acquiesced in the advice of the doge and the prayer of the young emperor. At the price of sixteen hundred pounds of gold, he prevailed on the marquis of Montferrat to lead him with an army round the provinces of Europe; to establish his authority, and pursue his uncle, while Constantinople was eyed by the presence of Baldwin and his confederates of France and Flanders. The expedition was successful; the blind emperor exulted in the success of his arms, and listened to the predictions of his flatterers, that the same Providence which had raised him from the dungeon to the throne

57. For the first time and amongst the Constantine, we may read the original text of the epilogue of the work III, 1040, c. 1, p. 177, 174. V. Gharibian, No 2, 1961. Nizet in Armenian Studies, 1961, p. 119-120. Tachibana, 1961, p. 722. In the same year, all but Maroun, were not yet returned from their first place of pilgrimage to the Holy Land, where the greatest part of the community had died of the plague.

[illegible]

triot and a courtier, the perfidious Mourzoufle, who was not destitute of cunning and courage, opposed the Latins both in speech and action, incited the passions and prejudices of the Greeks, and insinuated himself into the favour and confidence of Alexius, who trusted him with the office of great chamberlain, and tinged his buskins with the colours of royalty. At the dead of night, he rushed into the bedchamber with an affrighted aspect, exclaiming that the palace was attacked by the people and betrayed by the guards. Starting from his couch, the unsuspecting prince threw himself into the arms of his enemy, who had contrived his escape by a private staircase. But that staircase terminated

Alexius and his father d. post.
by Mourzoufle.
Feb. 5.

in a prison: Alexius was seized, stripped and loaded with chains; and, after tasting some days the bitterness of death, he was poisoned, or strangled, or beaten with clubs, at the command, or in the presence, of the tyrant. The emperor Isaac Angelus soon followed his son to the grave, and Mourzoufle, perhaps, might spare the superfluous crime of hastening the extinction and impotence and blindness.

The death of the emperors, and the usurpation of Mourzoufle, had changed the nature of the quarrel. It was no longer the disagreement of allies who over-valued their services, or neglected their obligations: the French and Venetians forgot their complaints against Alexius, dropped a tear on the untimely fate of their companion, and swore revenge against the perfidious nation who had crowned his assassin. Yet the prudent doge was still inclined to negotiate; he asked as a debt, a subsidy, or a fine, fifty thousand pounds of gold, about two millions sterling; nor would the conference have been abruptly broken, if the zeal, or policy, of Mourzoufle had not refused to sacrifice the Greek church to the safety of the state.<sup>77</sup> Amidst the invectives of his foreign and domestic enemies, we may discern, that he was not unworthy of the character which he had assumed, of the public champion: the second siege of Constantinople was far more laborious than the first; the treasury was replenished, and discipline was restored, by a severe inquisition into the abuses of the former reign; and Mourzoufle, an iron mace in his hand, visiting the posts, and affecting the port and aspect of a warrior, was an object of terror to his soldiers, at least, and to his kinsmen. Before and after the death of Alexius, the Greeks made two vigorous and well-conducted attempts to burn the navy in the harbour; but the skill and courage of the Venetians repulsed the fireships; and the vagrant flames wasted themselves without injury in the sea.<sup>78</sup> In a nocturnal sally the Greek emperor was vanquished by Henry, brother of the count of Flanders: the advantages of number and surprise aggravated the share of his defeat; his buckler was found on the field of battle; and the Imperial standard,<sup>79</sup> a divine image of the Virgin, was presented, as a trophy and a relic, to the Cistercian monks, the disciples of St. Bernard. Near three months, without excepting the holy season of Lent, were consumed in skirmishes and preparations, before the Latins were ready or resolved for a general assault. The land fortifications had been found impregnable; and the Venetian pilots represented, that on the shore of the Propontis, the anchorage was unsafe, and the ships must be driven by the current far away to the straits of the Hellespont: a prospect not displeasing to the reluctant pilgrims, who sought every opportunity of breaking the army. From the harbour, therefore, the assault was determined by the assailants, and expected by the besieged; and the emperor had placed his scarlet pavilions on a neighbouring height, to direct and animate the efforts of his troops. A fearless spectator, whose mind could entertain the ideas of pomp and pleasure, might have admired the long array of two embattled armies, which extended above half a league, the one on the ships and galleys, the other on the walls and towers raised above the ordinary level by several stages of wooden turrets. Their first fury was spent in the discharge of darts, stones, and fire, from the engines; but the water was deep; the French were bold; the Venetians were skilful; they approached the walls; and a desperate conflict of swords, spears, and battle-axes, was fought on the trembling bridges that grappled the floating, to the stable, batteries. In more than an hundred places, the assault was urged, and the defence was sustained; till the superiority of ground and numbers finally prevailed, and the Latin trumpets sounded a retreat. On the ensuing days, the attack was renewed with equal vigour, and a similar event; and, in the night, the doge and the barons held a council, apprehensive only for the public danger: not a voice pronounced the words of escape or treaty; and each warrior, according to his temper, embraced the hope of victory, or the assurance of a glorious death.<sup>80</sup> By the experience of the former siege, the Greeks were instructed, but the Latins were animated; and the knowledge that Constantinople might be taken, was of more avail than the local precautions which that knowledge had inspired for its defence. In the third assault, two ships were linked together to double their strength; a strong north wind drove them on the shore; the bishops of Troyes and Soissons led the van; and the auspicious names of the Palm and the Paradise resounded along the line.<sup>81</sup> The episcopal banners were displayed on the walls; an hundred marks of silver had been promised to the first adventurers; and if their reward was intercepted by death, their names have been immortalized by fame. Four towers were scaled; three gates were

77. This negotiation, probably, on a staff, and suggested by Nicetas (p. 593), is omitted as a suspicion by the delicacy of Ducas and Villehardouin.

78. Beldien mentions two attempts to fire the fleet (p. 174, 175). Villehardouin says No. 117. I have seen the text in two places, but not in the same words. It is not credible, that a fleet of these warriors should be so easily taken by fire. The text is in the margin of the original.

79. Ducas, No. 117, says it was the most of the Virgin, a relic of the Imperial. This banner of the Virgin is shown at Venice as a relic and relic of the Virgin, the most of the Virgin, a relic of the Imperial.

80. The text is in the margin of the original. It is not credible, that a fleet of these warriors should be so easily taken by fire. The text is in the margin of the original.

81. The text is in the margin of the original. It is not credible, that a fleet of these warriors should be so easily taken by fire. The text is in the margin of the original.

burst open; and the French knights, who might tremble on the waves, felt themselves invincible on horseback on the solid ground. Shall I relate that the thousands who guarded the emperor's person, fled on the approach, and before the lance, of a single warrior? Their ignominious flight is attested by their countryman Nicetas: an army of phantoms marched with the French hero, and he was magnified to a giant in the eyes of the Greeks.<sup>82</sup> While the fugitives deserted their posts and cast away their arms, the Latins entered the city under the banners of their leaders; the streets and gates opened for their passage; and either design or accident kindled a third conflagration, which consumed in a few hours the measure of three of the largest cities of France.<sup>83</sup> In the close of the evening, the barons checked their troops, and fortified their stations; they were awed by the extent and populousness of the capital, which might yet require the labour of a month, if the churches and palaces were conscious of their internal strength. But in the morning, a suppliant procession, with crosses and images, announced the submission of the Greeks, and deprecated the wrath of the conquerors; the usurper escaped through the golden gate: the palaces of Blachernæ and Boucoleon were occupied by the count of Flanders and the marquis of Montferriat; and the empire, which still bore the name of Constantine, and the title of Roman, was subverted by the arms of the Latin pilgrims.<sup>84</sup>

Constantinople had been taken by <sup>Pillage of</sup> Constantinople. storm; and no restraints, except those of religion and humanity, were imposed on the conquerors by the laws of war. Boniface, marquis of Montferriat, still acted as their general; and the Greeks, who revered his name as that of their future sovereign, were heard to exclaim in a lamentable tone, "Holy marquis-king, have mercy upon us!" His prudence or compassion opened the gates of the city to the fugitives; and he exhorted the soldiers of the cross to spare the lives of their fellow-Christians. The streams of blood that flow down the pages of Nicetas, may be reduced to the slaughter of two thousand of his unresisting countrymen;<sup>85</sup> and the greater part was massacred, not by the strangers, but by the Latins, who had been driven from the city, and who exercised the revenge of a triumphant faction. Yet of these evils, some were less mindful of injuries than of benefits; and Nicetas himself was indebted for his safety to the generosity of a Venetian merchant. Pope Innocent the Third accuses the pilgrims of respecting, in their lust, neither age, nor sex, nor religious profession; and bitterly laments that the deeds of darkness, fornication, adultery, and incest, were perpetrated in open day; and that noble matrons and holy nuns were polluted by the grooms and peasants of the Catholic camp.<sup>86</sup> It is indeed probable that the licence of victory prompted and covered a multitude of sins: but it is certain, that the capital of the East contained a stock of venal or willing beauty, sufficient to satiate the desires of twenty thousand pilgrims: and female prisoners were no longer subject to the right or abuse of domestic slavery. The marquis of Montferriat was the patron of discipline and decency; the count of Flanders was the mirror of chastity: they had forbidden, under pain of death, the rape of married women, or virgins, or nuns; and the proclamation was sometimes invoked by the vanquished<sup>87</sup> and respected by the victors. Their cruelty and lust were moderated by the authority of the chiefs, and feelings of the soldiers; for we are no longer describing an irruption of the northern savages; and however ferocious they might still appear, time, policy, and religion, had civilised the manners of the French, and still more of the Italians. But a free scope was allowed to their avarice, which was glutted, even in the holy week, by the pillage of Constantinople. The right of victory, unshackled by any promise or treaty, had confiscated the public and private wealth of the Greeks; and every hand, according to its size and strength, might lawfully execute the sentence and seize the forfeit. A portable and universal standard of exchange was found in the coined and uncoined metals of gold and silver, which each captor, at home or abroad, might convert into the possessions most suitable to his temper and situation. Of the treasures, which trade and luxury had accumulated, the silks, velvets, furs, the gems, spices, and rich moveables, were the most precious, as they could not be procured for money in the ruder countries of Europe. An order of rapine <sup>Division of the</sup> was instituted; nor was the share of <sup>spoils.</sup> each individual abandoned to industry or chance. Under the tremendous penalties of perjury, excommunication and death, the Latins were bound to deliver their plunder into the common stock; three churches were selected for the deposit and distribution of the spoil: a single share was allotted to a foot soldier; two for a serjeant on horseback; four to a knight; and larger proportions according to the rank and merit of the barons and princes. For violating this sacred engagement, a knight, belonging to the count of St. Pol, was hanged with his shield and coat of arms round his neck: his example might render similar offenders more artful and discreet; but avarice was more powerful than fear; and it is generally believed, that the secret far exceeded the acknowledged plunder. Yet the magnitude of the prize surpassed the largest scale of experience or expectation.<sup>88</sup> Af-

<sup>82</sup> With an allusion to Homer, Nicetas calls him Αχιλλεύς, a hero, or, in English words, a giant, a statue with human mind, have excused the terror of the Greek. On this occasion, the historian seems fond of the unrefined, than of his country, or perhaps of truth. Balaam exclaims in the words of the psalmist, persequitur utrumque et nullo certamine abouit.

<sup>83</sup> Villehardouin (No. 150) is again ignorant of the authors of l'Esprit more legitimate title, which is ascribed by Gunther to a spurious count Teutonicus (c. 11.). They seem admitted, the incendiaries.

<sup>84</sup> For the second siege and capture of Constantinople, see Villehardouin (No. 115-152), Baldwin's last Epistle to Innocent III. (Gesta, c. 92, p. 551-557), with the whole record of Montferriat, in Nicetas (p. 363-375), and I borrow some hints from Hæd. in Chron. Venet. p. 525-530) and Gunther Hist. C. P. c. 115-151, who add the decorations of prophecy and vision. The former produces an oracle of the Ethiopian sibyl, of a great armament on the Hellespont, under a band which, against Byzantium, &c. Curious enough, were the prediction anterior to the fact.

<sup>85</sup> Et ceciderunt omnes ad eum civium quæ duo milia, &c. (Gunther, c. 151.) Antheimus is an excellent tolestone to try the applications of reason and rhetoric.

<sup>86</sup> Quidam (says Innocent III. Gesta, c. 91, p. 558), nec religionem, nec statum, nec ætatem præcipuerunt sed fortunas, utilitates, et divitias in oculis omnium habuerunt, non solum maritatus et viduitas, sed et matronarum et virginum. Propter divitias, exasperant superbiam, gremium, Vultu carissimum facies non notice of these common incidents.

<sup>87</sup> Nicetas saved, and afterwards married, a noble virgin (p. 361) who, in a short time, σεως αμαρτωλων πολλων επιβλεψαμενος had almost changed in spirit, and the εργα αρετης were everywhere.

<sup>88</sup> Of the general ideas of wealth, Gunther observes, ut de pauperibus

ter the whole had been equally divided between the French and Venetians, fifty thousand marks were deducted to satisfy the debts of the former and the demands of the latter. The residue of the French amounted to four hundred thousand marks of silver,<sup>89</sup> about eight hundred thousand pounds sterling; nor can I better appreciate the value of that sum in the public and private transactions of the age, than by defining it as seven times the annual revenue of the kingdom of England.<sup>90</sup>

In this great revolution we enjoy the singular felicity of comparing the narratives of Villehardouin and Nicetas, the opposite feelings of the marshal of Champagne and the Byzantine senator.<sup>91</sup> At the first view it should seem that the wealth of Constantinople was only transferred from one nation to another; and that the loss and sorrow of the Greeks is exactly balanced by the joy and advantage of the Latins. But in the miserable account of war, the gain is never equivalent to the loss, the pleasure to the pain: the smiles of the Latins were transient and fallacious; the Greeks for ever wept over the ruins of their country; and their real calamities were aggravated by sacrilege and mockery. What benefits accrued to the conquerors from the three fires which annihilated so vast a portion of the buildings and riches of the city? What a stock of such things, as could neither be used nor transported, was maliciously or wantonly destroyed! How much treasure was idly wasted in gaming, debauchery, and riot! And what precious objects were bartered for a vile price by the impatience or ignorance of the soldiers, whose reward was stolen by the base industry of the last of the Greeks! These alone, who had nothing to lose, might derive some profit from the revolution; but the misery of the upper ranks of society is strongly painted in the personal adventures of Nicetas himself. His stately palace had been reduced to ashes in the second conflagration; and the senator, with his family and friends, found an obscure shelter in another house which he possessed near the church of St. Sophia. It was the door of this mean habitation that his friend, the Venetian merchant, guarded in the disguise of a soldier, till Nicetas could save, by a precipitate flight, the relics of his fortune and the chastity of his daughter. In a cold wintry season, these fugitives, nursed in the lap of prosperity, departed on foot; his wife was with child; the desertion of their slaves compelled them to carry their baggage on their own shoulders; and their women, whom they placed in the centre, were exhorted to conceal their beauty with dirt, instead of adorning it with paint and jewels. Every step was exposed to insult and danger: the threats of the strangers were less painful than the taunts of the plebeians, with whom they were now levelled; nor did the exiles breathe in safety till their mournful pilgrimage was concluded at Selymbria, above forty miles from the capital. On the way they overtook the patriarch, without attendance, and almost without apparel, riding on an ass, and reduced to a state of apostolical poverty, which, had it been voluntary, might perhaps have been meritorious. In the mean while, his desolate churches were profaned by the licentiousness and party zeal of the Latins. After stripping the gems and pearls, <sup>sacrilege and</sup> they converted the chalices into drinking cups; their tables, on which they gamed and feasted, were covered with the pictures of Christ and the saints; and they trampled under foot the most venerable objects of the Christian worship. In the cathedral of St. Sophia, the ample veil of the sanctuary was rent asunder for the sake of the golden fringe; and the altar, a monument of art and riches, was broken in pieces, and shared among the captors. Their mules and horses were laden with the wrought silver and gilt carvings, which they tore down from the doors and pulpit; and if the beasts stumbled under the burden, they were stabbed by their impatient drivers, and the holy pavement streamed with their impure blood. A prostitute was seated on the throne of the patriarch; and that daughter of Belial, as she is styled, sung and danced in the church, to ridicule the hymns and processions of the Orientals. Nor were the repositories of the royal treasure secure from violation: in the church of the Apostles, the tombs of the emperors were rifled, and it is said, that after six centuries the corpse of Justinian was found without any signs of decay or putrefaction. In the streets, the French and Germans clothed themselves and their horses in rich robes and flowing head-dresses of linen; and the coarse intemperance of their feasts insulted the splendid sobriety of the East. To expose the arms of a people of scribes and scholars, they affected to display a pen, an inkhorn, and a sheet of paper, without discerning that the instruments of science and valour were alike feeble and useless in the hands of the modern Greeks.

Their reputation and their lan- <sup>destruction of</sup> guage encouraged them, however, the statues to despise the ignorance, and to overlook the progress, of the Latins.<sup>92</sup> In the love of the arts, the national difference was still more obvious and real; the Greeks preserved with reverence the works of their ancestors, which they could not imitate; and, in the destruction of the statues of Constantinople, we are provoked to join in the complaints and invectives of the Byzantine historian.<sup>93</sup> We have seen how the bus et admodum magis de his rebus (Hist. C. P. c. 181) Villehardouin, non fuit tantum gaudere, dum tota non videretur possidere.

<sup>89</sup> Villehardouin, No. 175—175. Instead of 400,000, there is a various reading of 500,000. The Venetians had offered to take the whole booty, and to give 100 marks to each knight, 200 to each priest and horseman, and 100 to each foot soldier. This would have been great losses. (Le Beau, Hist. du Bas-Empire, tom. ix. p. 39.) I know not from whence.)

<sup>90</sup> At the council of Lyons A. D. 1271, the English ambassadors stated the revenue of the crown as below that of the five in France, which amounted to 400,000 marks a year (Maitland, c. 141, Hist. of Henry of England, vol. i. p. 170.)

<sup>91</sup> The disorders of the sack of Constantinople, and his own adventures, are feelingly described by Nicetas, p. 362—366; and in the biatus Urb. C. P. p. 573—584. His complaints, even of sacrilege, are justified by Innocent III. (Gesta, c. 92.); but Villehardouin does not borrow a symptom of pity or remorse.

<sup>92</sup> If I might aspersed the Greek of Nicetas's reproach, their favourite dishes were boiled hennocks, of beef, salt pork and peas, and soup made of garlic and sharp or sour herbs. (c. 92.)

<sup>93</sup> Nicetas was very harsh against some, magis quodammodo barbaros, etiam magis iniquos (Francia, magis quodammodo barbaros, etiam magis iniquos), and a true philosopher most strongly in their ignorance of Greek and Latin. In the year 1204, the Latins of the city, who were not desirous of literature. See Henry's Hist. of France, p. 120. The Latins of the city, who were not desirous of literature. See Henry's Hist. of France, p. 120. The Latins of the city, who were not desirous of literature. See Henry's Hist. of France, p. 120.

CHAP. LXI.

Partition of the Empire by the French and Venetians. — Five Latin Emperors of the Houses of Flanders and Courtenay. — Their Wars against the Bulgarians and Greeks. — Weakness and Poverty of the Latin Empire. — Recovery of Constantinople by the Greeks. — General Consequences of the Crusades.

Election of the emperor Baldwin I.
A. D. 1204,
May 9—16.

future possessions.<sup>1</sup> It was stipulated by treaty, that twelve electors, six of either nation, should be nominated; that a majority should choose the emperor of the East; and that, if the votes were equal, the decision of chance should ascertain the successful candidate. To him, with all the titles and prerogatives of the Byzantine throne, they assigned the two palaces of Boucoleon and Blachernæ, with a fourth part of the Greek monarchy. It was defined that the three remaining portions should be equally shared between the republic of Venice and the barons of France; that each feudatory, with an honourable exception for the doge, should acknowledge and perform the duties of homage and military service to the supreme head of the empire; that the nation which gave an emperor, should resign to their brethren the choice of a patriarch; and that the pilgrims, whatever might be their impatience to visit the Holy Land, should devote another year to the conquest and defence of the Greek provinces. After the conquest of Constantinople by the Latins, the treaty was confirmed and executed; and the first and most important step was the creation of an emperor. The six electors of the French nation were all ecclesiastics, the abbot of Loes, the archbishop elect of Acre in Palestine, and the bishops of Troyes, Soissons, Halberstadt, and Bethlehem, the last of whom exercised in the camp the office of pope's legate: their profession and knowledge were respectable; and as they could not be the objects, they were best qualified to be the authors, of the choice. The six Venetians were the principal servants of the state, and in this list the noble families of Querini and Contarini are still proud to discover their ancestors. The twelve assembled in the chapel of the palace; and after the solemn invocation of the Holy Ghost they proceeded to deliberate and vote. A just impulse of respect and gratitude prompted them to crown the virtues of the doge: his wisdom had inspired their enterprise; and the most youthful knights might envy and applaud the exploits of blindness and age. But the patriot Dandolo was devoid of all personal ambition, and fully satisfied that he had been judged worthy to reign. His nomination was over-ruled by the transcribes and translates sequitur ad unguem, a MS. of Villehardouin, which he possessed, but he enriches his narrative with Greek and Latin materials, and we are indebted to him for a correct state of the hardouin, No. 136-140, with DuRoi, in his Observations, and the 1st book of his Histoire de Constantinople sous l'Empire des Français.

Venetians themselves: his countrymen, and perhaps his friends,<sup>2</sup> represented, with the eloquence of truth, the mischiefs that might arise to national freedom and the common cause, from the union of two incompatible characters, of the first magistrate of a republic and the emperor of the East. The exclusion of the doge left room for the more equal merits of Boniface and Baldwin; and at their names all manner of candidates respectfully withdrew. The marquis of Montferrat was recommended by his mature age and fair reputation, by the choice of the adventurers, and the wishes of the Greeks; nor can I believe that Venice, the mistress of the sea, could be seriously apprehensive of a petty lord at the foot of the Alps.<sup>3</sup> But the count of Flanders was the chief of a wealthy and warlike people; he was valiant, pious, and chaste; in the prime of life, since he was only thirty-two years of age; a descendant of Charlemagne, a cousin of the king of France, and a compeer of the prelates and barons who had yielded with reluctance to the command of a foreigner. Without the chapel, these barons, with the doge and marquis at their head, expected the decision of the twelve electors. It was announced by the bishop of Soissons, in the name of his colleagues; "Ye have sworn to obey the prince whom we should choose: by our unanimous suffrage, Baldwin count of Flanders and Hainault is now your sovereign, and the emperor of the East." He was saluted with loud applause, and the proclamation was re-echoed through the city by the joy of the Latins, and the trembling adulation of the Greeks. Boniface was the first to kiss the hand of his rival, and to raise him on the buckler; and Baldwin was transported to the cathedral, and solemnly invested with the purple buskins. At the end of three weeks he was crowned by the legate, in the vacancy of a patriarch; but the Venetian clergy soon filled the chapter of St. Sophia, seated Thomas Morosini on the ecclesiastical throne, and employed every art to perpetuate in their own nation the honours and benefices of the Greek church.<sup>4</sup> Without delay the successor of Constantine instructed Palestine, France, and Rome, of this memorable revolution. To Palestine he sent, as a trophy, the gates of Constantinople, and the chain of the Labourer;<sup>5</sup> and adopted, from the Assise of Jerusalem, the laws or customs best adapted to a French colony and conquest in the East. In his epistles, the natives of France are encouraged to swell that colony, and to secure that conquest, to people a magnificent city and a fertile land, which will reward the labours both of the priest and the soldier. He congratulates the Roman pontiff on the restoration of his authority in the East; invites him to extinguish the Greek schism by his presence in a general council; and implores his blessing and forgiveness for the disobedient pilgrims. Prudence and dignity men, whose sole umpire was the sword. Within three months after the conquest of Constantinople, the emperor and the king of Thessalonien drew their hostile followers into the field; they were reconciled by the authority of the doge, the advice of the marshal, and the firm freedom of their peers.<sup>16</sup>

[illegible]

Two fugitives, who had reigned <sup>Revol of the Greeks.</sup> at Constantinople, still asserted the <sup>A. D. 1201, &c.</sup> title of emperor; and the subjects of their fallen throne might be moved to pity by the misfortunes of the elder Alexis, or excited to revenge by the spirit of Mourzoufle. A domestic alliance, a common interest, a similar guilt, and the merit of extinguishing his enemies, a brother and a nephew, induced the more recent usurper to unite with the former the relics of his power. Mourzoufle was received with smiles and honours in the camp of his father Alexis; but the wicked can never love, and should rarely trust, their fellow-criminals; he was seized in the bath, deprived of his eyes, stripped of his troops and treasures, and turned out to wander an object of horror and contempt to those who with more propriety could hate, and with more justice could punish, the assassin of the emperor Isaac and his son. As the tyrant, pursued by fear or remorse, was stealing over to Asia, he was seized by the Latins of Constantinople, and condemned, after an open trial, to an ignominious death. His judges directed the mode of his execution, the axe, the wheel, or the stake; and it was resolved that Mourzoufle<sup>17</sup> should ascend the Theodosian column, a pillar of white marble of one hundred and forty-seven feet in height.<sup>18</sup> From the summit he was cast down headlong, and dashed in pieces on the pavement, in the presence of innumerable spectators, who filled the forum of Taurus, and admired the accomplishment of an old prediction, which was explained by this singular event.<sup>19</sup> The fire of Alexis is less tragical. He was sent by the marquis a captive to Italy, and a gift to the king of the Romans; but he had not much to applaud his fortune, if the sentence of imprisonment and exile were changed from a fortress in the Alps to a monastery in Asia. But his daughter, before the national calamity, had been given in marriage to a young hero who continued the succession, and restored the throne, of the Greek princes.<sup>20</sup> The valour of Theodore Lascaris was signalised in the two sieges of Constantinople.

Theodore Lascaris, emperor of Nicaea.
A. D. 1191
—1212.

After the flight of Mourzoufle, when the Latins were already in the city, he offered himself as their emperor to the soldiers and people: and his ambition, which might be virtuous, was undoubtedly brave. Could he have infused a soul into the multitude, they might have crushed the strangers under their feet: their abject despair refused his aid, and Theodore retired to breathe the air of freedom in Anatolia, beyond the immediate view and pursuit of the conquerors. Under the title, at first of despot, and afterwards of emperor, he drew to his standard the bolder spirits, who were fortified against slavery by the contempt of life; and as every means was lawful for the public safety, implored without scruple the alliance of the Turkish sultan. Nice, where Theodore established his residence, Prusa and Philadelphia, Smyrna and Ephesus, opened their gates to their deliverer: he derived strength and reputation from his victories, and even from his defeats; and the successor of Constantine preserved a fragment of the empire from the banks of the Meander to the suburbs of Nicomedia, and at length of Constantinople. Another possessed by the lineal heir of the Comnenian, a son of the virtuous Manuel, a grandson of the tyrant Andronicus. His name was Alexis; and the epithet of great was applied perhaps to his stature, rather than to his exploits. By the indulgence of the Angeli, he was appointed governor or duke of Trebizond;<sup>21</sup> his birth gave him ambition, the revolution independence; and without changing his title, he reigned in peace from Sinope to the Phasis, along the coast of the Black Sea. His nameless son and successor is described as the vassal of the sultan, whom he served with two hundred lances, that Comnenian prince was no more than duke of Trebizond, and the title of emperor was first assumed by the pride and envy of the successor of Alexis. In the West, a third fragment was saved from the common shipwreck by Michael, a bastard of the house of Angeli, who, before the revolution, had been known as an hostage, a soldier, and a rebel. His flight from the camp of the marquis Boniface secured his freedom; by his marriage with the governor's daughter, he commanded the important place of Durazzo, assumed the title of despot, and founded a strong and conspicuous principality in Epirus, Aetolia, and Thessaly, which have ever been peopled by a warlike race. The Greeks, who had offered their service to their new sovereigns, were excluded by the haughty Latins<sup>22</sup> from all civil and military honours, as a nation born to trouble and obey. Their resentment prompted them to show that they might have been useful friends, since they could be dangerous enemies: their nerves were braced by adversity; whatever was learned of holy, whatever was noble or valiant, rolled away

The dukes and emperors of Trebizond.

<sup>16</sup> Their quarrel is told by Vithardouon (No. 116. 118.) with the spirit of freedom. The merit and portion of the marshal are acknowledged by the Greek historians; (No. 116.) but Mourzoufle is described as a tyrant, whose exploits are only visible in their own names.

<sup>17</sup> See the fate of Mourzoufle, in Nicetas (p. 703.) Vithardouon (No. 116.) 115. 116. and Goutherin (p. 20. 21.) Neither the marquis nor the Greek afford a ground of pity to a person so cruel, whose punishment, however, was more merited than his crime.

<sup>18</sup> The column of Arcadius, which represents an African before his victories, or those of his father Theodosius, is to be seen at Constantinople. It is described and measured, Goutherin (p. 19.) p. 73. Barlun (died 1171.) Antiquities (p. 11.) &c. and Tournefort (Voyage du Levant, tom. ii. livre 10. p. 21.)

<sup>19</sup> The reverse of a coin, and the modern Greeks concerning the calamity, is a very curious coin, but I have not seen it. It is a coin of the reign of the emperor Isaac, who died in 1195. (No. 27.) relates the death of Mourzoufle, who was killed in the forum, and a coin, struck on the following day, showing his hands, and uttering a loud exclamation.

<sup>20</sup> The dynasty of Nicaea, Trebizond, and Iconium, of which Nicetas speaks, is a branch of the Comnenian line, which was established by the emperor Manuel.

<sup>21</sup> The principality of Trebizond, which was a vassal of the empire, was a principality of the empire, and was a principality of the empire.

<sup>22</sup> The principality of Trebizond, which was a vassal of the empire, was a principality of the empire, and was a principality of the empire.

<sup>23</sup> The principality of Trebizond, which was a vassal of the empire, was a principality of the empire, and was a principality of the empire.

<sup>24</sup> The principality of Trebizond, which was a vassal of the empire, was a principality of the empire, and was a principality of the empire.

into the independent states of Trebizond, Epirus, and Nice; and a single patrician is marked by the ambiguous praise of attachment and loyalty to the Franks. The vulgar herd of the cities and the country would have gladly submitted to a mild and regular servitude; and the transient disorders of war would have been obliterated by some years of industry and peace. But peace was banished, and industry was crushed, in the disorders of the feudal system. The Roman emperors of Constantinople, if they were endowed with abilities, were armed with power for the protection of their subjects; their laws were wise, and their administration was simple. The Latin throne was filled by a titular prince, the chief, and often the servant, of his licentious confederates; the fiefs of the empire, from a kingdom to a castle, were held and ruled by the sword of the barons: and their discord, poverty, and ignorance, extended the ramifications of tyranny to the most sequestered villages. The Greeks were oppressed by the double weight of the priest, who was invested with temporal power, and of the soldier, who was inflamed by fanatic hatred; and the insuperable bar of religion and language for ever separated the stranger and the native. As long as the crusaders were united at Constantinople, the memory of their conquest, and the terror of their arms, imposed silence on the captive land: their dispersion betrayed the smallness of their numbers and the defects of their discipline; and some failures and mischances revealed the secret, that they were not invincible. As the fear of the Greeks abated, their hatred increased. They murmured; they conspired; and before a year of slavery had elapsed, they implored, or accepted, the succour of a barbarian, whose power they had felt, and whose gratitude they trusted.<sup>23</sup>

The Bulgar war.
A. D. 1205.

The Latin conquerors had been saluted by a solemn and early embassy from John, or Joannice, or Calo-John, the revolted chief of the Bulgarians and Walachians. He deemed himself their brother, as the viceroy of the Roman pontiff, from whom he had received the royal title and an holy banner; and in the subversion of the Greek monarchy, he might aspire to the name of their friend and accomplice. But Calo-John was astonished to find, that the count of Flanders had assumed the pomp and pride of the successors of Constantine; and his ambassadors were dismissed with an haughty message, that the rebel must deserve a pardon, by touching with his forehead the footstool of the Imperial throne. His resentment<sup>24</sup> would have exhaled in acts of violence and blood; his cooler policy watched the rising discontent of the Greeks; affected a tender concern for their sufferings; and promised, that their first struggles for freedom should be supported by his person and kingdom. The conspiracy was propagated by national hatred, the fittest hand of association and secrecy; the Greeks were impatient to sheath their daggers in the breasts of the victorious strangers; but the execution was prudently delayed, till Henry, the emperor's brother, had transported the flower of his troops beyond the Hellespont. Most of the towns and villages of Thrace were true to the moment and the signal: and the Latins, without arms or suspicion, were slaughtered by the vile and merciless revenge of their slaves. From Demotica, the first scene of the massacre, the surviving vassals of the count of St. Pol escaped to Adrianople; but the French and Venetians, who occupied that city, were slain or expelled by the furious multitude; the garrisons that could effect their retreat fell back on each other towards the metropolis; and the fortresses, that separately stood against the rebels, were ignorant of each other's and of their sovereign's fate. The voice of fame and fear announced the revolt of the Greeks and the rapid approach of their Bulgarian ally; and Calo-John, not depending on the forces of his own kingdom, had drawn from the Scythian wilderness a body of fourteen thousand Comans, who drank, as it was said, the blood of their captives, and sacrificed the Christians on the altars of their gods.<sup>25</sup>

Alarmed by this sudden and growing danger, the emperor despatched a swift messenger to recall count Henry and his troops; and had Baldwin expected the return of his gallant brother, with a supply of twenty thousand Armenians, he might have encountered the invader with equal numbers and a decisive superiority of arms and discipline. But the spirit of chivalry could seldom discriminate caution from cowardice; and the emperor took the field with an hundred and forty knights, March. and their train of archers and sergeants. The marshal, who dissuaded and obeyed, led the vanguard in their march to Adrianople; the main body was commanded by the count of Blois; the aged doge of Venice followed with the rear; and their scanty numbers were increased from all sides by the fugitive Latins. They undertook to besiege the rebels of Adrianople; and such was the pious tendency of the crusades, that they employed the holy week in pillaging the country for their subsistence, and in kindling engines for the destruction of their fellow-Christians. But the Latins were soon interrupted and alarmed by the light cavalry of the Comans, who boldly skirmished to the edge of their imperfect lines; and a proclamation was issued by the marshal of Romania, that, on the trumpet's sound, the cavalry should mount and form; but that none, under pain of death, should abandon themselves to a desultory and dangerous pursuit. This wise injunction was first disobeyed by the count of Blois, who involved the emperor in his rashness and ruin. The Comans, of the Parthian or Tartar school, fled before their first charge; but after a career of two leagues, when the knights and their horses were almost breathless, they suddenly turned, rallied, and encompassed

<sup>23</sup> I here begin to mix, with freedom and confidence, the eight books of the Historia Imperii Romaniae, which Burce has given us a slight hint to V. 1. Barbarum, and which, in a brilliant style, describes their origin and classic work.

<sup>24</sup> In the fourth answer to the pope, we find, and his claims and complaints (Gesta Innocent. III. c. 108, 109.) he was cherished at Rome as the prodigal son.

<sup>25</sup> The Comans were a Tartar or Turkmen horde, which encamped in the north and south central, on the verge of the desert. The greater part were Pagans, but some were Mahometans, and the whole horde was converted to Christianity (A. D. 1570) by Lewis king of Hungary.

Defeat and captivity of Baldwin
A. D. 1205,
April 15.

Defeat and captivity of Baldwin
2d, 1149,
April 15.

the heavy squadrons of the Franks. The count was slain on the field; the emperor was made prisoner; and if the one disdained to fly, if the other refused to yield, their personal bravery made a poor atonement for their ignorance, or neglect, of the duties of a general.<sup>26</sup>

Proud of his victory and his royal prize, the Bulgarian advanced to relieve Adrianople and achieve the destruction of the Latins. They must inevitably have been destroyed, if the marshal of Romania had not displayed a cool courage and consummate skill: uncommon in all ages, but most uncommon in those times, when war was a passion, rather than a science. His grief and fears were poured into the firm and faithful bosom of the doge; but in the camp he diffused an assurance of safety, which could only be realised by the general belief. All day he maintained his perilous station between the city and the barbarians; Villehardouin decamped in silence at the dead of night; and his marvellous retreat of three days would have deserved the praise of Xenophon and the ten thousand. In the rear, the marshal supported the weight of the pursuit; in the front, he moderated the impatience of the fugitives; and wherever the Comans approached, they were repelled by a line of impenetrable spears. On the third day, the weary troops beheld the sea, the solitary town of Podosto, and their friends, who had landed from the Asiatic shore. They embraced, they wept; but they united their arms and counsels; and, in his brother's absence, count Henry assumed the regency of the empire, at once in a state of childhood and caducity. If the Comans withdrew from the summer heats, seven thousand Latins, in the hour of danger, deserted Constantinople, their brethren, and their vows. Some partial success was overbalanced by the loss of one hundred and twenty knights in the field of Rusion; and of the Imperial domain, no more was left than the capital, with two or three adjacent fortresses on the shores of Europe and Asia. The king of Bulgaria was restless and inexorable; and Calo-John respectfully eluded the demands of the pope, who conjured his new proselyte to restore peace and the emperor to the afflicted Latins. The deliverance of Baldwin was no longer, he said, in the power of man: that prince had died in prison; and the manner of his death is variously related by ignorance and credulity. The lovers of a tragic legend will be pleased to hear, that the royal captive was tempted by the amorous queen of the Bulgarians; that his chaste refusal exposed him to the falsehood of a woman and the jealousy of a savage; that his hands and feet were severed from his body; that his bleeding trunk was cast among the carcasses of dogs and horses; and that he breathed three days, before he was devoured by the birds of prey.<sup>2</sup> About twenty years afterwards, in a wood of the Netherlands, an hermit announced himself as the true Baldwin, the emperor of Constantinople, and lawful sovereign of Flanders. He related the wonders of his escape, his adventures, and his penance, among a people prone to believe and to rebel; and, in the first transport, Flanders acknowledged her long-lost sovereign. A short examination before the French court detected the impostor, who was punished with an ignominious death; but the Flemings still adhered to the pleasing error; and the countess Jane is accused by the gravest historians of sacrificing to her ambition the life of an unfortunate father.<sup>3</sup>

Death of the emperor.

In all civilised hostility, a treaty is established for the exchange or ransom of prisoners; and if their captivity be prolonged, their condition is known, and they are treated according to their rank with humanity or honour. But the savage Bulgaria was a stranger to the laws of war; his prisons were involved in darkness and silence; and above a year elapsed before the Latins could be assured of the death of Baldwin, before his brother, the regent Henry, would consent to assume the title of emperor. His moderation was applauded by the Greeks as an act of rare and inimitable virtue. Their light and perfidious ambition was eager to seize or anticipate the moment of a vacancy, while a law of succession, the guardian both of the prince and people, was gradually defined and confirmed in the hereditary monarchies of Europe. In the support of the Eastern empire, Henry was gradually left without an associate, as the heroes of the crusade retired from the world or from the war. The doge of Venice, the venerable Dandolo, in the fulness of years and glory, sunk into the grave. The raucous of Montferrat was slowly recalled from the Peloponnesian war to the revenge of Baldwin and the defence of Thessalonica. Some nice disputes of feudal homage and service were reconciled in a personal interview between the emperor and the king: they were firmly united by mutual esteem and the common danger; and their alliance was sealed by the nuptial of Henry with the daughter of the Italian prince. He soon deplored the loss of his friend and father. At the persuasion of some faithful Greeks, Boniface made a bold and successful inroad among the hills of Rhodope: the Bulgarians fled on his approach; they assembled to harass his retreat. On the intelligence that his rear was attacked, without waiting for any defensive armour, he leaped on horse-back, echoed his lance, and drove the enemies before him; but in the rash pursuit he was pierced with a mortal wound; and the head of the king of Thessalonica was presented to Calo-John, who enjoyed the honours, without the merit, of victory. The character of Henry

King and
A. D. 1206,
Aug. 20—1216,
June 11.

25 Naetus, from ignorance or malice, attributes the defeat to the cowardice of Darius (iii, 58). But Xerxes afterwards shares his own glory with his enemy, rather than let his victory be complete and newsworthy, thus multiplying the effects of his success. Naetus, however,

28. The reign and end of Bodhidharma is given by the Yueh-shi-ching and Nei-shi-ching. Ching-t'ang-shih and Ching-t'ang-shih-shih are supplied by Daizang in his Chüeh-shih, and to the end of the first book.

[illegible]

is here, at this melancholy event, that the pen or the voice of Jeffrey of Villehardouin seems to drop or to expire;<sup>31</sup> and if he still exercised his military office of marshal of Romania, his subsequent exploits are buried in oblivion.<sup>32</sup> The character of Henry was not unequal to his arduous situation: in the siege of Constantinople, and beyond the Hellespont, he had deserved the fame of a valiant knight and a skilful commander; and his courage was tempered with a degree of prudence and mildness unknown to his impetuous brother. In the double war against the Greeks of Asia and the Bulgarians of Europe, he was ever the foremost on shipboard or on horseback; and though he cautiously provided for the success of his arms, the drooping Latins were often roused by his example to save and to second their fearless emperor. But such efforts, and some supplies of men and money from France, were of less avail than the errors, the cruelty, and death, of their most formidable adversary. When the despair of the Greek subjects invited Calo-John as their deliverer, they hoped that he would protect their liberty and adopt their laws: they were soon taught to compare the degrees of national ferocity, and to execrate the savage conqueror, who no longer dissembled his intention of dispeopling Thrace, of demolishing the cities, and of transplanting the inhabitants beyond the Danube. Many towns and villages of Thrace were already evacuated; an heap of ruins marked the place of Philippopolis, and a similar calamity was expected at Demotica and Adrianople, by the first authors of the revolt. They raised a cry of grief and repentance to the throne of Henry: the emperor alone had the magnanimity to forgive and trust them. No more than four hundred knights, with their sergeants and archers, could be assembled under his banner; and with this slender force he fought and repulsed the Bulgarian, who, besides his infantry, was at the head of forty thousand horse. In this expedition, Henry felt the difference between an hostile and a friendly country; the remaining cities were preserved by his arms; and the savages, with shame and loss, were compelled to relinquish his prey. The siege of Thessalonica was the last of the evils which Calo-John inflicted or suffered: he was stabbed in the night in his tent; and the general, perhaps the assassin, who found him weltering in his blood, ascribed the blow with general applause to the lance of St. Demetrius.<sup>33</sup> After several victories, the prudence of Henry concluded an honourable peace with the successor of the tyrant, and with the Greek princes of Nice and Epirus. If he ceded some doubtful limits, an ample kingdom was reserved for himself and his feudatories; and his reign, which lasted only ten years, afforded a short interval of prosperity and peace. Far above the narrow policy of Baldwin and Boniface, he freely intrusted to the Greeks the most important offices of the state and army: and this liberality of sentiment and practice was the more seasonable, as the princes of Nice and Epirus had already learned to seduce and employ the mercenary valour of the Latins. It was the aim of Henry to unite and reward his deserving subjects of every nation and language; but he appeared less solicitous to accomplish the impracticable union of the two churches. Pelagius, the pope's legate, who acted as the sovereign of Constantinople, had interdicted the worship of the Greeks, and sternly imposed the payment of tithes, the double procession of the Holy Ghost, and a blind obedience to the Roman pontiff. As the weaker party, they pleaded the duties of conscience, and implored the rights of toleration: "Our bodies," they said, "are Caesar's, but our souls belong only to God." The persecution was checked by the firmness of the emperor;<sup>34</sup> and if we can believe that the same prince was poisoned by the Greeks themselves, we must entertain a contemptible idea of the sense and gratitude of mankind. His valour was a vulgar attribute, which he shared with ten thousand knights; but Henry possessed the superior courage to oppose, in a superstitious age, the pride and avarice of the clergy. In the cathedral of St. Sophia he presumed to place his throne on the right-hand of the patriarch; and this presumption excited the sharpest censure of pope Innocent the Third. By a salutary edict, one of the first examples of the laws of mortmain, he prohibited the alienation of fiefs: many of the Latins, desirous of returning to Europe, resigned their estates to the church for a spiritual or temporal reward; these holy lands were immediately discharged from military service; and a colony of soldiers would have been gradually transformed into a college of priests.<sup>35</sup>

The virtuous Henry died at Thessalonica, in the defence of that kingdom, and of an infant, the son of his friend Boniface. In the two first emperors of Constantinople the male line of the counts of Flanders was extinct. But their sister Yolande was the wife of a French prince, the mother of a numerous progeny; and one of her daughters had married Andrew king of Hungary, a brave and pious champion of the cross. By seating him on the Byzantine throne, the barons of Romania would have acquired the forces of a neighbouring and warlike kingdom; but the prudent Andrew revered the laws of succession; and the princess Yolande, with her husband Peter of Courtenay, count of Auxerre, was invited by the Latins to assume the empire of the East. The royal birth of his father, the noble origin of his mother, recommended to the barons of France the first cousin of their king. His reputation was fair, his possessions were ample, and, in the bloody crusade against the cenosis of the holy sepulchre, and contained a divine ointment which distilled daily and stupendous miracles (Ducange, Hist. de C. P. ii. 41).

Peter of Courtenay is emperor of Constantinople, in 1205, April 9.

<sup>31</sup> Villehardouin, Nov. 257. I quote, with regret, this lamentable circumstance, where we lose at once the original history, and the tradition of Ducange. The last pages no longer so much light from Henry's two epistles to Innocent III. (Hist. c. 107.)

<sup>32</sup> The marshal was alive in 1212, but he probably died soon afterwards, without returning to France (Ducange, Obs. sur les mss. de Villehardouin, p. 278.). His fact of Viterbo, in the 24th of Boniface, was the ancient Maximianopolis, which flourished in the time of Anastasius Marcellinus, and the ruins of Viterbo (No. 111.)

<sup>33</sup> The church of this patron of Thessalonica was served by the

Albigensis, the soldiers and the priests had been abundantly satisfied of his zeal and valour. Vanity might applaud the elevation of a French emperor of Constantinople; but prudence must pity, rather than envy, his treacherous and imaginary greatness. To assert and adorn his title, he was reduced to sell or mortgage the best of his patrimony. By these expedients, the liberality of his royal kinsman Philip Augustus, and the national spirit of chivalry, he was enabled to pass the Alps at the head of one hundred and forty knights, and five thousand five hundred sergeants and others. After some hesitation, pope Honorius the Third was persuaded to crown the successor of Constantine, but he performed the ceremony in a church without the walls, lest he should seem to imply or to bestow any right of sovereignty over the ancient capital of the empire. The Venetians had engaged to transport Peter and his forces beyond the Adriatic, and the empress, with her four children, to the Byzantine palace; but they required, as the price of their service, that he should recover Durazzo from the despot of Epirus. Michael Angelus, or Comnenus, the last of his dynasty, had bequeathed the succession of his power and ambition to Theodore, his legitimate brother, who already threatened and invaded the establishments of the Latins. After discharging his debt by a fruitless assault, the emperor raised the siege to prosecute a long and perilous journey over land from Durazzo to Thessalonica. He was soon lost in the mountains of Epirus: the passes were fortified; his provisions exhausted; he was delayed and deceived by a treacherous negotiation; and and, after Peter of Courtenay and the Roman legate had been arrested in a banquet, the French troops, without leaders or hopes, were eager to exchange their arms for the delusive promise of mercy and bread. The Varian plundered; and the impious Theodore was threatened with the vengeance of earth and Heaven; but the captive emperor and his soldiers were forgotten, and the reproaches of the pope are confined to the imprisonment of his legate. No sooner was he satisfied by the delivrance of the priest and a promise of spiritual obedience, than he pardoned and protected the despot of Epirus. His peremptory commands suspended the ardour of the Venetians and the king of Hungary; and it was only by a natural or unmanly death<sup>6</sup> that Peter of Courtenay was released from his hopeless captivity.<sup>37</sup>

The long ignorance of his fate, and the presence of the lawful sovereign, of Yolande, his wife or widow, delayed the proclamation of a new emperor. Before her death, and in the midst of her grief, she was delivered of a son, who was named Baldwin, the last and most unfortunate of the Latin princes of Constantinople. His birth endeared him to the barons of Romania; but his childhood would have prolonged the troubles of a minority, and his claims were superseded by the elder claims of his brethren. The first of these, Philip of Courtenay, who derived from his mother the inheritance of Namur, had the wisdom to prefer the substance of a marquise to the shadow of an empire; and on his refusal, Robert, the second of the sons of Peter and Yolande, was called to the throne of Constantinople. Warned by his father's mischance, he pursued his slow and secure journey through Germany and along the Danube; a passage was opened by his sister's marriage with the king of Hungary; and the emperor Robert was crowned by the patriarch in the cathedral of St. Sophia. But his reign was an era of calamity and disgrace; and the colony, as it was styled, of NEW FRANCE yielded on all sides to the Greeks of Nice and Epirus. After a victory, which he owed to his perfidy rather than his courage, Theodore Angelus entered the kingdom of Thessalonica, expelled the feeble Demetrius, the son of the marquis Boniface, erected his standard on the walls of Adrianople; and added, by his vanity, a third or fourth name to the list of rival emperors. The relics of the Asiatic province were swept away by John Vataces, the son-in-law and successor of Theodore Lascaris, and who, in a triumphant reign of thirty-three years, displayed the virtues both of peace and war. Under his discipline the swords of the French mercenaries were the most effectual instrument of his conquests, and their desertion from the service of their country was at once a symptom and a cause of the rising ascendancy of the Greeks. By the construction of a fleet, he obtained the command of the Hellespont, reduced the islands of Lesbos and Rhodes, attacked the Venetians of Candia, and forced the rare and precious succours of the West. Once, and once only, the Latin emperor sent an army against Vataces; and in the defeat of that army, the veteran knights, the last of the original conquerors, were left on the field of battle. But the success of a foreign enemy was less painful to the pusillanimous Robert than the insolence of his Latin subjects, who confounded the weakness of the emperor and of the empire. His personal misfortunes will prove the anarchy of the government and the ferociousness of the times. The anorous youth had neglected his Greek bride, the daughter of Vataces, to introduce into the palace a beautiful maid, of a private, though noble, family of Artois; and her mother had been tempted by the lustre of the purple to forfeit her engagements with a gentleman of Burgundy. His love was converted into rage; he assembled his friends, forced the palace gates, threw the mother into the sea, and inhumanly cut off the nose and lips of the wife or concubine of the emperor. Instead of punishing the offender, the barons avowed and applauded the savage deed,<sup>38</sup> which, as a prince and as a man, it was impossible that Baldwin should forgive. He escaped from the guilty city to implore the <sup>36</sup> Acropolis (c. 14) affirms, that Peter of Courtenay died by the sword tepus maximo veneno, but from his dark expressions, I should conclude a previous opitium, or poison, by the destruction of the veneno, or poison. The Chron. de la Ville de Constantinople, however, states his death till the year 1229, and asserts, as in the neighbourhood of a fortnight.

<sup>37</sup> See the reign and death of Peter of Courtenay, in Le Comte de Flandre.

<sup>38</sup> C. P. l. p. 22-23, who fully strives to excuse the neglect of the emperor by his enemies.

<sup>39</sup> Martini Senensis Secreta Fidei in Graecia, l. ii. c. 13. p. 157. It is so remarkable that the destruction of the veneno, or poison, is not mentioned in the Chron. de la Ville de Constantinople. Yet he acknowledges the destruction of the veneno, or poison.

ciated by too frequent and indiscriminate abuse. His birth and misfortunes recommended him to the generosity of his cousin Lewis the Ninth; but the martial zeal of the saint was diverted from Constantinople to Egypt and Palestine; and the public and private poverty of Baldwin was alleviated, for a moment, by the alienation of the marquise of Namur and the lordship of Comtenay, the last remains of his inheritance.<sup>47</sup> By such shameful or ruinous expedients, he once more returned to Romania, with an army of thirty thousand soldiers, whose numbers were doubled in the apprehension of the Greeks. His first despatches to France and England announced his victories and his hopes; he had reduced the country round the capital to the distance of three days' journey; and if he succeeded against an important, though nameless, city (most probably Chiorli), the frontier would be safe and the passage accessible. But these expectations (if Baldwin was sincere) quickly vanished like a dream; the troops and treasures of France melted away in his unskilful hands; and the throne of the Latin emperor was protected by a dishonourable alliance with the Turks and Comans. To secure the former, he consented to bestow his niece on the unbelieving sultan of Cogni; to please the latter, he complied with their Pagan rites; a dog was sacrificed between the two armies; and the contracting parties tasted each other's blood, as a pledge of their fidelity.<sup>48</sup> In the pulque, or prison, of Constantinople, the successor of Augustus demolished the vacant houses for winter fuel, and stripped the lead from the churches for the daily expense of his family. Some usurious loans were dealt with a scanty hoard by the merchants of Italy; and Philip, his son and heir, was pawned at Venice as the security for a debt.<sup>49</sup> Thirst, hunger, and nakedness, are positive evils; but wealth is relative; and a prince, who would be rich in a private station, may be exposed by the increase of his wants to all the anxiety and bitterness of poverty.

But in this abject distress, the emperor and empire were still possessed of an ideal treasure, which drew its fantastic value from the superstition of the Christian world. The merit of the true cross was somewhat impaired by its frequent division; and a long captivity among the infidels might shed some suspicion on the fragments that were produced in the East and West. But another relic of the Passion was preserved in the hapless chapel of Constantinople; and the crown of thorns which had been placed on the head of Christ was equally precious and authentic. It had formerly been the practice of the Egyptian debtors to deposit, as a security, the mummies of their parents; and both their honour and religion were bound for the redemption of the pledge. In the same manner, and in the absence of the emperor, the barons of Romania borrowed the sum of thirteen thousand one hundred and thirty-four pieces of gold,<sup>30</sup> on the credit of the holy crown. they failed in the performance of their contract, and a rich Venetian, Nicholas Querini, undertook to satisfy their impatient creditors, on condition that the relic should be lodged at Venice, to become his absolute property, if it were not redeemed within a short and definite term. The barons apprised their sovereign of the hard treaty and impending loss; and as the empire could not afford a ransom of seven thousand pounds sterling, Baldwin was anxious to snatch the prize from the Venetians, and to vest it with more honour and emolument in the hands of the most Christian king.<sup>31</sup> Yet the negotiation was attended with some delicacy. In the purchase of relics, the saint would have started at the guilt of simony; but if the mode of expression were changed, he might lawfully repay the debt, accept the gift, and acknowledge the obligation. His ambassadors, two Dominicans, were despatched to Venice, to redeem and receive the holy crown, which had escaped the dangers of the sea and the galleys of the Venetians. On opening a wooden box, they recognised the seals of the doge and barons, which were applied on a shrine of silver: and within this shrine the monument of the Passion was enclosed in a golden vase. The reluctant Venetians yielded to justice and power: the emperor Frederic granted a free and honourable passage; the court of France advanced as far as Troyes in Champagne, to meet with devotion this insupportable cure. It was borne in triumph through Paris by the king himself, barefoot, and in his shirt; and a free gift of ten thousand marks of silver reconciled Baldwin to his loss. The success of this transaction tempted the Latin emperor to offer with the same generosity the remaining furniture of his chapel;<sup>32</sup> a large and authentic portion of the true cross; the baby-linen of the Son of God, the lance, the sponge, and the chain, of his Passion, the rod of Moses, and part of the skull of St John the Baptist. For the reception of these spiritual treasures, twenty thousand marks were expended by St. Louis on a stately foundation, the holy chapel of Paris, on which the muse of Boileau has bestowed a comic immortality. The truth of such remote and ancient relics, which cannot be proved by any human testimony, must be admitted by those who believe in the miracles which they have performed. About the middle of the last age, an inveterate ulcer was touched and cured by an holy prickle of the holy crown.<sup>33</sup> the prodigy is attested by the most pious and enlightened Christians of France; nor will the

17. Louis IX disapproved and stopped the appointment of Courtenay (Ducange, l. iv, c. 25). It is not to be used in the real domains, but granted for a term of years in the family of the curvellers. Courtenay, in the election of Neuchâtel in the 15th century, was a great first noble, with the reputation of a noble. M. de la Roche, l. 1, c. 1, p. 10. Bédouin, l. iv, c. 25, p. 10.

[illegible][illegible]

Mr. W. J. McGee, a member of the committee, said that the 1924-25 season had been a very successful one for the fishery, and that the fishery was now in a position to produce a large quantity of fish for export. He said that the fishery was now in a position to produce a large quantity of fish for export.

fact be easily disproved, except by those who are armed with a general antidote against religious credulity.<sup>54</sup>

The Latins of Constantinople<sup>55</sup> were on all sides encompassed and pressed: their sole hope, the last delay of their ruin, was in the division of their Greek and Bulgarian enemies; and of this hope they were deprived by the superior arms and policy of Vataces emperor of Nice. From the Propontis to the rocky coast of Pamphylia, Asia was peaceful and prosperous under his reign; and the events of every campaign extended his influence in Europe. The strong cities of the hills of Macedonia and Thrace were rescued from the Bulgarians; and their kingdom was circumscribed by its present and proper limits, along the southern banks of the Danube. The sole emperor of the Romans could no longer brook that a lord of Epirus, a Comnenian prince of the West, should presume to dispute or share the honours of the purple; and the humble Demetrius changed the colour of his buskins; and accepted with gratitude the appellation of despot. His own subjects were exasperated by his baseness and incapacity: they implored the protection of their supreme lord. After some resistance, the kingdom of Thessalonica was united to the empire of Nice; and Vataces reigned without a competitor from the Turkish borders to the Adriatic Gulf. The princes of Europe revered his merit and power; and had he subscribed an orthodox creed, it should seem that the pope would have abandoned without reluctance the Latin throne of Constantinople. But the death of Vataces, the short and busy reign of Theodore his son, and the helpless infancy of his grand-son John, suspended the restoration of the Greeks. In the next chapter, I shall explain their domestic revolutions; in this place, it will be sufficient to observe, that the young prince was oppressed by the ambition of his guardian and regent, Michael Palaeologus, who expelled the virtues and vices that had been the foundation of a new dynasty. The emperor Baldwin had uttered himself, though in a moment of passion, as cities by an importunate tyrant. His adherents were dismissed from Nice with mockery and contempt. At every word which they uttered, Palaeologus alleged some special reason, which rendered it dear and valuable in his eyes: in the one he was born; in another he had been first promoted to military command; and in a third he had enjoyed, and loped long to enjoy, the pleasures of the chase. "And what," then do you propose to give us?" said the astonished deputies. "Nothing," replied the Greek, "not a foot of land. If your master

"be desirous of peace, let him pay me, as an annual tribute, the sum which he receives from the trade and customs of Constantinople. On these terms I may allow him to reign. If he refuses, it is war. I am not ignorant of the art of war, and I trust the event to God and my sword."<sup>56</sup> An expedition against the despot of Epirus was the first prelude of his arms. If a victory was followed by a defeat; if the race of the Comneni or Angeli survived in those mountains his efforts and his reign; the captivity of Villehardouin, prince of Achaia, deprived the Latins of the most active and powerful vassal of their expiring monarchy. The republics of Venice and Genoa disputed, in the first of their naval wars, the command of the sea and the commerce of the East. Pride and interest attached the Venetians to the defence of Constantinople; their rivals were tempted to promote the designs of her enemies, and the alliance of the Genoese with the schismatic conqueror provoked the indignation of the Latin church.<sup>57</sup>

Intent on this great object, the emperor Michael visited in person and strengthened the troops and fortifications of Thrace. The remains of the Latins were driven from their last possessions: he assaulted without success the suburb of Galata; and corresponded with a perfidious baron, who proved unwilling, or unable, to open the gates of the metropolis. The next spring, his favourite general, Alexius Strategopulus, whom he had decorated with the title of Cæsar, passed the Hellespont with eight hundred horse and some infantry,<sup>58</sup> on a secret expedition. His instructions enjoined him to approach, to listen, to watch, but not to risk any doubtful or dangerous enterprise against the city. The adjacent territory between the Propontis and the Black Sea, was cultivated by an hardy race of peasants and outlaws, exercised in arms, uncertain in their allegiance, but inclined by language, religion, and present advantage, to the party of the Greeks. They were styled the volontiers,<sup>59</sup> and by their free service the army of Alexius, with the regulars of Thrace and the Comnenians,<sup>60</sup> was augmented to the number of five and twenty thousand men. By the ardour of the volunteers, and by his own ambition, the Cæsar was stimulated to disobey the precise orders of his master, in the just confidence that success would plead his pardon and reward. The weakness of Constantinople, and the distress and terror of the Latins, were familiar to the observation of the volunteers; and they represented the present moment as the most propitious to surprise and conquest. A rash youth, the new governor of the Venetian colony, had recovered by the Greeks.

Constantinople
A.D. 1261,
July 23.

<sup>54</sup> Vulture (Nouvelle de Louis XIV. c. 37. Ouvres, tom. ix. p. 178, 179. l'oiseau (p. 178) and Hu (p. 178) are used in the text.

<sup>55</sup> The Greek books of the Latins may be traced in the third, fourth, and fifth books of the compilation of Ducange, but of the Greek accounts he has dropped in an error, which is the first recovered from the later history of France, the most, and the first books of the Greek history, the two writers of the History, who have had the good fortune to meet with earned editors, Leo Allatius, at Rome, and John Boivin in the Academy of Inscriptions of Paris.

<sup>56</sup> George Acropolita, c. 78, p. 69, 90, edit. Porro.

<sup>57</sup> The Greeks, a band of my fore and I, cause the alliance and success of the Genoese, but the fact is proved by the testimony of

J. Villani (Chron. l. vi. c. 71. in Muratori, Script. Rerum Italicarum, tom. xii. p. 292, 293) and William de Nangis (Annals de St. Louis, p. 218. in the l'œuvre J. Villani, l. vi. c. 71, two important foreigners, and Urban IV. threatened to deprive him of her archbishop.

<sup>58</sup> Some present numbers, the 800.

<sup>59</sup> volontiers, l. vi. c. 24.

<sup>60</sup> volontiers, l. vi. c. 24.

<sup>61</sup> volontiers, l. vi. c. 24.

<sup>62</sup> volontiers, l. vi. c. 24.

<sup>63</sup> volontiers, l. vi. c. 24.

<sup>64</sup> volontiers, l. vi. c. 24.

<sup>65</sup> volontiers, l. vi. c. 24.

<sup>66</sup> volontiers, l. vi. c. 24.

<sup>67</sup> volontiers, l. vi. c. 24.

sailed away with thirty galleys, and the best of the French knights, on a wild expedition to Daphnusia, a town on the Black Sea, at the distance of forty leagues; and the remaining were without strength or suspicion. They were informed that Alexius had passed the Hellespont; but their apprehensions were lulled by the smallness of his original numbers; and their imprudence had not watched the subsequent increase of his army. If he left his main body to second and support his operations, he might advance unperceived in the night with a chosen detachment. While some applied scaling-ladders to the lowest part of the walls, they were secure of an old Greek, who would introduce their companions through a subterraneous passage into his house; they could soon on the inside break an entrance through the golden gate, which had been long obstructed; and the conqueror would be in the heart of the city, before the Latins were conscious of their danger. After some debate, the Caesar resigned himself to the faith of the volunteers; they were trusty, bold, and successful; and in describing the plan, I have already related the execution and success.<sup>61</sup> But no sooner had Alexius passed the threshold of the golden gate, than he trembled at his own rashness; he paused, he deliberated; till the desperate volunteers urged him forwards, by the assurance that in retreat lay the greatest and most inevitable danger. Whilst the Caesar kept his regulars in firm array, the Comans dispersed themselves on all sides; an alarm was sounded, and the threats of fire and pillage compelled the citizens to a decisive resolution. The Greeks of Constantinople remembered their native sovereignty; the Genoese merchants their recent alliance; and Venetian foes, every quarter was in arms; and the air resounded with a general acclamation of "Long life and victory to Michael and John, the august emperors of the Romans!" Their rival Baldwin was awakened by the sound; but the most pressing danger could not prompt him to draw his sword in the defence of a city which he deserted, perhaps, with more pleasure than regret; he fled from the palace to the sea shore, where he desisted the welcome sails of the fleet returning from the vain and fruitless attempt on Daphnusia. Constantinople was irrecoverably lost; but the Latin emperor and the principal families embarked on board the Venetian galleys, and steered for the Isle of Eubœa, and afterwards for Italy, where the royal fugitive was entertained by the pope and Sicilian king with a mixture of contempt and pity. From the loss of Constantinople to his death, he consumed thirteen years, solliciting the Catholic powers to join in his restoration: the lesson had been familiar to his youth; nor was his last exile more indigent or shameful than his three former pilgrimages to the courts of Europe. His son Philip was the heir of an ideal empire; and the pretensions of his daughter Catharine were transported by her marriage to Charles of Valois, the brother of Philip the Fair, king of France. The house of Courtenay was represented in the female line by successive alliances, till the title of emperor of Constantinople, too bulky and sonorous for a private name, modestly expired in silence and oblivion.<sup>62</sup>

After this narrative of the expeditions of the Latins to Palestine and Constantinople, I cannot dismiss the subject without revolving the general consequences on the countries that were the scene, and on the nations that were the actors, of these memorable crusades.<sup>63</sup> As soon as the arms of the Franks were withdrawn, the impression, though not the memory, was erased in the Mahometan realms of Egypt and Syria. The faithful disciples of the prophet were never tempted by a profane desire to study the laws or language of the idolaters; nor did the simplicity of their primitive manners receive the slightest alteration from their intercourse in peace and war with the unknown strangers of the West. The Greeks, who thought themselves proud, but who were only vain, showed a disposition somewhat less inflexible. In the efforts for the recovery of their empire, they emulated the valour, discipline, and tactics, of their antagonists. The modern literature of the West they might justly despise; but its free spirit would instruct them in the rights of man; and some institutions of public and private life were adopted from the French. The correspondence of Constantinople and Italy diffused the knowledge of the Latin tongue; and several of the fathers and classics were at length honoured with a Greek version.<sup>64</sup> But the national and religious prejudices of the Orientals were inflamed by persecution; and the reign of the Latins confirmed the separation of the two churches.

If we compare, at the æra of the crusades, the Latins of Europe with the Greeks and Arabians, their respective degrees of knowledge, industry, and art, our rude ancestors must be content with the third rank in the scale of nations. Their successive improvement and present superiority may be ascribed to a peculiar energy of character, to an active and imitative spirit, unknown to their more polished rivals, who at that time were in a stationary or retrograde state. With such a disposition, the Latins should have derived the most early and essential benefits from a series of events which opened to their eyes the prospect of the world, and introduced them to a long and frequent intercourse with the more cultivated regions of the East. The first and most obvious progress was in trade and manufactures, in the arts which are strongly prompted by the thirst of wealth, the calls of necessity, and the gratifi-

61 The loss of Constantinople is briefly told by the Latins; the conquest is described with more satisfaction by the Greeks, by Acropolitae (c. 85 f.), Palaeologus (l. c. 25 f.), Nesiphorus Gregorius (l. c. 1, 2 f.). See Duinge, Historie de l'Empire, p. 19-27.

62 See the three last books, v. 1, v. 2, v. 3.
of Ducange. In the year 1822, the was James de Brax, duke of Ande-son of Margaret, daughter of Cathorine, daughter of Philip, son of Baz-38 It is uncertain whether he left any posterity

63 Abulfeda, who saw the conclusion of the crusades, speaks of the kingdoms of the Franks, and those of the Negroes, is equally untrue (Prolegomena ad Geograph.). Had he not disdained the Latin language, how easily might the Syrian prince have found books and interpreters to furnish him with a correct account of the Europeans from whom he was

...of these versions from Latin into tatione et de laud. Interpretum, a work of constantinople A.D.
Commentaries, the Soliman Series
H.roides of Ovid, &c. (Facile Lib.

cation of the sense or vanity. Among the crowd of unthinking fanatics, a captive or a pilgrim might sometimes observe the superior refinements of Cairo and Constantinople: the first importer of windmills<sup>65</sup> was the benefactor of nations; and if such blessings are enjoyed without any grateful remembrance, history has condescended to notice the more apparent luxuries of silk and sugar, which were transported into Italy from Greece and Egypt. But the intellectual wants of the Latins were more slowly felt and supplied; the ardour of studious curiosity was awakened in Europe by different causes and more recent events; and, in the age of the crusades, they viewed with careless indifference the literature of the Greeks and Arabians. Some rudiments of mathematical and medicinal knowledge might be imparted in practice and in figures; necessity might produce some interpreters for the grosser business of merchants and soldiers; but the commerce of the Orientals had not diffused the study and knowledge of their languages in the schools of Europe.<sup>66</sup> If a similar principle of religion repulsed the idiom of the Koran, it should have excited their patience and curiosity to understand the original text of the Gospel; and the same grammar would have unfolded the sense of Plato and the beauties of Homer. Yet in a reign of sixty years, the Latins of Constantinople disdained the speech and learning of their subjects; and the manuscripts were the only treasures which the natives might enjoy without rapine or envy. Aristotle was indeed the oracle of the Western universities, but it was a barbarous Aristotle; and, instead of ascending to the fountain head, his Latin votaries humbly accepted a corrupt and remote version from the Jews and Moors of Andalusia. The principle of the crusades was a savage fanaticism; and the most important effects were analogous to the cause. Each pilgrim was ambitious to return with his sacred spoils, the relics of Greece and Palestine;<sup>67</sup> and each relic was preceded and followed by a train of miracles and visions. The belief of the Catholics was corrupted by new legends, their practice by new superstitions; and the establishment of the inquisition, the mendicant orders of monks and friars, the last abuse of indulgences, and the final progress of idolatry, flowed from the baleful fountain of the holy war. The active spirit of the Latins preyed on the vitals of their reason and religion; and if the ninth and tenth centuries were the times of darkness, the thirteenth and fourteenth were the age of absurdity and fable.

In the profusion of Christianity, in the cultivation of a fertile land, the northern conquerors of the Roman empire insensibly mingled with the provincials, and acknowledged the embers of the arts of antiquity. Their settlements about the age of Charlemagne had acquired some degree of order and stability, when they were overwhelmed by new swarms of invaders, the Normans, Sara-cens,<sup>68</sup> and Hungarians, who replunged the western countries of Europe into their former state of anarchy and barbarism. About the eleventh century, the second tempest had subsided by the expulsion or conversion of the enemies of Christendom: the tide of civilisation, which had so long ebbed, began to flow with a steady and accelerated course; and a fairer prospect was opened to the hopes and efforts of the rising generations. Great was the increase, and rapid the progress, during the two hundred years of the crusades; and some philosophers have applauded the propitious influence of these holy wars, which appear to me to have checked rather than forwarded the maturity of Europe.<sup>69</sup> The lives and labours of millions, which were buried in the East, would have been more profitably employed in the improvement of their native country: the accumulated stock of industry and wealth would have overflowed in navigation and trade; and the Latins would have been enriched and enlightened by a pure and friendly correspondence with the climates of the East. In one respect I can indeed perceive the accidental operation of the crusades, not so much in producing a benefit as in removing an evil. The larger portion of the inhabitants of Europe was chained to the soil, without freedom, or property, or knowledge; and the two orders of ecclesiastics and nobles, whose numbers were comparatively small, alone deserved the name of citizens and men. This oppressive system was supported by the arts of the clergy and the swords of the barons. The authority of the priests operated in the darker ages as a salutary antidote: they prevented the total extinction of letters, mitigated the fierceness of the times, sheltered the poor and defenceless, and preserved or revived the peace and order of civil society. But the independence, rapine, and discord, of the feudal lords were unmixd with any semblance of good: and every hope of industry and improvement was crushed by the iron weight of the martial aristocracy. Among the causes that undermined that Gothic edifice, a conspicuous place must be allowed to the crusades. The estates of the barons were dissipated, and their force was often extinguished, in these costly and perilous expeditions. Their poverty extorted from their pride those charters of freedom which unlocked the fetters of the slave, secured the farm of the peasant and the shop of the artificer, and gradually restored a substance and a soul to the most numerous and useful part of the community. The conflagration which destroyed the tall and barren trees of the forest, gave air and scope to the vegetation of the smaller and nutritive plants of the soil.

Digression on the Family of Courtenay.

THE purple of three emperors, who have reigned at Constantinople, will authorise or ex-

I shall only instance the pedegree of the Comnènes, and the flight of the house of Lorraine, at which we both derive from Palestine.

65 See the conquest of Sicily, under Roger, in the 11th century. Roger, vol. i. p. 418. Kippes edition. If Roger, himself, or his brother, understood some Greek, they were prodigious, and owed nothing to the commerce of the East.

66 Such was the opinion of the great Leobor of Lyons, de Fontenelle, tom. v. p. 438, a master of the history of the middle ages.

67 Such was the opinion of the great Leobor of Lyons, de Fontenelle, tom. v. p. 438, a master of the history of the middle ages.

68 Such was the opinion of the great Leobor of Lyons, de Fontenelle, tom. v. p. 438, a master of the history of the middle ages.

69 Such was the opinion of the great Leobor of Lyons, de Fontenelle, tom. v. p. 438, a master of the history of the middle ages.

time, that the rational pride of the family now refuses to accept this imaginary founder. Their most faithful historians believe, that after giving his daughter to the king's son, Reginald of Courtenay abandoned his possessions in France, and obtained from the English monarch a second wife and a new inheritance. It is certain, at least, that Henry the Second distinguished in his camps and councils, a Reginald, of the name and arms, and, as it may be fairly presumed, of the genuine race, of the Courtenays of Fiance. The right of wardship enabled a feudal lord to reward his vassal with the marriage and estate of a noble heiress; and Reginald of Courtenay acquired a fair establishment in Devonshire, where his posterity has been seated above six hundred years.<sup>83</sup> From a Norman baron, Baldwin de Briouisi, who had been invested by the Conqueror, Hawise, the wife of Reginald, derived the honour of Okhampton, which was held by the service of ninety-three knights; and a female might claim the manly offices of hereditary viscount or sheriff, and of captain of the royal castle of Exeter. Their son Robert married the sister of the earl of Devon; at the end of a century, on the failure of the family of Rivers,<sup>84</sup> his great-grandson, Hugh the second, succeeded to a title which was still considered as a territorial dignity; and twelve earls of Devonshire, of the name of Courtenay, have flourished in a period of two hundred and twenty years. They were ranked among the chief of the barons of the realm; nor was it till after a strenuous dispute, that they yielded to the fief of Arundel, the first place in the parliament of England: their alliances were contracted with the noblest families, the Veres, Despensers, St. Johns, Talbots, Bohuns, and even the Plantagenets themselves; and in a contest with John of Lancaster, a Courtenay, bishop of London, and afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, might be accused of profane confidence in the strength and number of his kindred. In peace, the earls of Devon resided in their numerous castles and manors of the West: their ample revenue was appropriated to devotion and hospitality; and the epitaph of Edward, surnamed, from his misfortune, the blind, from his virtues, the good, earl, inculcates with much ingenuity a moral sentence, which may, however, be abused by thoughtless generosity. After a grateful commemoration of the fifty-five years of union and happiness, which he enjoyed with Mabel his wife, the good earl thus speaks from the tomb:—

"What we gave, we have;

"What we spent, we had;

"What we left, we lost."<sup>85</sup>

But their losses, in this sense, were far superior to their gifts and expenses; and their heirs, not less than the poor, were the objects of their paternal care. The sums which they paid for livery and seisin attest the greatness of their possessions; and several estates have remained in their family since the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. In war, the Courtenays of England fulfilled the duties, and deserved the honours, of chivalry. They were often intrusted to levy and command the militia of Devonshire and Cornwall; they often attended their supreme lord to the borders of Scotland; and in foreign service, for a stipulated price, they sometimes maintained four-score men at arms and as many archers. By sea and land, they fought under the standard of the Edwards and Henries: their names are conspicuous in battles, in tournaments, and in the original list of the order of the Garter; three brothers shared the Spanish victory of the Black Prince; and in the lapse of six generations, the English Courtenays had learned to despise the nation and country from which they derived their origin. In the quarrel of the two roses, the earls of Devon adhered to the house of Lancaster; and three brothers successively died, either in the field or on the scaffold. Their honours and estates were restored by Henry the Seventh; a daughter of Edward the Fourth was not disgraced by the nuptials of a Courtenay; their son, who was created marquis of Exeter, enjoyed the favour of his cousin Henry the Eighth; and in the camp of Cloth of Gold, he broke a lance against the French monarch. But the favour of Henry was the prelude of disgrace; his disgrace was the signal of death; and of the victims of the jealous tyrant, the marquis of Exeter is one of the most noble and guiltless. His son Edward lived a prisoner in the Tower, and died an exile at Paris; and the secret love of queen Mary, whom he slighted, perhaps for the princess Elizabeth, has shed a romantic colour on the story of this beautiful youth. The relics of his patrimony were conveyed into strange families by the marriages of his four aunts; and his personal honours, as if they had been legally extinct, were revived by the patents of succeeding princes. But there still survived a lineal descendant of Hugh the first earl of Devon, a younger branch of the Courtenays, who had been seated at Powderham castle above four hundred years, from the reign of Edward the Third to the present hour. Their estates have been increased by the grant and improvement of lands in Ireland, and they have been recently restored to the honours of the peerage. Yet the Courtenays still retain the plaintive motto which asserts the innocence, and deploras the fall, of their ancient house.<sup>86</sup> While they sigh for past greatness, they are doubtless sensible of present blessings: in the long series of the Courtenay annals, the most splendid era is likewise the most unfortunate; nor can an opulent peer of Britain be inclined to envy the emperors of Constantinople, who wandered over Europe to solicit alms for the support of their dignity and the defence of their capital.

Should he not have corrected the register of Ford Abbey, and annihilated the phantom Florus, by the unquestionable evidence of the French historians?

<sup>83</sup> Besides the third and most valuable book of Cleveland's History, I have consulted Bagele, the father of our genealogical science, Barroage, part i. p. 651—675.

<sup>84</sup> This great family, de Briouisi, de Briouisi, de Rivers, ended in Edward the First's time, in Isabel de Courbus, a famous and proud beauty, who long survived her brother and husband of England; Barroage, part i. p. 254—277.

<sup>85</sup> Cleveland, p. 113. By some it is ascribed to a Rivers earl of Devon, but the English denotes the 17th, rather than the 14th century.

<sup>86</sup> The famous motto non fui in fine seculi was probably adopted by the Powderham family about the time of the fall of Edward the Fourth. The primitive arms of the Courtenays were, for the first time, a lion was his supporter. Early in the reign of Edward the Fourth, and the second century of B. was a

CHAP. LXII.

The Greek Emperors of Nice and Constantinople.

— Elevation and Reign of Michael Palæologus.

— His false Union with the Pope and the Latin Church. — Hostile Designs of Charles of Anjou.

— Revolt of Sicily. — War of the Catalans in Asia and Greece. — Revolutions and present State of Athens.

THE loss of Constantinople restored a momentary vigour to the Greeks. From their palaces, the princes and nobles were driven into the field; and the fragments of the falling monarchy were grasped by the hands of the most vigorous or the most skilful candidates. In the long and barren pages of the Byzantine annals,<sup>1</sup> it would not be an easy task to equal the two characters of Theodore Lascaris and John Ducas Vataces,<sup>2</sup> who replanted and upheld the Roman standard at Nice in Bithynia. The difference of their virtues was happily suited to the diversity of their situation. In his first efforts, the fugitive Lascaris commanded only three cities and two thousand soldiers: his reign was the season of generous and active despair: in every military operation he staked his life and crown; and his enemies, of the Hellespont and the Mæander, were surprised by his celerity and subdued by his boldness. A victorious reign of eighteen years expanded the principality of Nice to the magnitude of an empire. The throne of his successor and son-in-law Vataces was founded on a more solid basis, a larger scope, and more plentiful resources; and it was the temper, as well as the interest, of Vataces to calculate the risk, to expect the moment, and to ensure the success, of his ambitious designs. In the decline of the Latins, I have briefly exposed the progress of the Greeks; the prudent and gradual advances of a conqueror, who, in a reign of thirty-three years, rescued the provinces from national and foreign usurpers, till he pressed on all sides the Imperial city, a leafless and sapless trunk, which must fall at the first stroke of the axe. But his interior and peaceful administration is still more deserving of notice and praise.<sup>3</sup> The calamities of the times had wasted the numbers and the substance of the Greeks; the motives and the means of agriculture were extirpated; and the most fertile lands were left without cultivation or inhabitants. A portion of this vacant property was occupied and improved by the command, and for the benefit, of the emperor: a powerful hand and a vigilant eye supplied and surpassed, by a skilful management, the minute diligence of a private farmer: the royal domain became the garden and granary of Asia; and without impoverishing the people, the sovereign acquired a fund of innocent and productive wealth. According to the nature of the soil, his lands were sown with corn or planted with vines; the pastures were filled with horses and oxen, with sheep and hogs; and when Vataces presented to the empress a crown of diamonds and pearls, he informed her with a smile, that this precious ornament arose from the sale of the eggs of his innumerable poultry. The produce of his domain was applied to the maintenance of his palace and hospitals, the calls of dignity and benevolence: the lesson was still more useful than the revenue; the plough was restored to its ancient security and honour; and the nobles were taught to seek a sure and independent revenue from their estates, instead of adorning their splendid beggary by the oppression of the people, or (what is almost the same) by the favours of the court. The superfluous stock of corn and cattle was eagerly purchased by the Turks, with whom Vataces preserved a strict and sincere alliance; but he discouraged the importation of foreign manufactures, the costly silks of the East, and the curious labours of the Italian looms. "The demands of nature and necessity," was he accustomed to say, "are indispensable; but the influence of fashion may rise and sink at the breath of a monarch;" and both his precept and example recommended simplicity of manners and the use of domestic industry. The education of youth and the revival of learning were the most serious objects of his care; and, without deciding the precedence, he pronounced with truth, that a prince and a philosopher<sup>4</sup> are the two most eminent characters of human society. His first wife was Irene, the daughter of Theodore Lascaris, a woman more illustrious by her personal merit, the milder virtues of her sex, than by the blood of the Angeli and Comneni, that flowed in her veins, and transmitted the inheritance of the empire. After her death he was contracted to Anne, or Constance, a natural daughter of the emperor Frederic the Second; but as the bride had not attained the years of puberty, Vataces placed in his solitary bed an Italian damsel of her train; and his amorous weakness bestowed on the concubine the honours, though not the title, of lawful empress. His frailty was censured as a flagitious and damnable sin by the monks; and their rude invectives exercised and displayed the patience of the royal lover. A philosophic age may excuse a single vice, which was redeemed by a crowd of virtues; and in the review of his faults, and the more intemperate passions of Lascaris, the judgment of their contemporaries was softened by gratitude to the second founders of the empire.<sup>5</sup> The slaves of the Latins, without law or peace, applauded the happiness of their brethren who had resumed their national freedom; and Vataces employed the laudable policy of convincing the Greeks of every dominion that it was their interest to be enrolled in the number of his subjects.

<sup>1</sup> *Span of Lascaris, and the evangelia of Vataces. The two portraits are in a very good style.*

<sup>2</sup> Pachymer, l. i. c. 23, 24. Nic. Greg. l. ii. c. 6. The reader of the Byzantine must observe how rarely we are indulged with such precious details.

<sup>3</sup> The Latins.
<sup>4</sup> Nicephorus Gregoras (l. ii. c. 1) distinguishes between the epistat phorus ure, oras.

Theodore Lascaris II.
A. D. 1273,
Oct. 30 —
A. D. 1279,
August.

A strong shade of degeneracy is visible between John Vataces and his son Theodore; between the founder who sustained the weight, and the heir who enjoyed the splendour, of the Imperial crown.<sup>6</sup> Yet the character of Theodore was not devoid of energy; he had been educated in the school of his father, in the exercise of war and hunting: Constantinople was yet spared; but in the three years of a short reign, he thrice led his armies into the heart of Bulgaria. His virtues were sullied by a choleric and suspicious temper: the first of these may be ascribed to the ignorance of control; and the second might naturally arise from a dark and imperfect view of the corruption of mankind. On a march in Bulgaria, he consulted on a question of policy his principal ministers; and the Greek logothete, George Acropolita, presumed to offend him by the declaration of a free and honest opinion. The emperor half-unleashed his cimeter; but his more deliberate rage reserved Acropolita for a baser punishment. One of the first officers of the empire was ordered to dismount, stripped of his robes, and extended on the ground in the presence of the prince and army. In this posture he was chastised with so many and such heavy blows from the clubs of two guards or executioners, that when Theodore commanded them to cease, the great logothete was scarcely able to rise and crawl away to his tent. After a seclusion of some days, he was recalled by a peremptory mandate to his seat in council; and so dead were the Greeks to the sense of honour and shame, that it is from the narrative of the sufferer himself that we acquire the knowledge of his disgrace.<sup>7</sup> The cruelty of the emperor was exasperated by the pangs of sickness, the approach of a premature end, and the suspicion of poison and magic. The lives and fortunes, the eyes and limbs, of his kinsmen and nobles, were sacrificed to each sally of passion: and before he died, the son of Vataces might deserve from the people, or at least from the court, the appellation of tyrant. A matron of the family of the Palæologi had provoked his anger by refusing to bestow her beautiful daughter on the vile plebeian who was recommended by his caprice. Without regard to her birth or age, her body, as high as the neck, was enclosed in a sack with several cats, who were pricked with pins to irritate their fury against their unfortunate fellow-captive. In his last hours the emperor testified a wish to forgive and be forgiven, a just anxiety for the fate of John his son and successor, who, at the age of eight years, was condemned to the dangers of a long minority. His last choice intrusted the office of guardian to the sanctity of the patriarch Arsenius,

Minority of John Lascaris.
A. D. 1279,
August.

6 A Persian saying, that Cerns was the father, and Darius the master, of his subjects, was applied to Vataces and his son. But Facymer (l. i. c. 23) has mistaken the mild Darius for the cruel Cambyses, despot or tyrant of his people. By the institution of taxes, Greek families, καὶ δόξα αὐτοῖς, ἐπὶ τῇ μεγαλοπρεπείᾳ αὐτῶν καὶ χρυσοῦ ἐντοκοδοσίᾳ. Does he mean, by this decoration, a figurative, or a real, golden chain? Perhaps, both.

and to the courage of George Muzalon, the great domestic, who was equally distinguished by the royal favour and the public hatred. Since their connection with the Latins, the names and privileges of hereditary rank had insinuated themselves into the Greek monarchy; and the noble families<sup>8</sup> were provoked by the elevation of a worthless favourite, to whose influence they imputed the errors and calamities of the late reign. In the first council, after the emperor's death, Muzalon, from a lofty throne, pronounced a laboured apology of his conduct and intentions: his modesty was subdued by an unanimous assurance of esteem and fidelity; and his most inveterate enemies were the loudest to salute him as the guardian and saviour of the Romans. Eight days were sufficient to prepare the execution of the conspiracy. On the ninth, the obsequies of the deceased monarch were solemnised in the cathedral of Magnesia,<sup>9</sup> an Asiatic city, where he expired, on the banks of the Hermus, and at the foot of Mount Sipylus. The holy rites were interrupted by a sedition of the guards; Muzalon, his brothers, and his adherents, were massacred at the foot of the altar; and the absent patriarch was associated with a new colleague, with Michael Palæologus, the most illustrious, in birth and merit, of the Greek nobles.<sup>10</sup>

Of those who are proud of their ancestors, the far greater part must be content with local or domestic renown; and few there are who dare trust the memorials of their family to the public annals of their country. As early as the middle of the eleventh century, the noble race of the Palæologi<sup>11</sup> stands high and conspicuous in the Byzantine history; it was the valiant George Palæologus who placed the father of the Comneni on the throne; and his kinsmen or descendants continue, in each generation, to lead the armies and councils of the state. The purple was not dishonoured by their alliance; and had the law of succession, and female succession, been strictly observed, the wife of Theodore Lascaris must have yielded to her elder sister, the mother of Michael Palæologus, who afterwards raised his family to the throne. In his person, the splendour of birth was dignified by the merit of the soldier and statesman: in his early youth he was promoted to the office of constable or commander of the French mercenaries; the private expense of a day never exceeded three pieces of gold; but his ambition was rapacious and profuse; and his gifts were doubled by the graces of his conversation and manners. The love of the soldiers and people excited the jealousy of the court; and Michael thrice escaped from the dangers in which he was involved by his own imprudence or that of his friends. I. Under the character of Michael Palæologus.

Family and

and his eight hours, or fort, Voyage du Levant.

who lived too near the times;

explained by Innocent, Episc. Byzant. l. i. c. 7. 121. and 129. p. 121. 122. 123. 124. 125. 126. 127. 128. 129. 130. 131. 132. 133. 134. 135. 136. 137. 138. 139. 140. 141. 142. 143. 144. 145. 146. 147. 148. 149. 150. 151. 152. 153. 154. 155. 156. 157. 158. 159. 160. 161. 162. 163. 164. 165. 166. 167. 168. 169. 170. 171. 172. 173. 174. 175. 176. 177. 178. 179. 180. 181. 182. 183. 184. 185. 186. 187. 188. 189. 190. 191. 192. 193. 194. 195. 196. 197. 198. 199. 200. 201. 202. 203. 204. 205. 206. 207. 208. 209. 210. 211. 212. 213. 214. 215. 216. 217. 218. 219. 220. 221. 222. 223. 224. 225. 226. 227. 228. 229. 230. 231. 232. 233. 234. 235. 236. 237. 238. 239. 240. 241. 242. 243. 244. 245. 246. 247. 248. 249. 250. 251. 252. 253. 254. 255. 256. 257. 258. 259. 260. 261. 262. 263. 264. 265. 266. 267. 268. 269. 270. 271. 272. 273. 274. 275. 276. 277. 278. 279. 280. 281. 282. 283. 284. 285. 286. 287. 288. 289. 290. 291. 292. 293. 294. 295. 296. 297. 298. 299. 300. 301. 302. 303. 304. 305. 306. 307. 308. 309. 310. 311. 312. 313. 314. 315. 316. 317. 318. 319. 320. 321. 322. 323. 324. 325. 326. 327. 328. 329. 330. 331. 332. 333. 334. 335. 336. 337. 338. 339. 340. 341. 342. 343. 344. 345. 346. 347. 348. 349. 350. 351. 352. 353. 354. 355. 356. 357. 358. 359. 360. 361. 362. 363. 364. 365. 366. 367. 368. 369. 370. 371. 372. 373. 374. 375. 376. 377. 378. 379. 380. 381. 382. 383. 384. 385. 386. 387. 388. 389. 390. 391. 392. 393. 394. 395. 396. 397. 398. 399. 400. 401. 402. 403. 404. 405. 406. 407. 408. 409. 410. 411. 412. 413. 414. 415. 416. 417. 418. 419. 420. 421. 422. 423. 424. 425. 426. 427. 428. 429. 430. 431. 432. 433. 434. 435. 436. 437. 438. 439. 440. 441. 442. 443. 444. 445. 446. 447. 448. 449. 450. 451. 452. 453. 454. 455. 456. 457. 458. 459. 460. 461. 462. 463. 464. 465. 466. 467. 468. 469. 470. 471. 472. 473. 474. 475. 476. 477. 478. 479. 480. 481. 482. 483. 484. 485. 486. 487. 488. 489. 490. 491. 492. 493. 494. 495. 496. 497. 498. 499. 500. 501. 502. 503. 504. 505. 506. 507. 508. 509. 510. 511. 512. 513. 514. 515. 516. 517. 518. 519. 520. 521. 522. 523. 524. 525. 526. 527. 528. 529. 530. 531. 532. 533. 534. 535. 536. 537. 538. 539. 540. 541. 542. 543. 544. 545. 546. 547. 548. 549. 550. 551. 552. 553. 554. 555. 556. 557. 558. 559. 560. 561. 562. 563. 564. 565. 566. 567. 568. 569. 570. 571. 572. 573. 574. 575. 576. 577. 578. 579. 580. 581. 582. 583. 584. 585. 586. 587. 588. 589. 590. 591. 592. 593. 594. 595. 596. 597. 598. 599. 600. 601. 602. 603. 604. 605. 606. 607. 608. 609. 610. 611. 612. 613. 614. 615. 616. 617. 618. 619. 620. 621. 622. 623. 624. 625. 626. 627. 628. 629. 630. 631. 632. 633. 634. 635. 636. 637. 638. 639. 640. 641. 642. 643. 644. 645. 646. 647. 648. 649. 650. 651. 652. 653. 654. 655. 656. 657. 658. 659. 660. 661. 662. 663. 664. 665. 666. 667. 668. 669. 670. 671. 672. 673. 674. 675. 676. 677. 678. 679. 680. 681. 682. 683. 684. 685. 686. 687. 688. 689. 690. 691. 692. 693. 694. 695. 696. 697. 698. 699. 700. 701. 702. 703. 704. 705. 706. 707. 708. 709. 710. 711. 712. 713. 714. 715. 716. 717. 718. 719. 720. 721. 722. 723. 724. 725. 726. 727. 728. 729. 730. 731. 732. 733. 734. 735. 736. 737. 738. 739. 740. 741. 742. 743. 744. 745. 746. 747. 748. 749. 750. 751. 752. 753. 754. 755. 756. 757. 758. 759. 760. 761. 762. 763. 764. 765. 766. 767. 768. 769. 770. 771. 772. 773. 774. 775. 776. 777. 778. 779. 780. 781. 782. 783. 784. 785. 786. 787. 788. 789. 790. 791. 792. 793. 794. 795. 796. 797. 798. 799. 800. 801. 802. 803. 804. 805. 806. 807. 808. 809. 810. 811. 812. 813. 814. 815. 816. 817. 818. 819. 820. 821. 822. 823. 824. 825. 826. 827. 828. 829. 830. 831. 832. 833. 834. 835. 836. 837. 838. 839. 840. 841. 842. 843. 844. 845. 846. 847. 848. 849. 850. 851. 852. 853. 854. 855. 856. 857. 858. 859. 860. 861. 862. 863. 864. 865. 866. 867. 868. 869. 870. 871. 872. 873. 874. 875. 876. 877. 878. 879. 880. 881. 882. 883. 884. 885. 886. 887. 888. 889. 890. 891. 892. 893. 894. 895. 896. 897. 898. 899. 900. 901. 902. 903. 904. 905. 906. 907. 908. 909. 910. 911. 912. 913. 914. 915. 916. 917. 918. 919. 920. 921. 922. 923. 924. 925. 926. 927. 928. 929. 930. 931. 932. 933. 934. 935. 936. 937. 938. 939. 940. 941. 942. 943. 944. 945. 946. 947. 948. 949. 950. 951. 952. 953. 954. 955. 956. 957. 958. 959. 960. 961. 962. 963. 964. 965. 966. 967. 968. 969. 970. 971. 972. 973. 974. 975. 976. 977. 978. 979. 980. 981. 982. 983. 984. 985. 986. 987. 988. 989. 990. 991. 992. 993. 994. 995. 996. 997. 998. 999. 1000.

reign of Justice and Vataces a dispute arose<sup>12</sup> between two officers, one of whom accused the other of maintaining the hereditary right of the Palæologi. The cause was decided, according to the new jurisprudence of the Latins, by single combat: the defendant was overthrown; but he persisted in declaring that himself alone was guilty; and that he had uttered these rash or treasonable speeches without the approbation or knowledge of his patron. Yet a cloud of suspicion hung over the innocence of the constable: he was still pursued by the whispers of malevolence; and a subtle courtier, the archbishop of Philadelphia, urged him to accept the judgment of God in the fiery proof of the ordeal.<sup>13</sup> Three days before the trial, the patient's arm was enclosed in a bag, and secured by the royal signet; and it was incumbent on him to bear a red-hot ball of iron three times from the altar to the rails of the sanctuary, without artifice and without injury. Palæologus eluded the dangerous experiment with sense and pleasantry. "I am a soldier," said he, "and will boldly enter the lists with my accusers: but a layman, a sinner like myself, is not endowed with the gift of miracles. Your piety, most holy prelate, may deserve the interposition of Heaven, and from your hands I will receive the fiery globe, the pledge of my innocence." The archbishop started; the emperor smiled; and the absolution or pardon of Michael was approved by new rewards and new services. II. In the succeeding reign, as he held the government of Nice, he was secretly informed, that the mind of the absent prince was poisoned with jealousy; and that death, or blindness, would be his final reward. Instead of awaiting the return and sentence of Theodore, the constable, with some followers, escaped from the city and the empire; and though he was plundered by the Turkmans of the desert, he found an hospitable refuge in the court of the sultan. In the ambiguous state of an exile, Michael reconciled the duties of gratitude and loyalty: drawing his sword against the Tartars; admonishing the garrisons of the Roman limit; and promoting, by his influence, the restoration of peace, in which his pardon and recall were honourably included. III. While he guarded the West against the despot of Epirus, Michael was again suspected and condemned in the palace; and such was his loyalty or weakness, that he submitted to be led in chains above six hundred miles from Durazzo to Nice. The civility of the messenger alleviated his disgrace; the emperor's sickness dispelled his danger; and the last breath of Theodore, which recommended his infant son, at once acknowledged the innocence and the power of Palæologus.

But his innocence had been too unworthily treated, and his power<sup>His elevation to the throne.</sup> was too strongly felt, to curb an aspiring subject in the fair field that was opened to his ambition.<sup>14</sup> In the council after the death of Theodore, he was the first to pronounce, and the first to violate, the oath of allegiance to Muzalon; and so dexterous was his conduct, that he reaped the benefit, without incurring the guilt, or at least the reproach, of the subsequent massacre. In the choice of a regent, he balanced the interests and passions of the candidates; turned their envy and hatred from himself against each other, and forced every competitor to own, that, after his own claims, those of Palæologus were best entitled to the preference. Under the title of Great Duke, he accepted or assumed, during a long minority, the active powers of government; the patriarch was a venerable name; and the factious nobles were seduced, or oppressed, by the ascendancy of his genius. The fruits of the economy of Vataces were deposited in a strong castle on the banks of the Hermus, in the custody of the faithful Varangians: the constable retained his command or influence over the foreign troops; he employed the guards to possess the treasure, and the treasure to corrupt the guards; and whatsoever might be the abuse of the public money, his character was above the suspicion of private avarice. By himself, or by his emissaries, he strove to persuade every rank of subjects, that their own prosperity would rise in just proportion to the establishment of his authority. The weight of taxes was suspended, the perpetual theme of popular complaint; and he prohibited the trials by the ordeal and judicial combat. These barbaric institutions were already abolished or undermined in France<sup>15</sup> and England;<sup>16</sup> and the appeal to the sword offended the sense of a civilised,<sup>17</sup> and the temper of an unwarlike, people. For the future maintenance of their wives and children, the veterans were grateful: the priest and the philosopher applauded his ardent zeal for the advancement of religion and learning; and his vague promise of rewarding merit was applied by every candidate to his own hopes. Conscious of the influence of the clergy, Michael successfully laboured to secure the suffrage of that powerful order. Their expensive journey from Nice to Magnesia afforded a decent and ample pretence: the leading prelates were tempted by the liberality of his nocturnal visits; and the incorruptible patriarch was flattered by the homage of his new colleague, who led his mule by the bridle into the town, and removed to a respectful distance the importunity of the crowd. Without renouncing his title by royal descent, Palæologus encouraged a free discussion into the advantages of ville prefers the proof by evidence, and that by judicial combat is reprobated in the Fleta. Yet the trial by battle has never been abrogated in the English law, and it was ordered by the judges as late as the beginning of the last century.

17 Yet an ingenious friend has urged to me in mitigation of this practice, 1. That in nations emerging from barbarism, it moderates the licence of private war and arbitrary revenge. 2. That it is less absurd than the trials by the ordeal, or by drawing water, or the cross, which it has contrived to abolish. 3. That it is a cruel at least as a test of person or courage; a quality so seldom united with a base disposition, that the danger of a trial might be so much less to a malicious prosecutor, and in case of his being accused, to a malicious supporter of power. The culprit and the unfortunate art of surrey might possibly have escaped his unrelenting fire, had not his demand of the combat against his accuser been over-ruled.

12 Acropolis (c. 50) relates the circumstances of this curious adventure, which seem to have escaped the more recent writers.

13 Pachymer (l. i. c. 13), who speaks with proper contempt of this barbarous trial, affirms, that he had seen in his youth many persons who had sustained, without injury, the fiery ordeal. As a Greek, he is credulous; but the ingenuity of the Greeks might furnish some remedies of art or fraud against their own superstition, or that of their tyrant.

14 Without mentioning such names as Thucydides or Tacitus, I will (l. 1. n. 1), which pursues the necessity, and tolerable freedom, more concisely.

15 St. Louis in his own territories; and his example and authority were at length prevalent in France (Espit des Loix, l. xxviii. c. 29).

16 In civil cases Henry II. gave an option to the defendant. Glanelective monarchy; and his adherents asked, with the insolence of triumph, what patient would trust his health, or what merchant would abandon his vessel, to the hereditary skill of a physician or a pilot? The youth of the emperor, and the impending dangers of a minority, required the support of a mature and experienced guardian; of an associate raised above the envy of his equals, and invested with the name and prerogatives of royalty. For the interest of the prince and people, without any selfish views for himself or his family, the Great Duke consented to guard and instruct the son of Theodore; but he sighed for the happy moment when he might restore to his firmer hands the administration of his patrimony, and enjoy the blessing of a private station. He was first invested with the title and prerogatives of despot, which bestowed the purple ornaments, and the second place in the Roman monarchy. It was afterwards agreed that John and Michael should be proclaimed as joint emperors, and raised on the buckler, but that the pre-eminence should be reserved for the birthright of the former. A mutual league of amity was pledged between the royal partners; and in case of a rupture, the subjects were bound by their oath of allegiance to declare themselves against the aggressor; an ambiguous name, the seed of discord and civil war. Palæologus was content; but on the day of the coronation, and in the cathedral of Nice, his zealous adherents most vehemently urged the just priority of his age and merit. The unseasonable dispute was eluded by postponing to a more convenient opportunity the coronation of John Lascaris; and he walked with a slight diadem in the train of his guardian, who alone received the Imperial crown from the hands of the patriarch. It was not without extreme reluctance that Arsenius abandoned the cause of his pupil; but the Vangarians brandished their battle-axes; a sign of assent was extorted from the trembling youth; and some voices were heard, that the life of a child should no longer impede the settlement of the nation. A full harvest of honours and employments was distributed among his friends by the grateful Palæologus. In his own family, he created a despot and two Sebastocrators; Alexius Strategopulus was decorated with the title of Cæsar; and that veteran commander soon repaid the obligation, by restoring Constantinople to the Greek emperor.

It was in the second year of his reign, while he resided in the palace and gardens of Nymphæum,<sup>18</sup> near Synrna, that the first messenger arrived at the dead of night; and the stupendous intelligence was imparted to Michael, after he had been gently waked by the tender precaution of his sister Eulogia. The man was unknown or obscure; he produced no letters from the victorious Cæsar; nor could it easily be credited, after the defeat of Vataces and the recent failure of Palæologus himself, that the capital had been surprised by a detachment of eight hundred soldiers. As an hostage, the doubtful author was confined, with the assurance of death or an ample recompence; and the court was left some hours in the anxiety of hope and fear, till the messengers of Alexius arrived with the authentic intelligence, and displayed the trophies of the conquest, the sword and sceptre,<sup>19</sup> the buskins and bonnet,<sup>20</sup> of the usurper Baldwin, which he had dropped in his precipitate flight. A general assembly of the bishops, senators, and nobles, was immediately convened, and never perhaps was an event received with more heartfelt and universal joy. In a studied oration, the new sovereign of Constantinople congratulated his own and the public fortune. "There was a time," said he, "a far distant time, when the Roman empire extended to the Hædriatic, the Tigris, and the confines of Æthiopia. After the loss of the provinces, our capital itself, in these last and calamitous days, has been wrested from our hands by the barbarians of the West. From the lowest ebb, the tide of prosperity has again returned in our favour; but our prosperity was that of fugitives and exiles; and when we were asked, which was the country of the Romans, we indicated with a blush the climate of the globe and the quarter of the heavens. The divine Providence has now restored to our arms the city of Constantine, the sacred seat of religion and empire; and it will depend on our valour and conduct to render this important acquisition the pledge and omen of future victories." So eager was the impatience of the prince and people, that Michael made his triumphal entry into Constantinople only twenty days after the expulsion of the Latins. The golden gate was thrown open at his approach; the devout conqueror dismounted from his horse; and a miraculous image of Mary the Conductress was borne before him, that the divine Virgin in person might appear to conduct him to the temple of her Son, the cathedral of St. Sophia. But after the first transport of devotion and pride, he sighed at the dreary prospect of solitude and ruin. The palæe was defiled with smoke and dirt, and the gross intemperance of the Franks; whole streets had been consumed by fire, or were decayed by the injuries of time; the sacred and profane edifices were stripped of their ornaments; and, as if they were conscious of their approaching exile, the industry of the Latins had been confined to the work of pillage and destruction. Trade had expired under the pressure of anarchy and distress, and the numbers of inhabitants had decreased with the opulence of the city. It was the first care of the Greek monarch to reinstate the nobles in the palaces of their fathers; and the houses or the ground which they occupied were restored to the families that emperor.

Michael
Palæologus
A. D. 1204,
Jan. 1.

Recovery of Constantinople.
A. D. 1204,
July 26.

18 The site of Nymphæum is not clearly defined in ancient or modern writers. B. 1. c. 10. says it was the last hours of Vataces. A. reports it was the residence of the emperor. C. says it was the residence of the emperor. D. says it was the residence of the emperor. E. says it was the residence of the emperor. F. says it was the residence of the emperor. G. says it was the residence of the emperor. H. says it was the residence of the emperor. I. says it was the residence of the emperor. J. says it was the residence of the emperor. K. says it was the residence of the emperor. L. says it was the residence of the emperor. M. says it was the residence of the emperor. N. says it was the residence of the emperor. O. says it was the residence of the emperor. P. says it was the residence of the emperor. Q. says it was the residence of the emperor. R. says it was the residence of the emperor. S. says it was the residence of the emperor. T. says it was the residence of the emperor. U. says it was the residence of the emperor. V. says it was the residence of the emperor. W. says it was the residence of the emperor. X. says it was the residence of the emperor. Y. says it was the residence of the emperor. Z. says it was the residence of the emperor.

Return of the Greek emperor.
A. D. 1204,
Aug. 11.

named Ducal, and the Imperial sceptre was distinguished as usual by the red or purple tassel. 19 A. reports that the sceptre was given to the Franks by the emperor; but B. says it was the property of the emperor. C. says it was the property of the emperor. D. says it was the property of the emperor. E. says it was the property of the emperor. F. says it was the property of the emperor. G. says it was the property of the emperor. H. says it was the property of the emperor. I. says it was the property of the emperor. J. says it was the property of the emperor. K. says it was the property of the emperor. L. says it was the property of the emperor. M. says it was the property of the emperor. N. says it was the property of the emperor. O. says it was the property of the emperor. P. says it was the property of the emperor. Q. says it was the property of the emperor. R. says it was the property of the emperor. S. says it was the property of the emperor. T. says it was the property of the emperor. U. says it was the property of the emperor. V. says it was the property of the emperor. W. says it was the property of the emperor. X. says it was the property of the emperor. Y. says it was the property of the emperor. Z. says it was the property of the emperor.

could exhibit a legal right of inheritance. But the far greater part was extinct or lost; the vacant property had devolved to the lord; he repeopled Constantinople by a liberal invitation to the provinces; and the brave volunteers were seated in the capital which had been recovered by their arms. The French harons and the principal families had retired with their emperor; but the patient and humble crowd of Latins was attached to the country, and indifferent to the change of masters. Instead of banishing the factories of the Pisans, Venetians, and Genoese, the prudent conqueror accepted their oaths of allegiance, encouraged their industry, confirmed their privileges, and allowed them to live under the jurisdiction of their proper magistrates. Of these nations, the Pisans and Venetians preserved their respective quarters in the city; but the services and power of the Genoese deserved at the same time the gratitude and the jealousy of the Greeks. Their independent colony was first planted at the seaport town of Heraclea in Thrace. They were speedily recalled, and settled in the exclusive possession of the suburb of Galata, an advantageous post, in which they revived the commerce, and insulted the majesty, of the Byzantine empire.<sup>21</sup>

Palæologus blinds and banishes the young emperor.
A. D. 1261,
Dec. 25;

The recovery of Constantinople was celebrated as the era of a new empire: the conqueror, alone, and by the right of the sword, renewed his coronation in the church of St. Sophia; and the name and honours of John Lascaris, his pupil and lawful sovereign, were insensibly abolished. But his claims still lived in the minds of the people; and the royal youth must speedily attain the years of manhood and ambition. By fear or conscience, Palæologus was restrained from dipping his hands in innocent and royal blood; but the anxiety of an usurper and a parent urged him to secure his throne, by one of those imperfect crimes so familiar to the modern Greeks. The loss of sight incapacitated the young prince for the active business of the world: instead of the brutal violence of tearing out his eyes, the visual nerve was destroyed by the intense glare of a red-hot basin,<sup>22</sup> and John Lascaris was removed to a distant castle, where he spent many years in privacy and oblivion. Such cool and deliberate guilt may seem incompatible with remorse; but if Michael could trust the mercy of Heaven, he was not inaccessible to the reproaches and vengeance of mankind, which he had provoked by cruelty and treason. His cruelty imposed on a servile court the duties of applause or silence; but the clergy had a right to speak in the name of their invisible master; and their holy legions were led by a prelate, whose character was above the temptations of hope or fear. After a short abdication of his dignity, Arsenius<sup>23</sup> had consent to ascend the ecclesiastical throne of Constantinople, and to preside in the restoration of the church. His pious simplicity was long deceived by the arts of Palæologus; and his patience and submission might soothe the usurper, and protect the safety of the young prince. On the news of his inhuman treatment, the patriarch unsheathed the spiritual sword; and superstition, on this occasion, was enlisted in the cause of humanity and justice. In a synod of bishops, who were stimulated by the example of his zeal, the patriarch pronounced a sentence of excommunication; though his prudence still repeated the name of Michael in the public prayers. The Eastern prelates had not adopted the dangerous maxims of ancient Rome; nor did they presume to enforce their censures, by deposing princes, or absolving nations from their oaths of allegiance. But the Christian who had been separated from God and the church, became an object of horror; and, in a turbulent and fanatic capital, that horror might arm the hand of an assassin, or inflame a sedition of the people. Palæologus felt his danger, confessed his guilt, and deprecated his judge: the act was irrevocable; the prize was obtained; and the most rigorous penance, which he solicited, would have raised the sinner to the reputation of a saint. The unrelenting patriarch refused to announce any means of atonement or any hopes of mercy; and condescended only to pronounce, that, for so great a crime, great indeed must be the satisfaction. "Do you require," said Michael, "that I should abdicate the empire?" And at these words, he offered, or seemed to offer, the sword of state. Arsenius eagerly grasped this pledge of sovereignty: but when he perceived that the emperor was unwilling to purchase absolution at so dear a rate, he indignantly escaped to his cell, and left the royal sinner kneeling and weeping before the door.<sup>24</sup>

The danger and scandal of this excommunication subsisted above three years, till the popular clamour was assuaged by time and repentance; till the brethren of Arsenius condemned his inflexible spirit, so repugnant to the unbounded forgiveness of the Gospel. The emperor had artfully insinuated, that, if he were still rejected at home, he might seek, in the Roman pontiff, a more indulgent judge; but it was far more easy and effectual to find or to place that judge at the head of the Byzantine church. Arsenius was involved in a vague rumour of conspiracy and disaffection; some irregular steps in his ordination and government were liable to censure; a synod deposed him from the episcopal office; and he was transported under a guard of soldiers to a small island of the Propontis. Before his exile, he suddenly requested that a strict account might be is excommunicated by the patriarch Arsenius.

A. D. 1262—1268.

Schism of the Arsenites.
A. D. 1266
—1314.

<sup>21</sup> See Pachymer (l. ii. c. 28—33), Acropolita (c. 55), Nicephorus

head with a strong cord till the eyes burst from their sockets. Ingenious tyrant.

<sup>23</sup> See the first retreat and restoration of Arsenius, in Pachymer (l. iii. c. 15; l. iv. c. 1, 2), and Nicephorus Gregoras (l. iii. c. 1, 17; c. 11).

<sup>24</sup> 1. The emperor's penance restored their freedom.

taken of the treasures of the church; boasted, that his sole riches, three pieces of gold, had been earned by transcribing the psalms; continued to assert the freedom of his mind; and denied, with his last breath, the pardon which was implored by the royal sinner.<sup>25</sup> After some delay, Gregory, bishop of Adrianople, was translated to the Byzantine throne; but his authority was found insufficient to support the absolution of the emperor; and Joseph, a reverend monk, was substituted to that important function. This edifying scene was represented in the presence of the senate and people; at the end of six years, the humble penitent was restored to the communion of the faithful; and humanity will rejoice, that a milder treatment of the captive Lascaris was stipulated as a proof of his remorse. But the spirit of Arsenius still survived in a powerful faction of the monks and clergy, who persevered above forty-eight years in an obstinate schism. Their scruples were treated with tenderness and respect by Michael and his son; and the reconciliation of the Arsenites was the serious labour of the church and state. In the confidence of fanaticism, they had proposed to try their cause by a miracle; and when the two papers, that contained their own and the adverse cause, were cast into a fiery brasier, they expected that the Catholic verity would be respected by the flames. Alas! the two papers were indiscriminately consumed, and this unforeseen accident produced the union of a day, and renewed the quarrel of an age.<sup>26</sup> The final treaty displayed the victory of the Arsenites: the clergy abstained during forty days from all ecclesiastical functions: a slight penance was imposed on the laity; the body of Arsenius was deposited in the sanctuary; and in the name of the departed saint, the prince and people were released from the sins of their fathers.<sup>27</sup>

Reign of Michael Palæologus,
A. D. 1282,
Dec. 1—
A. D. 1282,
Dec. 11.
Reign of Andronicus
the Elder,
A. D. 1273,
Nov. 8—
A. D. 1279,
Feb. 13.

The establishment of his family was the motive, or at least the pretence, of the crime of Palæologus; and he was impatient to confirm the succession, by sharing with his eldest son the honours of the purple. Andronicus, afterwards surnamed the Elder, was proclaimed and crowned emperor of the Romans, in the fifteenth year of his age; and, from the first æra of a prolix and inglorious reign, he held that august title nine years as the colleague, and fifty as the successor, of his father. Michael himself, had he died in a private station, would have been thought more worthy of the empire: the assaults of his temporal and spiritual enemies left him few moments to labour for his own fame or the happiness of his subjects. He wrested from the Franks several of the noblest islands of the Archipelago, Lesbos, Chios, and Rhodes: his brother Constantine was sent to command in Malvasia and Sparta; and the eastern side of the Morea, from Argos and Napoli to Cape Tænarus, was repossessed by the Greeks. This effusion of Christian blood was loudly condemned by the patriarch; and the insolent priest presumed to interpose his fears and scruples between the arms of princes. But in the prosecution of these western conquests, the countries beyond the Hellespont were left naked to the Turks; and their depredations verified the prophecy of a dying senator, that the recovery of Constantinople would be the ruin of Asia. The victories of Michael were achieved by his lieutenants; his sword rusted in the palace; and, in the transactions of the emperor with the popes and the king of Naples, his political arts were stained with cruelty and fraud.<sup>28</sup>

I. The Vatican was the most natural refuge of a Latin emperor, who had been driven from his throne; and pope Urban the Fourth appeared to pity the misfortunes, and vindicate the cause, of the fugitive Baldwin. A crusade, with plenary indulgence, was preached by his command against the schismatic Greeks; he excommunicated their allies and adherents; solicited Louis the Ninth in favour of his kinsman; and demanded a tenth of the ecclesiastical revenues of France and England for the service of the holy war.<sup>29</sup> The subtle Greek, who watched the rising tempest of the West, attempted to suspend or soothe the hostility of the pope, by suppliant embassies and respectful letters; but he insinuated that the establishment of peace must prepare the reconciliation and obedience of the Eastern church. The Roman court could not be deceived by so gross an artifice; and Michael was admonished, that the repentance of the son should precede the forgiveness of the father; and that fath (an ambiguous word) was the only basis of friendship and alliance. After a long and affected delay, the approach of danger, and the importunity of Gregory the Tenth, compelled him to enter on a more serious negotiation: he alleged the example of the great Vataces; and the Greek clergy, who understood the intentions of their prince, were not alarmed by the first steps of reconciliation and respect. But when he pressed the conclusion of the treaty, they strenuously declared, that the Latins, though not in name, were heretics in fact, and that they despised those strangers as the vilest and most despicable portion of the human race.<sup>30</sup> It was the task of the emperor to persuade, to corrupt, to intimidate, the most popular ecclesiastics, to gain the vote of each individual, and alternately to urge the arguments of Christian charity and the public welfare. The texts of the fathers and the arms of the Franks were balanced in the theological and political scale;

His union
with the Latin church.
A. D. 1274.
—1277.

<sup>25</sup> Pachymer relates the exile of Arsenius (l. iv. c. 1.—16.) he was one of the commissaries who visited him in the desert island. The last testament of the unforfeigning patriarch is still extant (Dupan, Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique, tom. x. p. 171.).

<sup>26</sup> Pachymer (l. vii. c. 22) relates this miraculous trial like a philosopher, and treats with similar contempt a plot of the Arsenites, to hide a revelation in the coffin of some old saint (l. vii. c. 13.). He

<sup>28</sup> Of the xiii books of Pachymer, the first six (as the 15th and 17th of Nicephorus Gregoras) contain the reign of Michael, at the time of whose death he was forty years of age. Instead of breaking, like his editor the Père Pausan, his history into two parts, I follow Ducange and Cousin, who number the xiii books in one series.

<sup>29</sup> Ducange, Hist. de G. P. l. v. c. 35, &c. from the Epistles of Urban IV.

<sup>30</sup> From their mercenary intercourse with the Venetians and Genoese, they branded the Latins as heretics and idolaters. Pachymer, l. vi. c. 10. Some are heretics in name, others in fact. The Latins, in fact, said the learned heretics (l. vi. c. 11.) who soon afterwards became converts (c. 12. 16.) to a profession of Christianity.

and without approving the addition to the Nicene creed, the most moderate were taught to confess, that the two hostile propositions of proceeding from the Father by the Son, and of proceeding from the Father and the Son, might be reduced to a safe and Catholic sense.<sup>31</sup> The supremacy of the pope was a doctrine more easy to conceive, but more painful to acknowledge; yet Michael represented to his monks and prelates, that they might submit to name the Roman bishop as the first of the patriarchs; and that their distance and discretion would guard the liberties of the Eastern church from the mischievous consequences of the right of appeal. He protested that he would sacrifice his life and empire rather than yield the smallest point of orthodox faith or national independence; and this declaration was sealed and ratified by a golden bull. The patriarch Joseph withdrew to a monastery, to resign or resume his throne, according to the event of the treaty: the letters of union and obedience were subscribed by the emperor, his son Andronicus, and thirty-five archbishops and metropolitans, with their respective synods; and the episcopal list was multiplied by many dioceses which were annihilated under the yoke of the infidels. An embassy was composed of some trusty ministers and prelates; they embarked for Italy, with rich ornaments and rare perfumes, for the altar of St. Peter; and their secret orders authorised and recommended a boundless compliance. They were received in the general council of Lyons, by pope Gregory the Tenth, at the head of five hundred bishops.<sup>32</sup> He embraced with tears his long-lost and repentant children; accepted the oath of the ambassadors, who abjured the schism in the name of the two emperors; adorned the prelates with the ring and mitre; chanted in Greek and Latin the Nicene creed with the addition of filioque; and rejoiced in the union of the East and West, which had been reserved for his reign. To consummate this pious work, the Byzantine deputies were speedily followed by the pope's nuncios; and their instruction discloses the policy of the Vatican, which could not be satisfied with the vain title of supremacy. After viewing the temper of the prince and people, they were enjoined to dissolve the schismatic clergy, who should subscribe and swear their abjuration and obedience; to establish in all the churches the use of the perfect creed; to prepare the entrance of a cardinal legate, with the full powers and dignity of his office; and to instruct the emperor in the advantages which he might derive from the temporal protection of the Roman pontiff.<sup>33</sup>

But they found a country without a friend, a nation in which the names of Rome and Union were pronounced with abhorrence. The patriarch Joseph was indeed removed; his place was filled by Veccus, an ecclesiastic of learning and moderation; and the emperor was still urged by the same motives, to persevere in the same professions. But in his private language, Palæologus affected to deplore the pride, and to blame the innovations, of the Latins; and while he debased his character by this double hypocrisy, he justified and punished the opposition of his subjects. By the joint suffrage of the new and the ancient Rome, a sentence of excommunication was pronounced against the obstinate schismatics; the censures of the church were executed by the sword of Michael; on the failure of persuasion, he tried the arguments of prison and exile, of whipping and mutilation; those touch-stones, says an historian, of cowards and the brave. Two Greeks still reigned in Ætolia, Epirus, and Thessaly, with the appellation of despots; they had yielded to the sovereignty of Constantinople, but they rejected the chains of the Roman pontiff, and supported their refusal by successful arms. Under their protection, the fugitive monks and bishops assembled in hostile synods; and retorted the name of heretic with the galling addition of apostate: the prince of Trebizond was tempted to assume the forfeit title of emperor; and even the Latins of Negropont, Thebes, Athens, and the Morea, forgot the merits of the convert, to join, with open or clandestine aid, the enemies of Palæologus. His favourite generals, of his own blood and family, successively deserted, or betrayed, the sacrilegious trust. His sister Eulogia, a niece, and two female cousins, conspired against him; and another niece, Mary queen of Bulgaria, negotiated his ruin with the sultan of Egypt; and, in the public eye, their treason was consecrated as the most sublime virtue.<sup>34</sup> To the pope's nuncios, who urged the consummation of the work, Palæologus exposed a naked recital of all that he had done and suffered for their sake. They were assured that the guilty sectaries, of both sexes and every rank, had been deprived of their honours, their fortunes, and their liberty; a spreading list of confiscation and punishment, which involved many persons, the dearest to the emperor, or the best deserving of his favour. They were conducted to the prison, to behold four princes of the royal blood chained in the four corners, and shaking their fetters in an agony of grief and rage. Two of these captives were afterwards released; the one by submission, the other by death: but the obstinacy of their two companions was chastised by the loss of their eyes; and the Greeks, the least adverse to the union, deplore that cruel and inauspicious tragedy.<sup>35</sup> Persecutors must expect the hatred of those whom they oppress; but they commonly find some consolation in the testimony of their conscience, the applause of their party, and, perhaps, the success of their undertaking. But the

<sup>31</sup> His proclamation to the Greeks, A.D. 1277-1282.

<sup>32</sup> This curious synodical tradition, which has been drawn with more or less honesty by Wadding and Longueval, from the archives at the Vatican, is given in an abstract by Fleury, tom. xviii. p. 224.

<sup>33</sup> This frank and authentic confession of Michael's distress, is exhibited in barbarous Latin by Ogerus, who signs himself Protonotarius.

<sup>34</sup> See the sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth, of the preceding chapter.

<sup>35</sup> See the sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth, of the preceding chapter.

hypocrisy of Michael, which was prompted only by political motives, must have forced him to hate himself, to despise his followers, and to esteem and envy the rebel champions by whom he was detested and despised. While his violence was abhorred at Constantinople, at Rome his slowness was arraigned, and his sincerity suspected; till at length pope Martin the Fourth excluded the Greek emperor from the pale of a church, into which he was striving to reduce a schismatic people. No sooner had the tyrant

The union dissolved.
A. D. 1253.

expired, than the union was dissolved, and abjured by unanimous consent: the churches were purified; the penitents were reconciled; and his son Andronicus, after weeping the sins and errors of his youth, most piously denied his father the burial of a prince and a Christian.<sup>86</sup>

II. In the distress of the Latins, the walls and towers of Constantinople had fallen to decay: they were restored and fortified by the policy of Michael, who deposited a plenteous store of corn and salt provisions, to sustain the siege which he might hourly expect from the resentment of the Western powers. Of these, the sovereign of the two Sicilies was the most formidable neighbour; but as long as they were possessed by Mainfroy, the bastard of Frederic the Second, his monarchy was the bulwark, rather than the annoyance, of the Eastern empire. The usurper, though a brave and active prince, was sufficiently employed in the defence of his throne: his pro-cription by successive popes had separated Mainfroy from the common cause of the Latins; and the forces that might have besieged Constantinople were detained in a crusade against the domestic enemy of Rome. The prize of her avenger, the crown of the two Sicilies, was won and worn by the brother of St. Louis, by Charles count of Anjou and Provence, who led the chivalry of France on this holy expedition.<sup>87</sup> The disaffection of his Christian subjects compelled Mainfroy to enlist a colony of Saracens whom his father had planted in Apulia: and this odious succour will explain the defiance of the Catholic hero, who rejected all terms of accommodation. "Bear this message," said Charles, "to the sultan of Nocera, that God and the sword are umpire between us; and that he shall either send me to paradise, or I will send him to the pit of hell." The armies met, and though I am ignorant of Mainfroy's doom in the other world, in this he lost his friends, his kingdom, and his life, in the bloody battle of Benevento. Naples and Sicily were immediately peopled with a warlike race of French nobles; and their aspiring leader embraced the future conquest of Africa, Greece, and Palestine. The most specious reasons might point his first arms against the Byzantine empire; and Palæologus, diffident of his own strength, repeatedly appealed from the ambition of Charles to the humanity of St. Louis, who still preserved a just ascendant over the mind of his ferocious brother. For a while the attention of that brother was confined at home by the invasion of Conradin, the last heir of the Imperial house of Swabia: but the hapless hoy sunk in the unequal conflict; and his execution on a public scaffold taught the rivals of Charles to tremble for their heads as well as their dominions. A second respite was obtained by the last crusade of St. Louis to the African coast; and the double motive of interest and duty urged the king of Naples to assist, with his powers and his presence, the holy enterprise. The death of St. Louis released him from the importunity of a virtuous censor: the king of Tunis confessed himself the tributary and vassal of the crown of Sicily; and the boldest of the French knights were free to enlist under his banner

Threatens the Greek empire.
A. D. 1267, &c.

against the Greek empire. A treaty and a marriage united his interest with the house of Courtenay; his daughter Beatrice was promised to Philip, son and heir of the emperor Baldwin; a pension of six hundred ounces of gold was allowed for his maintenance; and his generous father distributed among his allies the kingdoms and provinces of the East, reserving only Constantinople, and one day's journey round the city, for the Imperial domain.<sup>88</sup> In this perilous moment Palæologus was the most eager to subscribe the creed, and implore the protection, of the Roman pontiff, who assumed, with propriety and weight, the character of an angel of peace, the common father of the Christians. By his voice, the sword of Charles was chained in the scabbard; and the Greek ambassadors beheld him, in the pope's antechamber, biting his ivory sceptre in a transport of fury, and deeply representing the refusal to enfranchise and consecrate his arms. He appears to have respected the disinterested mediation of Gregory the Tenth; but Charles was insensibly disgusted by the pride and partiality of Nicholas the Third; and his attachment to his kindred, the Ursini family, alienated the most strenuous champion from the service of the church. The hostile league against the Greeks, of Philip the Latin emperor, the king of the two Sicilies, and the republic of Venice, was ripened into execution; and the election of Martin the Fourth, a French pope, gave a sanction to the cause. Of the allies, Philip supplied his name; Martin, a bull of excommunication; the Venetians, a squadron of forty galleys; and the formidable powers of Charles consisted of forty counts, ten thousand men at arms, a numerous body of infantry, and a fleet of more than three hundred ships and transports. A distant day was appointed for assembling this mighty force in the harbour of Brindisi; and a previous attempt was risked with a detachment of three hundred knights, who invaded Albania, and besieged the fortress of

<sup>86</sup> Pachymer, l. vi. c. 1-11. 17. The speech of Andronicus the Elder (lib. vi. c. 2.) is a curious record, which proves, that at the time the slaves of the emperor, the emperor was not the

by Murton, in the sixth and sixth volumes of the Historians of Italy. In his Annals, torn. vi. p. 305-7, 20, he has abridged these great events, which are taken as we described in the 1st riv. table of Giannone, torn. i. l. 1. c. 10. p. 11. 12. 13. 14. 15. 16. 17. 18. 19. 20. 21. 22. 23. 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. 31. 32. 33. 34. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39. 40. 41. 42. 43. 44. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51. 52. 53. 54. 55. 56. 57. 58. 59. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 65. 66. 67. 68. 69. 70. 71. 72. 73. 74. 75. 76. 77. 78. 79. 80. 81. 82. 83. 84. 85. 86. 87. 88. 89. 90. 91. 92. 93. 94. 95. 96. 97. 98. 99. 100. 101. 102. 103. 104. 105. 106. 107. 108. 109. 110. 111. 112. 113. 114. 115. 116. 117. 118. 119. 120. 121. 122. 123. 124. 125. 126. 127. 128. 129. 130. 131. 132. 133. 134. 135. 136. 137. 138. 139. 140. 141. 142. 143. 144. 145. 146. 147. 148. 149. 150. 151. 152. 153. 154. 155. 156. 157. 158. 159. 160. 161. 162. 163. 164. 165. 166. 167. 168. 169. 170. 171. 172. 173. 174. 175. 176. 177. 178. 179. 180. 181. 182. 183. 184. 185. 186. 187. 188. 189. 190. 191. 192. 193. 194. 195. 196. 197. 198. 199. 200. 201. 202. 203. 204. 205. 206. 207. 208. 209. 210. 211. 212. 213. 214. 215. 216. 217. 218. 219. 220. 221. 222. 223. 224. 225. 226. 227. 228. 229. 230. 231. 232. 233. 234. 235. 236. 237. 238. 239. 240. 241. 242. 243. 244. 245. 246. 247. 248. 249. 250. 251. 252. 253. 254. 255. 256. 257. 258. 259. 260. 261. 262. 263. 264. 265. 266. 267. 268. 269. 270. 271. 272. 273. 274. 275. 276. 277. 278. 279. 280. 281. 282. 283. 284. 285. 286. 287. 288. 289. 290. 291. 292. 293. 294. 295. 296. 297. 298. 299. 300. 301. 302. 303. 304. 305. 306. 307. 308. 309. 310. 311. 312. 313. 314. 315. 316. 317. 318. 319. 320. 321. 322. 323. 324. 325. 326. 327. 328. 329. 330. 331. 332. 333. 334. 335. 336. 337. 338. 339. 340. 341. 342. 343. 344. 345. 346. 347. 348. 349. 350. 351. 352. 353. 354. 355. 356. 357. 358. 359. 360. 361. 362. 363. 364. 365. 366. 367. 368. 369. 370. 371. 372. 373. 374. 375. 376. 377. 378. 379. 380. 381. 382. 383. 384. 385. 386. 387. 388. 389. 390. 391. 392. 393. 394. 395. 396. 397. 398. 399. 400. 401. 402. 403. 404. 405. 406. 407. 408. 409. 410. 411. 412. 413. 414. 415. 416. 417. 418. 419. 420. 421. 422. 423. 424. 425. 426. 427. 428. 429. 430. 431. 432. 433. 434. 435. 436. 437. 438. 439. 440. 441. 442. 443. 444. 445. 446. 447. 448. 449. 450. 451. 452. 453. 454. 455. 456. 457. 458. 459. 460. 461. 462. 463. 464. 465. 466. 467. 468. 469. 470. 471. 472. 473. 474. 475. 476. 477. 478. 479. 480. 481. 482. 483. 484. 485. 486. 487. 488. 489. 490. 491. 492. 493. 494. 495. 496. 497. 498. 499. 500. 501. 502. 503. 504. 505. 506. 507. 508. 509. 510. 511. 512. 513. 514. 515. 516. 517. 518. 519. 520. 521. 522. 523. 524. 525. 526. 527. 528. 529. 530. 531. 532. 533. 534. 535. 536. 537. 538. 539. 540. 541. 542. 543. 544. 545. 546. 547. 548. 549. 550. 551. 552. 553. 554. 555. 556. 557. 558. 559. 560. 561. 562. 563. 564. 565. 566. 567. 568. 569. 570. 571. 572. 573. 574. 575. 576. 577. 578. 579. 580. 581. 582. 583. 584. 585. 586. 587. 588. 589. 590. 591. 592. 593. 594. 595. 596. 597. 598. 599. 600. 601. 602. 603. 604. 605. 606. 607. 608. 609. 610. 611. 612. 613. 614. 615. 616. 617. 618. 619. 620. 621. 622. 623. 624. 625. 626. 627. 628. 629. 630. 631. 632. 633. 634. 635. 636. 637. 638. 639. 640. 641. 642. 643. 644. 645. 646. 647. 648. 649. 650. 651. 652. 653. 654. 655. 656. 657. 658. 659. 660. 661. 662. 663. 664. 665. 666. 667. 668. 669. 670. 671. 672. 673. 674. 675. 676. 677. 678. 679. 680. 681. 682. 683. 684. 685. 686. 687. 688. 689. 690. 691. 692. 693. 694. 695. 696. 697. 698. 699. 700. 701. 702. 703. 704. 705. 706. 707. 708. 709. 710. 711. 712. 713. 714. 715. 716. 717. 718. 719. 720. 721. 722. 723. 724. 725. 726. 727. 728. 729. 730. 731. 732. 733. 734. 735. 736. 737. 738. 739. 740. 741. 742. 743. 744. 745. 746. 747. 748. 749. 750. 751. 752. 753. 754. 755. 756. 757. 758. 759. 760. 761. 762. 763. 764. 765. 766. 767. 768. 769. 770. 771. 772. 773. 774. 775. 776. 777. 778. 779. 780. 781. 782. 783. 784. 785. 786. 787. 788. 789. 790. 791. 792. 793. 794. 795. 796. 797. 798. 799. 800. 801. 802. 803. 804. 805. 806. 807. 808. 809. 810. 811. 812. 813. 814. 815. 816. 817. 818. 819. 820. 821. 822. 823. 824. 825. 826. 827. 828. 829. 830. 831. 832. 833. 834. 835. 836. 837. 838. 839. 840. 841. 842. 843. 844. 845. 846. 847. 848. 849. 850. 851. 852. 853. 854. 855. 856. 857. 858. 859. 860. 861. 862. 863. 864. 865. 866. 867. 868. 869. 870. 871. 872. 873. 874. 875. 876. 877. 878. 879. 880. 881. 882. 883. 884. 885. 886. 887. 888. 889. 890. 891. 892. 893. 894. 895. 896. 897. 898. 899. 900. 901. 902. 903. 904. 905. 906. 907. 908. 909. 910. 911. 912. 913. 914. 915. 916. 917. 918. 919. 920. 921. 922. 923. 924. 925. 926. 927. 928. 929. 930. 931. 932. 933. 934. 935. 936. 937. 938. 939. 940. 941. 942. 943. 944. 945. 946. 947. 948. 949. 950. 951. 952. 953. 954. 955. 956. 957. 958. 959. 960. 961. 962. 963. 964. 965. 966. 967. 968. 969. 970. 971. 972. 973. 974. 975. 976. 977. 978. 979. 980. 981. 982. 983. 984. 985. 986. 987. 988. 989. 990. 991. 992. 993. 994. 995. 996. 997. 998. 999. 1000.

Belgrade. Their defeat might amuse with a triumph the vanity of Constantinople; but the more sagacious Michael, despairing of his arms, depended on the effects of a conspiracy; on the secret workings of a rat, who gnawed the bow-string<sup>39</sup> of the Sicilian tyrant.

Among the proscribed adherents of the house of Swabia, John of Procida forfeited a small island of that name in the Bay of Naples. His birth was noble, but his education was learned; and in the poverty of exile, he was relieved by the practice of physic, which he had studied in the school of Salerno. Fortune had left him nothing to lose, except life; and to despise life is the first qualification of a rebel. Procida was endowed with the art of negotiation, to enforce his reasons, and disguise his motives; and in his various transactions with nations and men, he could persuade each party that he laboured solely for their interest. The new kingdoms of Charles were afflicted by every species of fiscal and military oppression;<sup>40</sup> and the lives and fortunes of his Italian subjects were sacrificed to the greatness of their master and the licentiousness of his followers. The hatred of Naples was repressed by his presence; but the looser government of his vicegerents excited the contempt, as well as the aversion, of the Sicilians: the island was roused to a sense of freedom by the eloquence of Procida; and he displayed to every baron his private interest in the common cause. In the confidence of foreign aid, he successively visited the courts of the Greek emperor, and of Peter king of Arragon,<sup>41</sup> who possessed the maritime countries of Valentia and Catalonia. To the ambitious Peter a crown was presented, which he might justly claim by his marriage with the sister of Mainfroy, and by the dying voice of Conradin, who from the scaffold had cast a ring to his heir and avenger. Palæologus was easily persuaded to divert his enemy from a foreign war by a rebellion at home; and a Greek subsidy of twenty-five thousand ounces of gold was most profitably applied to arm a Catalan fleet, which sailed under an holy banner to the specious attack of the Saracens of Africa. In the disguise of a monk or beggar, the indefatigable missionary of revolt flew from Constantinople to Rome, and from Sicily to Saragossa: the treaty was sealed with the signet of pope Nicholas himself, the enemy of Charles; and his deed of gift transferred the fiefs of St. Peter from the house of Anjou to that of Arragon. So widely diffused and so freely circulated, the secret was preserved above two years with impenetrable discretion; and each of the conspirators imbibed the maxim of Peter, who declared that he would cut off his left hand if it were conscious of the intentions of his right. The mine was prepared with deep and dangerous artifice; but it may be questioned, whether the instant explosion of Palermo were the effect of accident or design.

On the vigil of Easter, a procession of the disarmed citizens visited a church without the walls; and a noble damsel was rudely insulted by a French soldier.<sup>42</sup> The ravisher was instantly punished with death; and if the people was at first scattered by a military force, their numbers and fury prevailed: the conspirators seized the opportunity; the flame spread over the island; and eight thousand French were exterminated in a promiscuous massacre, which has obtained the name of the SICILIAN VESPERS.<sup>43</sup> From every city the banners of freedom and the church were displayed; the revolt was inspired by the presence or the soul of Procida; and Peter of Arragon, who sailed from the African coast to Palermo, was saluted as the king and saviour of the isle. By the rebellion of a people on whom he had so long trampled with impunity, Charles was astonished and confounded; and in the first agony of grief and devotion, he was heard to exclaim, "O God! if thou hast decreed to humble me, grant me at least a gentle and gradual descent from the pinnacle of greatness!" His fleet and army, which already filled the sea-ports of Italy, were hastily recalled from the service of the Grecian war: and the situation of Messina exposed that town to the first storm of his revenge. Feeble in themselves, and yet hopeless of foreign succour, the citizens would have repented, and submitted on the assurance of full pardon and their ancient privileges. But the pride of the monarch was already rekindled; and the most fervent entreaties of the legate could extort no more than a promise, that he would forgive the remainder, after a chosen list of eight hundred rebels had been yielded to his discretion. The despair of the Messinese renewed their courage: Peter of Arragon approached to their relief;<sup>44</sup> and his rival was driven back by the failure of provision and the terrors of the equinox to the Calabrian shore. At the same moment, the Catalan admiral, the famous Roger de Loria, swept the channel with an invincible squadron: the French fleet, more numerous in transports than in galleys, was either burnt or destroyed; and the same blow assured the independence of Sicily and the safety of the Greek empire. A few days before his death, the emperor Michael rejoiced in the fall of an enemy whom he hated and esteemed: and perhaps he might be content with the popular judgment, that had they not been matched with each other, Constantinople and Italy must

The Sicilian Vespers.
A. D. 1282,
March 30.

Defeat of Charles.
Oct. 2.

<sup>39</sup> The reader of Herodotus will recollect how miraculously the Assyrian host of Sennacherib was disarmed and destroyed (l. ii. c. 111).

<sup>40</sup> According to Sabas Malaspina (Hist. Sicula, l. vi. c. 16, in Muratori, tom. viii. p. 562), a zealous Greek, the subjects of Charles, who had once been his ally, began to regret him as a lamb oppressor of the French; and he manifested in Nicholas (1301).

<sup>41</sup> See the character and counsels of Peter king of Arragon, in Mariana (Hist. Hispan. l. xiv. c. 6, tom. ii. p. 153). The reader forgives the Jesuit's defects, in favour, always of his style, and often of his sense.

<sup>42</sup> After enumerating the sufferings of his country, Nicholas Specusius adds, in the true spirit of Italian jealousy, Quæ omnia et gra-

speedily have obeyed the same master.<sup>45</sup> From this disastrous moment, the life of Charles was a series of misfortunes; his capital was insulted, his son was made prisoner, and he sunk into the grave without recovering the isle of Sicily, which, after a war of twenty years, was finally severed from the throne of Naples, and transferred, as an independent kingdom, to a younger branch of the house of Arragon.<sup>46</sup>

The service and war of the Catalans in the Greek empire, A.D. 1302-1307.

I shall not, I trust, be accused of superstition; but I must remark, that, even in this world, the natural order of events will sometimes afford the strong appearances of moral retribution. The first Palæologus had saved his empire by involving the kingdoms of the West in rebellion and blood; and from these seeds of discord uprose a generation of iron men, who assaulted and endangered the empire of his son. In modern times, our debts and taxes are the secret poison, which still corrodes the bosom of peace; but in the weak and disorderly government of the middle ages, it was agitated by the present evil of the disbanded armies. Too idle to work, too proud to beg, the mercenaries were accustomed to a life of rapine: they could rob with more dignity and effect under a banner and a chief; and the sovereign, to whom their service was useless, and their presence importunate, endeavoured to discharge the torrent on some neighbouring countries. After the peace of Sicily, many thousands of Genoese, Catalans,<sup>47</sup> &c. who had fought, by sea and land, under the standard of Anjou or Arragon, were blended into one nation by the resemblance of their manners and interest. They heard that the Greek provinces of Asia were invaded by the Turks: they resolved to share the harvest of pay and plunder; and Frederic king of Sicily most liberally contributed the means of their departure. In a warfare of twenty years, a ship, or a camp, was become their country; arms were their sole profession and property; valour was the only virtue which they knew; their women had imbibed the fearless temper of their lovers and husbands: it was reported, that, with a stroke of their broadsword, the Catalans could cleave a horseman and an horse; and the report itself was a powerful weapon. Roger de Flor was the most popular of their chiefs; and his personal merit overshadowed the dignity of his prouder rivals of Arragon. The offspring of a marriage between a German gentleman of the court of Frederic the Second and a damsel of Brindisi, Roger was successively a templar, an apostate, a pirate, and at length the richest and most powerful admiral of the Mediterranean. He sailed from Messina to Constantinople, with eighteen galleys, four great ships, and eight thousand adventurers; and his previous treaty was faithfully accomplished by Andronicus the Elder, who accepted with joy and terror this formidable succour. A palace was allotted for his reception, and a niece of the emperor was given in marriage to the valiant stranger, who was immediately created great duke or admiral of Romania. After a decent repose, he transported his troops over the Propontis, and boldly led them against the Turks: in two bloody battles thirty thousand of the Moslems were slain: he raised the siege of Philadelphia, and deserved the name of the deliverer of Asia. But after a short season of prosperity, the cloud of slavery and ruin again burst on that unhappy province. The inhabitants escaped (says a Greek historian) from the smoke into the flames; and the hostility of the Turks was less pernicious than the friendship of the Catalans. The lives and fortunes which they had rescued, they considered as their own: the willing or reluctant maid was saved from the race of circumcision for the embraces of a Christian soldier: the exaction of fines and supplies was enforced by licentious rapine and arbitrary executions; and, on the resistance of Magnesia, the great duke besieged a city of the Roman empire.<sup>48</sup> These disorders he excused by the wrongs and passions of a victorious army; nor would his own authority or person have been safe, had he dared to punish his faithful followers, who were defrauded of the just and covenanted price of their services. The threats and complaints of Andronicus disclosed the nakedness of the empire. His golden bull had invited no more than five hundred horse and a thousand foot soldiers; yet the crowds of volunteers, who migrated to the East, had been enlisted and fed by his spontaneous bounty. While his bravest allies were content with three byzants or pieces of gold, for their monthly pay, an ounce, or even two ounces, of gold were assigned to the Catalans, whose annual pension would thus amount to near an hundred pounds sterling: one of their chiefs had modestly rated at three hundred thousand crowns the value of his future merits; and above a million had been issued from the treasury for the maintenance of these costly mercenaries. A cruel tax had been imposed on the corn of the husbandman; one third was retrenched from the salaries of the public officers; and the standard of the coin was so shamefully debased, that of the four and twenty parts only five were of pure gold.<sup>49</sup> At the summons of the emperor, Roger evacuated a province which no longer supplied the materials of rapine: but he refused to disperse his troops; and while his style was respectful, his conduct was independent and hostile. He protested, that if the emperor should march against him, he would advance forty paces to kiss the ground before 45 Nicæphorus Grægoras (l. v. c. 6.) admires the wisdom of Providence in this equal balance of states and princes. For the honour of Palæologus, I had rather this balance had been observed by an Italian writer.

46 See the Chronicle of Villani, the xth volume of the Annali d'Italia of Muratori, and the xth and xxth books of the Istoria civile of Giannone.

47 In this motley multitude, the Catalans and Spaniards, the bravest of the soldiers, were styled, by themselves and the Greeks, denegari or denegades. Moncada derives their origin from the Geths, and Pachymer (l. vi. c. 22.) from the Arabs; and in spite of national and religious pride, I am afraid the latter is in the right.

48 Some idea may be formed of the prodigious number of these mercenaries, by the 35,000 inhabitants of Tralles, which, in the present day, is a rebuilt by the emperor, and ruined by the Turks (Pachymer, l. vi. c. 20, 21.)

49 I have collected these pecuniary circumstances from Pachymer (l. vi. c. 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100). Even in the prosperous times of John Ducas Vares, the Livans were composed of equal proportions of the pure and the baser metal. The poverty of Michael Palæologus compelled him to strike a new coin, with nine parts of silver, and one of copper alloy. After his death, the standard rose to ten parts of silver, and the pure metal was reduced to one part. The price was not raised for a moment, while credit and commerce were in the height. In France, the two thirds of gold coin was still current at 10 s. and the standard of gold coin at 11 s. and 12 s.

him, but in rising from this prostrate attitude Roger had a life and sword at the service of his friends. The great duke of Romania condescended to accept the title and ornaments of Cæsar; but he rejected the new proposal of the government of Asia, with a subsidy of corn and money, on condition that he should reduce his troops to the harmless number of three thousand men. Assassination is the last resource of cowards. The Cæsar was tempted to visit the royal residence of Adrianople: in the apartment, and before the eyes of the empress, he was stabbed by the Alani guards; and, though the deed was imputed to their private revenge, his countrymen, who dwelt at Constantinople in the security of peace, were involved in the same proscription by the prince or people. The loss of their leader intimidated the crowd of adventurers, who hoisted the sails of flight, and were soon scattered round the coasts of the Mediterranean. But a veteran band of fifteen hundred Catalans, or French, stood firm in the strong fortress of Gallipoli on the Hellespont, displayed the banners of Arragon, and offered to revenge and justify their chief by an equal combat of ten or an hundred warriors. Instead of accepting this bold defiance, the emperor Michael, the son and colleague of Andronicus, resolved to oppress them with the weight of multitudes: every nerve was strained to form an army of thirteen thousand horse and thirty thousand foot; and the Propontis was covered with the ships of the Greeks and Genoese. In two battles by sea and land, these mighty forces were encountered and overthrown by the despair and discipline of the Catalans; the young emperor fled to the palace; and an insufficient guard of light horse was left for the protection of the open country. Victory renewed the hopes and numbers of the adventurers: every nation was blended under the name and standard of the great company; and three thousand Turkish proselytes deserted from the Imperial service to join this military association. In the possession of Gallipoli, the Catalans intercepted the trade of Constantinople and the Black Sea, while they spread their devastations on either side of the Hellespont over the confines of Europe and Asia. To prevent their approach, the greatest part of the Byzantine territory was laid waste by the Greeks themselves: the peasants and their cattle retired into the city; and myriads of sheep and oxen, for which neither place nor food could be procured, were unprofitably slaughtered on the same day. Four times the emperor Andronicus sued for peace, and four times he was inflexibly repulsed, till the want of provisions, and the discord of the chiefs, compelled the Catalans to evacuate the banks of the Hellespont and the neighbourhood of the capital. After their separation from the Turks, the remains of the great company pursued their march through Macedonia and Thessaly, to seek a new establishment in the heart of Greece.<sup>50</sup>

After some ages of oblivion, Greece was awakened to new misfortunes by the arms of the Latins.

Revolutions of Athens.
A.D. 1204—1456.

In the two hundred and fifty years between the first and the last conquest of Constantinople, that venerable land was disputed by a multitude of petty tyrants; without the comforts of freedom and genius, her ancient cities were again plunged in foreign and intestine war; and, if servitude be preferable to anarchy, they might repose with joy under the Turkish yoke. I shall not pursue the obscure and various dynasties, that rose and fell on the continent or in the isles; but our silence on the fate of ATHENS<sup>51</sup> would argue a strange ingratitude to the first and purest school of liberal science and amusement. In the partition of the empire, the principality of Athens and Thebes was assigned to Otho de la Roche, a noble warrior of Burgundy,<sup>52</sup> with the title of Great Duke,<sup>53</sup> which the Latins understood in their own sense, and the Greeks more foolishly derived from the age of Constantine.<sup>54</sup> Otho followed the standard of the marquis of Montferrat; the ample state which he acquired by a miracle of conduct or fortune,<sup>55</sup> was peaceably inherited by his son and two grandsons, till the family, though not the nation, was changed, by the marriage of an heiress into the elder branch of the house of Brienne. The son of that marriage, Walter de Brienne, succeeded to the duchy of Athens; and, with the aid of some Catalan mercenaries, whom he invested with fiefs, reduced above thirty castles of the vassal or neighbouring lords. But when he was informed of the approach and ambition of the great company, he collected a force of seven hundred knights, six thousand four hundred horse, and eight thousand foot, and boldly met them on the banks of the river Cephissus in Bœotia. The Catalans amounted to no more than three thousand five hundred horse, and four thousand foot; but the deficiency of numbers was compensated by stratagem and order. They formed round their camp an artificial inundation; the duke and his knights advanced without fear or precaution on the verdant meadow; their horses plunged into the bog; and he was cut in pieces, with the greatest part of the French cavalry. His family and nation were expelled; and his son Walter de Brienne, the titular duke of Athens, the tyrant of Florence, and the constable of France, lost his life in the field of Poitiers. Attica and Bœotia were the rewards of the victorious Catalans; they mar-

<sup>50</sup> And under the first passage, Ducange observes all that can be known of his person and family.

<sup>51</sup> From the Latin phrase of the sixth century, Rocace, Chaucer, and Shakespeare, I have borrowed their Thesusus duke of Athens. An ignorant age transfers its own language and manners to the most distant times.

<sup>52</sup> Quodam modo, says Athenæ. He was probably received by Michael Comnenus, the archbishop who had defended Athens against the tyrant Leo Scaurus (Nicaeus in Baldwin).

<sup>53</sup> Michael was the brother of the last man Nicaeus, and his successor at Athens is still extant in MS. in the Bodleian Library (Fabric. Bibliot. Græc. tom. vi. p. 106.)

<sup>54</sup> Kurios, or Grand sire!

<sup>55</sup> Quodam modo, says Athenæ. He was probably received by Michael Comnenus, the archbishop who had defended Athens against the tyrant Leo Scaurus (Nicaeus in Baldwin).

<sup>50</sup> The Catalan war is most copiously related by Puchner, in the sixth, ninth, and tenth books of his historia de la catalunya. Necephorus (for error 1. vol. 2. p. 13) is more concise and complete. Ducange, who adopts these adventures as French, has limited their footings with his usual diligence. Hist. de C. P. l. vi. c. 22. 46. He quotes an Armenian history, which I have not with pleasure, and which the Spaniards extend to a model of style and composition. (Traduction de los catalanes. Arzobispos católicos. Tomo 5.º. Græcos: Barcelona, 1625, in quarto. Madrid, 1777, in octavo.) Don Francisco de Moncada, Conde de Gomara, my platée Cæsar or Sultan, he may transcribe the Greek or Latin in interrogatives, but he never quotes his authorities, and I cannot discern any national records of the exploits of his countrymen.

<sup>51</sup> See the fabulous history of Ducange, whose accurate table of the French dynasties communicates the thirty-five passages in which he mentions the dukes of Athens.

<sup>52</sup> He is twice mentioned by Villehardouin with honour (Nov. 1. 1.

ried the widows and daughters of the slain; and during fourteen years, the great company was the terror of the Grecian states. Their factions drove them to acknowledge the sovereignty of the house of Arragon; and during the remainder of the fourteenth century, Athens, as a government or an appanage, was successively bestowed by the kings of Sicily. After the French and Catalans, the third dynasty was that of the Accaioli, a family, plebeian at Florence, potent at Naples, and sovereign in Greece. Athens, which they embellished with new buildings, became the capital of a state, that extended over Thebes, Argos, Corinth, Delphi, and a part of Thessaly; and their reign was finally determined by Mahomet the Second, who strangled the last duke, and educated his sons in the discipline and religion of the seraglio.

Athens,<sup>56</sup> though no more than the shadow of her former self, still contains about eight or ten thousand inhabitants: of these, three fourths are Greeks in religion and language; and the Turks, who compose the remainder, have relaxed, in their intercourse with the citizens, somewhat of the pride and gravity of their national character. The olive-tree, the gift of Minerva, flourishes in Attica; nor has the honey of Mount Hymettus lost any part of its exquisite flavour;<sup>57</sup> but the languid trade is monopolised by strangers; and the agriculture of a barren land is abandoned to the vagrant Walachians. The Athenians are still distinguished by the subtlety and acuteness of their understandings: but these qualities, unless ennobled by freedom, and enlightened by study, will degenerate into a low and selfish cunning: and it is a proverbial saying of the country, "From the Jews of Thessalonica, the Turks of Negropont, and the Greeks of Athens, good Lord deliver us!" This artful people has eluded the tyranny of the Turkish bashaws, by an expedient which alleviates their servitude and aggravates their shame. About the middle of the last century, the Athenians chose for their protector the Kilar Aga, or chief black eunuch of the seraglio. This Ethiopian slave, who possesses the sultan's ear, condescends to accept the tribute of thirty thousand crowns: his lieutenant, the Waywode, whom he annually confirms, may reserve for his own about five or six thousand more; and such is the policy of the citizens, that they seldom fail to remove and punish an oppressive governor. Their private differences are decided by the archbishop, one of the richest prelates of the Greek church, since he possesses a revenue of one thousand pounds sterling; and by a tribunal of the eight geronti or elders, chosen in the eight quarters of the city: the noble families cannot trace their pedigree above three hundred years; but their principal members are distinguished by a grave dememour, a fur cap, and the lofty appellation of archon. By some, who delight in the contrast, the modern language of Athens is represented as the most corrupt and barbarous of the seventy dialects of the vulgar Greek: <sup>58</sup> this picture is too darkly coloured; but it would not be easy, in the country of Plato and Demosthenes, to find a reader, or a copy, of their works. The Athenians walk with supine indifference among the glorious ruins of antiquity; and such is the debasement of their character, that they are incapable of admiring the genius of their predecessors.<sup>59</sup>

CHAP. LXIII.

Civil Wars, and Ruin of the Greek Empire.—Reigns of Andronicus, the Elder and Younger, and John Palaeologus.—Regency, Revolt, Reign, and Abdication of John Cantacuzene.—Establishment of a Genoese Colony at Pera or Galata.—Their Wars with the Empire and City of Constantinople.

THE long reign of Andronicus<sup>1</sup> Superstition of the Elder is chiefly memorable by the times. the disputes of the Greek church, the invasion of the Catalans, and the rise of the Ottoman power. He is celebrated as the most learned and virtuous prince of the age; but such virtue, and such learning, contributed neither to the perfection of the individual, nor to the happiness of society. A slave of the most abject superstition, he was surrounded on all sides by visible and invisible enemies; nor were the flames of hell less dreadful to his fancy, than those of a Catalan or Turkish war. Under the reign of the Palaeologi, the choice of the patriarch was the most important business of the state; the heads of the Greek church were ambitious and fanatic monks; and their vices or virtues, their learning or ignorance, were equally mischievous or contemptible. By his intemperate discipline, the patriarch Athanasius<sup>2</sup> excited the hatred of the clergy and people; he was heard to declare, that the sinner should swallow the last dregs of the cup of penance; and the foolish tale was propagated of his punishing a sacrilegious ass that had tasted the lettuce of a convent garden. Driven from the throne by the universal clamour, Athanasius composed, before his retreat, two papers of a very opposite cast. His public testament was in the tone of charity and resignation; the private codicil breathed the direst anathemas against the authors of his disgrace, whom he

<sup>56</sup> Athens, is extracted from Wheeler (Trad. Athen. passim). The first of these 1765; and nearly years had not produced much difference in the translation.

<sup>57</sup> The ancients, or at least the Athenians, believed that all the bees in the world had been procured from Mount Hymettus. They taught, that health might be procured, and are allowed, by the external use of oil, and the internal use of honey. (Athen. lib. ix. c. 2. p. 1050.) 1094. edit. Nodding.

<sup>58</sup> The same, however, Grace Prefat. p. 84, who quotes for it neither Theodosius Zygomalas, a modern grammarian. Yet Epist. (tom. ii.

p. 104.) and Wheeler (p. 355), no incompetent judges, entertain a more favourable opinion of the Attic dialect.

<sup>59</sup> The same, however, Grace Prefat. p. 84, who quotes for it neither Theodosius Zygomalas, a modern grammarian. Yet Epist. (tom. ii.

p. 104.) and Wheeler (p. 355), no incompetent judges, entertain a more favourable opinion of the Attic dialect.

<sup>58</sup> The same, however, Grace Prefat. p. 84, who quotes for it neither Theodosius Zygomalas, a modern grammarian. Yet Epist. (tom. ii.

p. 104.) and Wheeler (p. 355), no incompetent judges, entertain a more favourable opinion of the Attic dialect.

<sup>59</sup> The same, however, Grace Prefat. p. 84, who quotes for it neither Theodosius Zygomalas, a modern grammarian. Yet Epist. (tom. ii.

excluded for ever from the communion of the Holy Trinity, the angels, and the saints. This last paper he enclosed in an earthen pot, which was placed, by his order, on the top of one of the pillars in the dome of St. Sophia, in the distant hope of discovery and revenge. At the end of four years, some youths, climbing by a ladder in search of pigeons' nests, detected the fatal secret; and, as Andronicus felt himself touched and bound by the excommunication, he trembled on the brink of the abyss which had been so treacherously dug under his feet. A synod of bishops was instantly convened to debate this important question: the rashness of these clandestine anathemas was generally condemned; but as the knot could be untied only by the same hand, as that hand was now deprived of the crosier, it appeared that this posthumous decree was irrevocable by any earthly power. Some faint testimonies of repentance and pardon were extorted from the author of the mischief; but the conscience of the emperor was still wounded, and he desired, with no less ardour than Athanasius himself, the restoration of a patriarch, by whom alone he could be healed. At the dead of night, a monk rudely knocked at the door of the royal bedchamber, announcing a revelation of plague and famine, of inundations and earthquakes. Andronicus started from his bed, and spent the night in prayer, till he felt, or thought that he felt, a slight motion of the earth. The emperor on foot led the bishops and monks to the cell of Athanasius, and, after a proper resistance, the saint, from whom this message had been sent, consented to absolve the prince, and govern the church of Constantinople. Untamed by disgrace, and hardened by solitude, the shepherd was again odious to the flock, and his enemies contrived a singular, and, as it proved, a successful, mode of revenge. In the night they stole away the foot-stool or foot-cloth of his throne, which they secretly replaced with the decoration of a satirical picture. The emperor was painted with a bridle in his mouth, and Athanasius leading the tractable beast to the feet of Christ. The authors of the libel were detected and punished; but as their lives had been spared, the Christian priest in sullen indignation retired to his cell; and the eyes of Andronicus, which had been opened for a moment, were again closed by his successor.

If this transaction be one of the most curious and important of a reign of fifty years, I cannot at least accuse the brevity of my materials, since I reduce into some few pages the enormous folios of Pachymer,<sup>3</sup> Cantacuzene,<sup>4</sup> and Nicephorus Gregoras,<sup>5</sup> who have composed the prolix and languid story of the times. The name and situation of the emperor John Cantacuzene might inspire the most lively curiosity. His memorials of forty years extend from the revolt of the younger Andronicus to his own abdication of the empire; and it is observed, that, like Moses and Cæsar, he was the principal actor in the scenes which he describes. But in this eloquent work we should vainly seek the sincerity of an hero or a penitent. Retired in a cloister from the vices and passions of the world, he presents not a confession, but an apology, of the life of an ambitious statesman. Instead of unfolding the true counsels and characters of men, he displays the smooth and specious surface of events, highly varnished with his own praises and those of his friends. Their motives are always pure; their ends always legitimate: they conspire and rebel without any views of interest; and the violence which they inflict or suffer is celebrated as the spontaneous effect of reason and virtue.

After the example of the first of the Palæologi, the elder Andronicus associated his son Michael to the honours of the purple, and from the age of eighteen to his premature death, that prince was acknowledged, above twenty-five years, as the second emperor of the Greeks.<sup>6</sup> At the head of an army, he excited neither the fears of the enemy, nor the jealousy of the court; his modesty and patience were never tempted to compute the years of his father; nor was that father compelled to repent of his liberality either by the virtues or vices of his son. The son of Michael was named Andronicus from his grandfather, to whose early favour he was introduced by that nominal resemblance. The blossoms of wit and beauty increased the fondness of the elder Andronicus; and, with the common vanity of age, he expected to realise in the second, the hope which had been disappointed in the first, generation. The boy was educated in the palace as an heir and a favourite; and in the oaths and acclamations of the people, the august triad was formed by the names of the father, the son, and the grandson. But the younger Andronicus was speedily corrupted by his infant greatness, while he beheld with puerile impatience the double obstacle that hung, and might long hang, over his rising ambition. It was not to acquire fame, or to diffuse happiness, that he so eagerly aspired: wealth and impunity were in his eyes the most precious attributes of a monarch; and his first indiscreet demand was the sovereignty of some rich and fertile island, where he might lead a life of independence and pleasure. The emperor was offended by the loud and frequent intemperance which disturbed his capital: the sums which his parsimony denied were supplied by the Genoese usurers of Pera; and the oppressive debt, which consolidated the interest of a faction, could be discharged only by a revolution. A beautiful female, a matron in rank, a prostitute in manners, had instructed the younger Andronicus in the rudiments of love; but he had reason to suspect the nocturnal visits of a rival;

First disputes between the elder and younger Andronicus. A. D. 1320.

<sup>3</sup> Pachymer, in seven books, 377 folio pages, describes the first twenty-six years of Andronicus the Elder; and marks the date of his composition by the current news or lie of the day (A. D. 1308). Either death or disgust prevented him from resuming the pen.

<sup>4</sup> After an interval of twelve years, from the conclusion of Pachymer, Cantacuzenus takes up the pen; and his first book (c. 1.—59. p. 9.—130.) relates the civil war, and the eight last years of the elder Andronicus. The ingenious comparison with Moses and Cæsar, is fancied by his French translator, the president Cousin.

<sup>5</sup> Nicephorus Gregoras more briefly includes the entire life and

of Andronicus the Elder (c. 1.—106.—291.) This is the only work of the elder Andronicus which has been preserved. The younger Andronicus is mentioned in the history of the emperor Michael Palæologus (c. 1.—106.—291.) This is the only work of the younger Andronicus which has been preserved.

and a stranger passing through the street was pierced by the arrows of his guards, who were placed in ambush at her door. That stranger was his brother, prince Manuel, who languished and died of his wound; and the emperor Michael, their common father, whose health was in a declining state, expired on the eighth day, lamenting the loss of both his children.<sup>7</sup> However guiltless in his intention, the younger Andronicus might impute a brother's and a father's death to the consequence of his own vices; and deep was the sigh of thinking and feeling men, when they perceived, instead of sorrow and repentance, his ill-dissembled joy on the removal of two odious competitors. By these melancholy events, and the increase of his disorders, the mind of the elder emperor was gradually alienated; and, after many fruitless reproofs, he transferred on another grandson<sup>8</sup> his hopes and affection. The change was announced by the new oath of allegiance to the reigning sovereign, and the person whom he should appoint for his successor; and the acknowledged heir, after a repetition of insults and complaints, was exposed to the indignity of a public trial. Before the sentence, which would probably have condemned him to a dungeon or a cell, the emperor was informed that the palace courts were filled with the armed followers of his grandson; the judgment was softened to a treaty of reconciliation; and the triumphant escape of the prince encouraged the ardour of the younger faction.

Three civil wars between the two emperors.
A. D. 1321,
April 26.—
A. D. 1328,
May 24.

Yet the capital, the clergy, and the senate, adhered to the person, or at least to the government, of the old emperor; and it was only in the provinces, by flight, and revolt, and foreign succour, that the malecontents could hope to vindicate their cause and subvert his throne. The soul of the enterprise was the great domestic John Cantacuzene: the sally from Constantinople is the first date of his actions and memorials; and if his own pen be most descriptive of his patriotism, an unfriendly historian has not refused to celebrate the zeal and ability which he displayed in the service of the young emperor. That prince escaped from the capital under the pretence of hunting; erected his standard at Adrianople; and, in a few days, assembled fifty thousand horse and foot, whom neither honour nor duty could have armed against the barbarians. Such a force might have saved or commanded the empire; but their counsels were discordant, their motions were slow and doubtful, and their progress was checked by intrigue and negotiation. The quarrel of the two Andronici was protracted, and suspended, and renewed, during a ruinous period of seven years. In the first treaty, the relics of the Greek empire were divided: Constantinople, Thessalonica, and the islands, were left to the elder, while the younger acquired the sovereignty of the greatest part of Thrace, from Philippi to the Byzantine limit. By the second treaty, he stipulated the payment of his troops, his immediate coronation, and an adequate share of the power and revenue of the state. The third civil war was terminated by the surprise of Constantinople, the final retreat of the old emperor, and the sole reign of his victorious grandson. The reasons of this delay may be found in the characters of the men and of the times. When the heir of the monarchy first pleaded his wrongs and his apprehensions, he was heard with pity and applause: and his adherents repeated on all sides the inconsistent promise, that he would increase the pay of the soldiers and alleviate the burdeus of the people. The grievances of forty years were mingled in his revolt; and the rising generation was fatigued by the endless prospect of a reign, whose favourites and maxims were of other times. The youth of Andronicus had been without spirit, his age was without reverence: his taxes produced an annual revenue of five hundred thousand pounds; yet the richest of the sovereigns of Christendom was incapable of maintaining three thousand horse and twenty galleys, to resist the destructive progress of the Turks.<sup>9</sup> "How different," said the younger Andronicus, "is my situation from that of the son of Philip!" "Alexander might complain, that his father would leave him nothing to conquer: alas! my grandsire will leave me nothing to lose." But the Greeks were soon admonished, that the public disorders could not be healed by a civil war; and that their young favourite was not destined to be the saviour of a falling empire. On the first repulse, his party was broken by his own levity, their intestine discord, and the intrigues of the ancient court, which tempted each malecontent to desert or betray the cause of rebellion. Andronicus the Younger was touched with remorse, or fatigued with business, or deceived by negotiation: pleasure rather than power was his aim; and the licence of maintaining a thousand hounds, a thousand hawks, and a thousand huntsmen, was sufficient to sully his fame and disarm his ambition.

Coronation of the younger Andronicus.
A. D. 1325,
Feb. 2.

Let us now survey the catastrophe of this busy plot, and the final situation of the principal actors.<sup>10</sup> The age of Andronicus was consumed in civil discord; and, amidst the events of war and treaty, his power and reputation continually decayed, till the fatal night in which the gates of the city and palace were opened, without resistance, to his grandson. His principal commander scorned the repeated warnings of danger; and retiring to rest in the vain security of ignorance, abandoned the feeble monarch, with some priests and pages, to the terrors of a sleepless night. These terrors were quickly realised by the hostile shouts, which pro-

The elder Andronicus abdicates the government.
A. D. 1328,
May 24.

<sup>7</sup> We are indebted to Nicephorus Gregoras (v. filii. c. 1.) for the knowledge of this tragic adventure, while Cantacuzene more discreetly conceals the vices of Andronicus the Younger, of which he writes thus: "The emperor Michael, after a long illness, died on the eighth day of the month of April."

<sup>8</sup> I. e. c. 1, 2, 3.
<sup>9</sup> See Nicephorus Gregoras, l. viii. c. 6. The younger Andronicus complained, that in four years and four months a sum of 350,000 byzants of gold was due to him for the expenses of his household. (Cantacuzene, l. viii. c. 10.)

<sup>10</sup> It is not probable that his text has been corrupted by ignorant transcribers.

ho is remark-

in the dates of

claimed the titles and victory of Andronicus the Younger; and the aged emperor, falling prostrate before an image of the Virgin, despatched a suppliant message to resign the sceptre, and to obtain his life at the hands of the conqueror. The answer of his grandson was decent and pious; at the prayer of his friends, the younger Andronicus assumed the sole administration; but the elder still enjoyed the name and pre-eminence of the first emperor, the use of the great palace, and a pension of twenty-four thousand pieces of gold, one half of which was assigned on the royal treasury, and the other on the fishery of Constantinople. But his impotence was soon exposed to contempt and oblivion; the vast silence of the palace was disturbed only by the cattle and poultry of the neighbourhood, which roved with impunity through the solitary courts; and a reduced allowance of ten thousand pieces of gold<sup>11</sup> was all that he could ask, and more than he could hope. His calamities were embittered by the gradual extinction of sight: his confinement was rendered each day more rigorous; and during the absence and sickness of his grandson, his inhuman keepers, by the threats of instant death, compelled him to exchange the purple for the monastic habit and profession. The monk Antony had renounced the pomp of the world: yet he had occasion for a coarse fur in the winter season, and as wine was forbidden by his confessor, and water by his physician, the sherbet of Egypt was his common drink. It was not without difficulty that the late emperor could procure three or four pieces to satisfy these simple wants; and if he bestowed the gold to relieve the more painful distress of a friend, the sacrifice is of some weight in the scale of humanity and religion. Four years

His death.
A. D. 1332,
Feb. 13.
after his abdication, Andronicus or Antony expired in a cell, in the seventy-fourth year of his age: and the last strain of adulation could only promise a more splendid crown of glory in heaven than he had enjoyed upon earth.<sup>12</sup>

Nor was the reign of the younger, more glorious or fortunate than that of the elder, Andronicus.<sup>13</sup> He gathered the fruits of ambition; but the taste was transient and bitter. In the supreme station he lost the remains of his early popularity, and the defects of his character became still more conspicuous to the world. The public reproach urged him to march in person against the Turks; nor did his courage fail in the hour of trial, but a defeat and a wound were the only trophies of his expedition in Asia, which confirmed the establishment of the Ottoman monarchy. The abuses of the evil government attained their full maturity and perfection: his neglect of forms, and the confusion of national dresses, are deplored by the Greeks as the fatal symptoms of the decay of the empire. Andronicus was old before his time: the intemperance of youth had accelerated the infirmities of age; and after being rescued from a dangerous malady by nature, or physic, or the Virgin, he was snatched away before he had accomplished his forty-fifth year. He was twice married; and as the progress of the Latins in arms and arts had softened the prejudices of the Byzantine court, his two wives were chosen in the princely houses of Germany and Italy. The first, Agnes at home, Irene in Greece, was daughter of the duke of Brunswick. Her father<sup>14</sup> was a petty lord<sup>15</sup> in the poor and savage regions of the north of Germany; yet he derived some revenue from his silver mines;<sup>16</sup> and his family is celebrated by the Greeks as the most ancient and noble of the Teutonic name.<sup>18</sup> After the death of this childish princess, Andronicus sought in marriage Jane, the sister of the count of Savoy,<sup>19</sup> and his suit was preferred to that of the French king.<sup>20</sup> The count respected in his sister the superior majesty of a Roman empress; her retinue was composed of knights and ladies; she was regenerated and crowned in St. Sophia, under the more orthodox appellation of Anne; and, at the nuptial feast, the Greeks and Italians vied with each other in the martial exercises of tilts and tournaments.

The empress Anne of Savoy survived her husband; their son, John Palæologus, was left an orphan and an emperor, in the ninth year of his age; and his weakness was protected by the first and most deserving of the Greeks. The long and cordial friendship of his father for John Cantacuzene is alike honourable to the prince and the sub-

Reign of John Palæologus.
A. D. 1341,
June 15—
A. D. 1391.

Fortune of John Cantacuzene.

<sup>11</sup> I have endeavoured to reconcile the 25,000 pieces of Cantacuzene (L. ix. c. 1.) with the 10,000 of Nicephorus Gregoras (L. ix. c. 2.), the one of whom wished to soften, the other to magnify, the hardships of the old emperor.

<sup>12</sup> The retreat, of his to the scaffold or irening, a prostitute

<sup>13</sup> to praise!

<sup>14</sup> The sole reign of Andronicus the Younger is described by Cantacuzene (L. ii. c. 1—10) p. 1—152, and Nicephorus Gregoras (L. ix. c. 7—11) p. c. 11 p. 262—361.

<sup>15</sup> Agnes, or Irene, was the daughter of Duke Henry the Wonderful, the chief of the house of Brunswick, and the fourth in descent from the famous Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony and Bavaria, and conqueror of the Slavi on the Baltic coast. Her brother Henry was surnamed the Greck, from his two journeys into the East, but these journeys, according to his sister's marriage, and I am acquainted how Agnes was discovered in the heart of Germany, and recommended to the Byzantine court (Ramus, Memoirs of the House of Brunswick, p. 126—137).

<sup>16</sup> Henry the Wonderful was the founder of the branch of Grubow. p. 287. He resided in the one than a sixth part of the burgh, which the Grubow their great nests. The frequent partitions among brothers had almost ruined the princely house.

<sup>17</sup> The royal author of the Memoirs of Brandenburg will teach us, how justly, in a much later period, the north of Germany deserved the epithets of poor and barbarous (Essai sur les Mœurs, &c.). In the year 1366, in the woods of Lunenburg, some wild people of the Yened race were allowed to bury alive their inhuman and useless parents (Ramus, p. 176).

<sup>18</sup> The version of Tacitus, that Germany was destitute of the precious metals, must be taken, even in his own time, with some limitation (Germania, c. 5. Annal. vi. 26.). According to Sponer (Hist. & Germanicæ Prærogative, tom. i. p. 71.), argentum in the Germanic montibus, imperante Otthone magno (A. D. 965) primum apertis, luporum enim in montibus habitantibus, &c.

<sup>19</sup> bet of the house of Brunswick.

<sup>20</sup> Cantacuzene has given a most honourable testimony, πρὸς τὴν Γερμανίαν (Germania, c. 5. Annal. vi. 26.). τοὺς ἰδιώτας (the natives) employ the εὐρίστη for the δ, and the αὐτὸν for the β, and the whole will read in the Italian idiom di Brunswich, τον παρ αὐτοῦ ἐπιφανέστατον, καὶ λαμπροτέρου πατρὸς τοῦδε ἀποφύλακτον ἀνερπύλακτον τοῦ γένους. The phrase is in a small, and pleasing to an English ear.

<sup>21</sup> Anne, or Jane, was one of the four daughters of Amelée the Great, by a second marriage, and half-sister of his successor Edward count of Savoy (Anderson's Tables, p. 650). See Cantacuzene (L. ii. c. 10—42).

<sup>22</sup> That king, of the fact be true, must have been Charles the Fur, who in five years (1521—1526) was married to three wives (Anderson, p. 645). Anne of Savoy arrived at Constantinople in February, 1526.

ject. It had been formed amidst the pleasures of their youth; their families were almost equally noble;<sup>21</sup> and the recent lustre of the purple was amply compensated by the energy of a private education. We have seen that the young emperor was saved by Cantacuzene from the power of his grandfather; and, after six years of civil war, the same favourite brought him back in triumph to the palace of Constantinople. Under the reign of Andronicus the Younger, the great domestic ruled the emperor and the empire; and it was by his valour and conduct that the isle of Lesbos and the principality of Ætolia were restored to their ancient allegiance. His enemies confess, that, among the public robbers, Cantacuzene alone was moderate and abstemious; and the free and voluntary account which he produces of his own wealth<sup>22</sup> may sustain the presumption that it was devolved by inheritance, and not accumulated by rapine. He does not indeed specify the value of his money, plate, and jewels; yet, after a voluntary gift of two hundred vases of silver, after much had been secreted by his friends and plundered by his foes, his forfeit treasures were sufficient for the equipment of a fleet of seventy galleys. He does not measure the size and number of his estates; but his granaries were heaped with an incredible store of wheat and barley; and the labour of a thousand yoke of oxen might cultivate, according to the practice of antiquity, about sixty-two thousand five hundred acres of arable land.<sup>23</sup> His pastures were stocked with two thousand five hundred brood mares, two hundred camels, three hundred mules, five hundred asses, five thousand horned cattle, fifty thousand hogs, and seventy thousand sheep;<sup>24</sup> a precious record of rural opulence, in the last period of the empire, and in a land, most probably in Thrace, so repeatedly wasted by foreign and domestic hostility. The favour of Cantacuzene was above his fortune. In the moments of familiarity, in the hour of sickness, the emperor was desirous to level the distance between them, and pressed his friend to accept the diadem and purple. The virtue of the great domestic, which is attested by his own pen, resisted the dangerous proposal; but the last testament of Andronicus the Younger named him the guardian of his son, and the regent of the empire.

Had the regent found a suitable return of obedience and gratitude, perhaps he would have acted with pure and zealous fidelity in the service of his pupil.<sup>25</sup> A guard of five hundred soldiers watched over his person and the palace: the funeral of the late emperor was decently performed; the capital was silent and submissive; and five hundred letters, which Cantacuzene despatched in the first month, informed the provinces of their loss and their duty. The prospect of a tranquil minority was blasted by the great duke or admiral Apocaucus;<sup>26</sup> and to exaggerate his perfidy, the Imperial historian is pleased to magnify his own imprudence, in raising him to that office against the advice of his more sagacious sovereign. Bold and subtle, rapacious and profuse, the avarice and ambition of Apocaucus were by turns subservient to each other; and his talents were applied to the ruin of his country. His arrogance was heightened by the command of a naval force and an impregnable castle, and under the mask of oaths and flattery he secretly conspired against his benefactor. The female court of the empress was <sup>by the empress Anne of Savoy</sup> bribed and directed: he encouraged Anne of Savoy to assent, by the law of nature, the tutelage of her son; the love of power was disguised by the anxiety of maternal tenderness; and the founder of the Paleologi had instructed his posterity to dread the example of a perfidious guardian. The patriarch John of <sup>by the patriarch</sup> Apri was a proud and feeble old man, encompassed by numerous and hungry kindred. He produced an obsolete epistle of Andronicus, which bequeathed the prince and people to his pious care: the fate of his predecessor Arsenius prompted him to prevent, rather than punish, the crimes of an usurper; and Apocaucus smiled at the success of his own flattery, when he beheld the Byzantine priest assuming the state and temporal claims of the Roman pontiff.<sup>27</sup> Between three persons so different in their situation and character, a private league was concluded: a shadow of authority was restored to the senate; and the people was tempted by the name of freedom. By this powerful confederacy, the great domestic was assaulted at first with clandestine, at length with open, arms. His prerogatives were disputed; his opinions slighted; his friends persecuted; and his safety was threatened both in the camp and city. In his absence on the public service, he was accused of treason; proscribed as an enemy of the church and state; and delivered, with all his adherents, to the sword of justice, the vengeance of the people, and the power of the devil: his fortunes were confiscated; his aged mother was cast into prison; all his past services were buried in oblivion; and he was driven by injustice to perpetrate the crime of which he was accused.<sup>28</sup> From the review of his preceding conduct, Cantacuzene appears to have been guiltless of any treasonable designs; and the only suspicion of his innocence must arise from the vehemence of his protestations, and the sub-

<sup>21</sup> The noble race of the Cantacuzeni (illustrated from the 13th century in the Byzantine annals) was drawn from the Tabularii of France, the heroes of those romances which, in the 14th century, were translated and read by the Greeks (Boucagge, Ann. Byzant. p. 256).

<sup>22</sup> See Cantacuzene (l. ii. c. 21. 30. 36.).

<sup>23</sup> Sicilia, in Gaul, or Catalonia, in Italy or Spain, allow two sokes of oxen, two drivers, and six labourers, for two hundred m. gr. (25) English acres, of trade land, and three more acres must be added if there be much underwood (Cataluña en Re. l. i. c. 1. p. 111. edit. Gessner).

<sup>24</sup> In this enumeration (l. ii. c. 20.) the French translation of the president Cousin is baffled with three papal, and counted errors. He omits the 1000 sokes of working oxen. He is incorrect in the πεντακισμύρια πρόβατα, by the number of fifteen hundred. He confounds individuals with children, and is Cantacuzene no more than Savoy. See not so in the original text.

<sup>25</sup> See the emperor's address to the senate (l. ii. c. 20.), and the whole progress of the civil war in this, as well as in the following books. See also in that of Nicetas (Gregory of Antioch, l. vi. c. 9. p. 115. 119.).

<sup>26</sup> He died and the next day he died of the plague, as placed on the field of battle, and was buried in the church of St. George, with his adherents, and the whole of the army, by the emperor's order. See the account of the emperor's death in the Ann. Byzant. l. ii. c. 24. p. 119. 120.

<sup>27</sup> See Gregory of Antioch (l. vi. c. 9. p. 115. 119.) and the emperor's address to the senate (l. ii. c. 20. p. 111. 112.). See also the account of the emperor's death in the Ann. Byzant. l. ii. c. 24. p. 119. 120.

lime purity which he ascribes to his own virtue. While the empress and the patriarch still affected the appearances of harmony, he repeatedly solicited the permission of retiring to a private, and even a monastic, life. After he had been declared a public enemy, it was his fervent wish to throw himself at the feet of the young emperor, and to receive without a murmur the stroke of the executioner: it was not without reluctance that he listened to the voice of reason, which inculcated the sacred duty of saving his family and friends, and proved that he could only save them by drawing the sword and assuming the Imperial title.

In the strong city of Demotica, his peculiar domain, the emperor assumed the purple. Cantacuzene assumes the purple. A. D. 1341. Oct. 26. John Cantacuzenus was invested with the purple buskins: his right leg was clothed by his noble kinsmen, the left by the Latin chiefs, on whom he conferred the order of knighthood. But even in this act of revolt, he was still studious of loyalty; and the titles of John Paleologus and Anne of Savoy were proclaimed before his own name and that of his wife Irene. Such vain ceremony is a thin disguise of rebellion, nor are there perhaps any personal wrongs that can authorise a subject to take arms against his sovereign: but the want of preparation and success may confirm the assurance of the usurper, that this decisive step was the effect of necessity rather than of choice. Constantinople adhered to the young emperor: the king of Bulgaria was invited to the relief of Adrianople: the principal cities of Thrace and Macedonia, after some hesitation, renounced their obedience to the great domestic; and the leaders of the troops and the provinces were induced, by their private interest, to prefer the loose dominion of a woman and a priest. The army of Cantacuzene, in sixteen divisions, was stationed on the banks of the Melas to tempt or intimidate the capital: it was dispersed by treachery or fear; and the officers, more especially the mercenary Latins, accepted the bribes, and embraced the service, of the Byzantine court. After this loss, the rebel emperor (he fluctuated between the two characters) took the road of Thessalonica with a chosen remnant; but he failed in his enterprise on that important place; and he was closely pursued by the great duke, his enemy Apocaucus, at the head of a superior power by sea and land. Driven from the coast, in his march, or rather flight, into the mountains of Servia, Cantacuzene assembled his troops, to scrutinise those who were worthy and willing to accompany his broken fortunes. A base majority bowed and retired; and his trusty band was diminished to two thousand; and at last to five hundred volunteers. The crat 28 or despot of the Servians, received him with generous hospitality; but the ally was insensibly degraded to a suppliant, an hostage, a captive; and, in this miserable dependence, he waited at the door of the barbarian, who could dispose of the life and liberty of a Roman emperor. The most tempting offers could not persuade the cral to violate his trust; but he soon inclined to the stronger side; and his friend was dismissed without injury to a new vicissitude of hopes and perils. Near six years the flame of discord burnt with various success and unabated rage: the cities were distracted by the faction of the nobles and the plebeians; the Cantacuzeni and Paleologi; and the Bulgarians, the Servians, and the Turks, were invoked on both sides as the instruments of private ambition and the common ruin. The regent deplored the calamities, of which he was the author and victim: and his own experience might dictate a just and lively remark on the different nature of foreign and civil war. "The former," said he, "is the external warmth of summer, always tolerable, and often beneficial; the latter is the deadly heat of a fever, which consumes without a remedy the vitals of the constitution."<sup>28</sup>

The introduction of barbarians and savages into the contests of civilised nations is a measure pregnant with shame and mischief, which the interest of the moment may compel, but which is reprobated by the best principles of humanity and reason. It is the practice of both sides to accuse their enemies of the guilt of the first alliances; and those who fail in their negotiations are loudest in their censure of the example which they envy, and would gladly imitate. The Turks of Asia were less barbarous, perhaps, than the shepherds of Bulgaria and Servia; but their religion rendered them the implacable foes of Rome and Christianity. To acquire the friendship of their emirs, the two factions vied with each other in baseness and profusion: the dexterity of Cantacuzene obtained the preference; but the succour and victory were dearly purchased by the marriage of his daughter with an infidel, the captivity of many thousand Christians, and the passage of the Ottomans into Europe, the last and fatal stroke in the fall of the Roman empire. The inclining scale was decided in his favour by the death of Apocaucus, the just, though singular, retribution of his crimes. A crowd of nobles or plebeians, whom he feared or hated, had been seized by his orders in the capital and the provinces; and the old palace of Constantine was assigned for the place of their confinement. Some alterations in raising the walls, and narrowing the cells, had been ingeniously contrived to prevent their escape, and aggravate their misery; and the work was incessantly pressed by the daily visits of the tyrant. His guards watched at the gate, and as he stood in the inner court, to overlook the architects, without fear or suspicion, he was assaulted and laid breathless on the ground, by two resolute prisoners of the Paleologian race,<sup>29</sup> who were armed with sticks and animated by despair. On the rumour of revenge and liberty, the captive multitude broke

<sup>28</sup> The princes of Servia (Ducanes, F and Dalmatians, &c. c. 2, 3, 4, 5) were styled Despots in Greek, and Crat, or the native name (Ducanes, Gloss. Grec. p. 731). That title, the equivalent of king, appears in the Hittite inscriptions. <sup>29</sup> The Turks (Lennet, p. 113) were of Padoashah for the emperor. In the text, the name is given as former is the

The civil war.
A. D. 1341.
—1347.

Victory of Cantacuzene.

their fetters, fortified their prison, and exposed from the battlements the tyrant's head, presuming on the favour of the people and the clemency of the empress. Anne of Savoy might rejoice in the fall of an haughty and ambitious minister, but while she delayed to resolve or to act, the populace, more especially the mariners, were excited by the widow of the great duke to a sedition, an assault, and a massacre. The prisoners (of whom the far greater part were guiltless or inglorious of the deed) escaped to a neighbouring church; they were slaughtered at the foot of the altar; and in his death the monster was not less bloody and venomous than in his life. Yet his talents alone upheld the cause of the young emperor; and his surviving associates, suspicious of each other, abandoned the conduct of the war, and rejected the fairest terms of accommodation. In the beginning of the dispute, the empress felt and complained, that she was deceived by the enemies of Cantacuzene: the patriarch was employed to preach against the forgiveness of injuries; and her promise of immortal hatred was sealed by an oath, under the penalty of excommunication.<sup>31</sup> But Anne soon learned to hate without a teacher: she beheld the misfortunes of the empire with the indifference of a stranger: her jealousy was exasperated by the competition of a rival empress; and on the first symptoms of a more yielding temper, she threatened the patriarch to convene a synod, and degrade him from his office. Their incapacity and discord would have afforded the most decisive advantage; but the civil war was protracted by the weakness of both parties; and the moderation of Cantacuzene has not escaped the reproach of timidity and indolence. He successively recovered the provinces and cities; and the realm of his pupil was measured by the walls of Constantinople; but the metropolis alone counterbalanced the rest of the empire; nor could he attempt that important conquest till he had secured in his favour the public voice and a private correspondence. An Italian, of the name of Faccioliati,<sup>32</sup> had succeeded to the office of great duke: the ships, the guards, and the golden gate, were subject to his command; but his humble ambition was bribed to become the instrument of treachery; and the revolution was accomplished without danger or bloodshed. Destitute of the powers of resistance, or the hope of relief, the inflexible Anne would have still defended the palace, and have smiled to behold the capital in flames rather than in the possession of a rival. She yielded to the prayers of her friends and enemies; and the treaty was dictated by the conqueror, who professed a loyal and zealous attachment to the son of his benefactor. The marriage of his daughter with John Paleologus was at length consummated: the hereditary right of the pupil was acknowledged; but the sole administration during ten years was vested in the guardian. Two emperors and three empresses were seated on the Byzantine throne; and a general amnesty quieted the apprehensions, and confirmed the property, of the most guilty subjects. The festival of the coronation and nuptials was celebrated with the appearances of concord and magnificence, and both were equally fallacious. During the late troubles, the treasures of the state, and even the furniture of the palace, had been alienated or embezzled: the royal banquet was served in pewter or earthenware; and such was the proud poverty of the times, that the absence of gold and jewels was supplied by the paltry artifices of glass and gilt leather.<sup>33</sup>

I hasten to conclude the personal history of John Cantacuzene.<sup>34</sup> He triumphed and reigned; but his reign and triumph were clouded by the discontent of his own and the adverse faction. His followers might style the general amnesty, an act of pardon for his enemies, and of oblivion for his friends;<sup>35</sup> in his cause their estates had been forfeited or plundered; and as they wandered naked and hungry through the streets, they cursed the selfish generosity of a leader, who, on the throne of the empire, might relinquish without merit his private inheritance. The adherents of the empress blushed to hold their lives and fortunes by the precarious favour of an usurper; and the thirst of revenge was concealed by a tender concern for the succession, and even the safety, of her son. They were justly alarmed by a petition of the friends of Cantacuzene, that they might be released from their oath of allegiance to the Paleologi, and intrusted with the defence of some cautionary towns; a measure supported with argument and eloquence; and which was rejected (says the Imperial Historian) "by my sublime, and almost incredible, virtue." His repose was disturbed by the sound of plots and seditions; and he trembled, lest the lawful prince should be stolen away by some foreign or domestic enemy, who would inscribe his name and his wrongs in the banners of rebellion. As the son of Andronicus advanced in the years of manhood, he began to feel and to act for himself; and his rising ambition was rather stimulated than checked by the imitation of his father's vices. If we may trust his own professions, Cantacuzene laboured with honest industry to correct these sordid and sensual appetites, and to raise the mind of the young prince to a level with his fortune. In the Servian expedition, the two emperors showed themselves in cordial harmony to the troops and provinces; and the younger colleague was initiated by the elder in the mysteries of war and government. After the conclusion of the peace, Paleologus was left at Thessalonica, a royal residence, and a frontier station, to

Reign of John Cantacuzene, A.D. 1347, Jan. 8—A.D. 1355, January.

He re-enters Constantinople. A.D. 1347, January 8.

<sup>31</sup> Cantacuzene accuses the patriarch, and spurs the emperor, the number of his sovereigns (l. 11, 24, 31, 32) and whom Nic. Gregorius expresses a particular animosity (l. xv. 11, 12, xv. 53). It is true, that they do not speak exactly of the same time.

<sup>32</sup> The traitor and treason are revealed by Nic. Gregorius (l. xv. 32).

<sup>33</sup> The emperor Cantacuzene, l. xv. 11, expresses his anxiety, and Nic. Gregorius (l. xv. 11) the complaints of his court, who are not to be exact. I have sent them the words of our poor sufferers after the restoration.

<sup>34</sup> From his return to Constantinople, Cantacuzene continues his history, and that of the emperor, and based the reign of Cantacuzene (Matthew, A.D. 1347, p. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000).

secure by his absence the peace of Constantinople, and to withdraw his youth from the temptations of a luxurious capital. But the distance weakened the powers of control, and the son of Andronicus was surrounded with artful or unthinking companions, who taught him to hate his guardian, to deplore his exile, and to vindicate his rights. A private treaty with the cæsar or despot of Servia was soon followed by an open revolt; and Cantacuzene, on the throne of the elder Andronicus, defended the cause of age and prerogative, which in his youth he had so vigorously attacked. At his request, the empress-mother undertook the voyage of Thessalonica, and the office of mediation: she returned without success; and unless Anne of Savoy was instructed by adversity, we may doubt the sincerity, or at least the fervour, of her zeal. While the regent grasped the sceptre with a firm and vigorous hand, she had been instructed to declare, that the ten years of his legal administration would soon elapse; and that after a full trial of the vanity of the world, the emperor Cantacuzene sighed for the repose of a cloister, and was ambitious only of an heavenly crown. Had these sentiments been genuine, his voluntary abdication would have restored the peace of the empire, and his conscience would have been relieved by an act of justice.

John Palæologus takes up arms against him. A.D. 1335.

Palæologus alone was responsible for his future government; and whatever might be his vices, they were surely less formidable than the calamities of a civil war, in which the barbarians and infidels were again invited to assist the Greeks in their mutual destruction. By the arms of the Turks, who now struck a deep and everlasting root in Europe, Cantacuzene prevailed in the third contest in which he had been involved; and the young emperor, driven from the sea and land, was compelled to take shelter among the Latins of the isle of Tenedos. His insolence and obstinacy provoked the victor to a step which must render the quarrel irreconcilable: and the association of his son Matthew, whom he invested with the purple, established the succession in the family of the Cantacuzeni. But Constantinople was still attached to the blood of her ancient princes, and this last injury accelerated the restoration of the rightful heir. A noble Genoese espoused the cause of Palæologus, obtained a promise of his sister, and achieved the revolution with two galleys and two thousand five hundred auxiliaries. Under the pretence of distress, they were admitted into the lesser port; a gate was opened, and the Latin shout of "Long life and victory to the emperor, John Palæologus!" was answered by a general rising in his favour. A numerous and loyal party yet adhered to the standard of Cantacuzene: but he asserts in his history (does he hope for belief?), that his tender conscience rejected the assurance of conquest; that, in free obedience to the voice of religion and philosophy, he descended from the throne, and embraced with pleasure the monastic habit and profession.<sup>36</sup> So soon as he ceased to be a prince, his successor was not unwilling that he should be a saint: the remainder of his life was devoted to piety and learning: in the cells of Constantinople and Mount Athos, the monk Joasaph was respected as the temporal and spiritual father of the emperor; and if he issued from his retreat, it was as the minister of peace, to subdue the obstinacy, and solicit the pardon, of his rebellious son.<sup>37</sup>

Yet in the cloister, the mind of Cantacuzene was still exercised by theological war. He sharpened a controversial pen against the Jews and Mahometans;<sup>38</sup> and in every state he defended with equal zeal the divine light of Mount Thabor, a memorable question which consummates the religious follies of the Greeks. The fakirs of India,<sup>39</sup> and the monks of the Oriental church, were alike persuaded, that in total abstraction of the faculties of the mind and body, the purer spirit may ascend to the enjoyment and vision of the Deity. The opinion and practice of the monasteries of Mount Athos<sup>40</sup> will be best represented in the words of an abbot, who flourished in the eleventh century. "When thou art alone in thy cell," says the ascetic teacher, "shut thy door, and seat thyself in a corner; raise thy mind above all things vain and transitory; recline thy beard and chin on thy breast; turn thy eyes and thy thought towards the middle of thy belly, the region of the navel; and search the place of the heart, the seat of the soul. At first, all will be dark and comfortless; but if you persevere day and night, you will feel an ineffable joy; and no sooner has the soul discovered the place of the heart, than it is involved in a mystic and ethereal light." This light, the production of a distempered fancy, the creature of an empty stomach and an empty brain, was adored by the Quietists as the pure and perfect essence of God himself; and as long as the folly was confined to Mount Athos, the simple solitaries were not inquisitive how the divine essence could be a material substance, or how an immaterial substance could be perceived by the eyes of the body. But in the reign of the younger Andronicus, these monasteries were visited by Barlaam,<sup>41</sup> a Calabrian monk, who was equally skilled in philosophy and theology; who possessed the languages of the Greeks and Latins; and whose versatile genius could maintain their selyte who was assaulted with letters from his friends of Isaphan. Cantacuzene had read the Koran: but I understand from Maracci, that he adopts the vulgar prejudices and fables against Mahomet and his religion.

<sup>36</sup> The awkward apology of Cantacuzene (l. c. 50.—52.), who relates, with visible confusion, his own downfall, may be supplied by the less accurate, but more honest, narratives of Mithra Velluti (l. c. 46) in the script. Revue Ital. tom. xiv. p. 265 and Duca (c. 30, 31).

<sup>37</sup> Cantacuzene, in the year 1375, was honoured with a letter from the pope (Fleury, Hist. Eccl. tom. xv. p. 299). His death is placed by respectable authority on the 20th of November, 1341. Ducange, Fam. Byzant. p. 260, 61. But if he were of the age of his companion Andronicus the Younger, he must have lived 116 years, a rare instance of longevity, which in so illustrious a person would have attracted universal notice.

<sup>38</sup> His four discourses, or books, were printed at Basil 1453 (Fabric. Biblioth. Græc. tom. vi. p. 473). He composed them to satisfy a pro-

<sup>39</sup> See the Voyages de Bernier, tom. i. p. 197.
<sup>40</sup> Mosheim, Institut. Hist. Eccl. p. 224, 225. Fleury, Hist. Eccl. tom. ix. p. 22, 23, 107, 111, &c. The former unfolds the causes with the judgment of a philosopher, the latter transcribes and translates with the prejudices of a Catholic priest.

<sup>41</sup> Bissop in Camden Angl. Lectures, tom. i. p. 563.—568.) has investigated the character and story of Barlaam. The duplicate of his pictures had inspired some doubts of the identity of his person. See likewise Fabricius (Biblioth. Græc. tom. x. p. 427.—437.).

opposite creeds, according to the interest of the moment. The indiscretion of an ascetic revealed to the curious traveller the secrets of mental prayer; and Barlaam embraced the opportunity of ridiculing the Quietists, who placed the soul in the navel; of accusing the monks of Mount Athos of heresy and blasphemy. His attack compelled the more learned to renounce or dissemble the simple devotion of their brethren; and Gregory Palamas introduced a scholastic distinction between the essence and operation of God. His inaccessible essence dwells in the midst of an uncreated and eternal light; and this beatific vision of the saints had been manifested to the disciples on Mount Thabor, in the transfiguration of Christ. Yet this distinction could not escape the reproach of polytheism; the eternity of the light of Thabor was fiercely denied; and Barlaam still charged the Palamites with holding two eternal substances, a visible and an invisible God. From the rage of the monks of Mount Athos, who threatened his life, the Calabrian retired to Constantinople, where his smooth and specious manners introduced him to the favour of the great domestic and the emperor. The court and the city were involved in this theological dispute, which flamed amidst the civil war; but the doctrine of Barlaam was disgraced by his flight and apostasy: the Palamites triumphed; and their adversary, the patriarch John of Apri, was deposed by the consent of the adverse factions of the state. In the character of emperor and theologian, Cantacuzene presided in the synod of the Greek church, which established, as an article of faith, the uncreated light of Mount Thabor; and, after so many insults, the reason of mankind was slightly wounded by the addition of a single absurdity. Many rolls of paper or parchment have been blotted; and the impatient sectaries, who refused to subscribe the orthodox creed, were deprived of the honours of Christian burial; but in the next age the question was forgotten; nor can I learn that the axe or the faggot were employed for the extirpation of the Barlaamite heresy.<sup>42</sup>

For the conclusion of this chapter, I have reserved the Genoese establishment at Pera or Galata, which shook the throne of Cantacuzene, and betrayed the debility of the Greek empire. The Genoese, who, after the recovery of Constantinople, were seated in the suburb of Pera or Galata, received that honourable fief from the bounty of the emperor. They were indulged in the use of their laws and magistracies; but they submitted to the duties of vassals and subjects: the forcible word of hegemon<sup>43</sup> was borrowed from the Latin jurisprudence; and their podesta, or chief, before he entered on his office, saluted the emperor with loyal acclamations and vows of fidelity. Genoa sealed a firm alliance with the Greeks; and, in case of a defensive war, a supply of fifty empty galleys, and a succour of fifty galleys completely armed and manned, was promised by the republic to the empire. In the revival of a naval force, it was the aim of Michael Palæologus to deliver himself from a foreign aid; and his vigorous government contained the Genoese of Galata within those limits which the insolence of wealth and freedom provoked them to exceed. A sailor threatened that they should soon be masters of Constantinople, and slew the Greek who resented this national affront; and an armed vessel, after refusing to salute the palace, was guilty of some acts of piracy in the Black Sea. Their countrymen threatened to support their cause; but the long and open village of Galata was instantly surrounded by the Imperial troops; till, in the moment of the assault, the prostrate Genoese implored the clemency of their sovereign. The defenceless situation which secured their obedience, exposed them to the attack of their Venetian rivals, who, in the reign of the elder Andronicus, presumed to violate the majesty of the throne. On the approach of their fleets, the Genoese, with their families and effects, retired into the city: their empty habitations were reduced to ashes; and the feeble prince, who had viewed the destruction of his suburb, expressed his resentment, not by arms, but by ambassadors. This misfortune, however, was advantageous to the Genoese, who obtained, and imperceptibly abused, the dangerous licence of surrounding Galata with a strong wall; of introducing into the ditch the waters of the sea; of erecting lofty turrets; and of mounting a train of military engines on the rampart. The narrow bounds in which they had been circumscribed, were insufficient for the growing colony; each day they acquired some addition of landed property; and the adjacent hills were covered with their villas and castles, which they joined and protected by new fortifications.<sup>44</sup> The navigation and trade of the Euxine was the patrimony of the Greek emperors, who commanded the narrow entrance, the gates, as it were, of that inland sea. In the reign of Michael Palæologus, their prerogative was acknowledged by the sultan of Egypt, who solicited and obtained the liberty of sending an annual ship for the purchase of slaves in Circassia and the Lesser Tartary: a liberty pregnant with mischief to the Christian cause; since these youths were transformed by education and discipline into the formidable Mamalukes.<sup>45</sup> From the colony of Pera, the Genoese engaged with superior advantage in the lucrative <sup>their trade</sup> trade of the Black Sea; and their <sup>and insolence</sup> industry supplied the Greeks with fish and corn; two articles of food almost equally important to a superstitious people. The spontaneous bounty of nature appears to have bestowed the harvests of the Ukraine, the produce of a rude and savage husbandry; and the endless exportation of salt-fish and caviar is annually renewed by the enormous sturgeons that are caught at the mouth of the Don or Tanais, in their last station of the rich mud and shallow water of the Mæotis.<sup>46</sup> The waters of the Oxus, the Caspian, the Volga, and the Don, opened a rare and laborious passage for the gems and spices of India; and, after three months' march, the caravans of Carizme met the Italian vessels in the harbours of Crimæa.<sup>47</sup> These various branches of trade were monopolised by the diligence and power of the Genoese. Their rivals of Venice and Pisa were forcibly expelled; the natives were awed by the castles and cities, which arose on the foundations of their humble factories; and their principal establishment of Caffa<sup>48</sup> was besieged without effect by the Tartar powers. Destitute of a navy, the Greeks were oppressed by these haughty merchants, who fed, or famished, Constantinople, according to their interest. They proceeded to usurp the customs, the fishery, and even the toll, of the Bosphorus; and while they derived from these objects a revenue of two hundred thousand pieces of gold, a remnant of thirty thousand was reluctantly allowed to the emperor.<sup>49</sup> The colony of Pera or Galata acted, in peace and war, as an independent state; and, as it will happen in distant settlements, the Genoese podesta too often forgot that he was the servant of his own masters.

<sup>42</sup> See Cantacuzene (l. ii. c. 79, 10, l. iii. c. 5, 25, 24, 25), and Nic. Gregor. (l. xi. c. 10, l. x. c. 3, 2, &c.), whose fact books, from the time to the death, are almost confined to a subject so interesting to the authors. Bower on Vit. Nic. Gregor. is, from the unpublished books, and Fabricius (lib. ii. c. 10, p. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

<sup>43</sup> The establishment and progress of the Genoese at Pera, or Galata, is described by the ancient Byzantine historians, l. i. p. 65, 191 from Nic. Gregor. l. xi. c. 10, l. x. c. 3, 2, &c. The Genoese, from the time to the death, are almost confined to a subject so interesting to the authors. Bower on Vit. Nic. Gregor. is, from the unpublished books, and Fabricius (lib. ii. c. 10, p. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

These usurpations were encouraged by the weakness of the elder Andronicus, and by the civil wars that afflicted his age and the minority of his grandson. The talents of Cantacuzene were employed to the ruin, rather than the restoration, of the empire; and after his domestic victory, he was condemned to an ignominious trial, whether the Greeks or the Genoese should reign in Constantinople. The merchants of Pera were offended by his refusal of some contiguous lands, some commanding heights, which they proposed to cover with new fortifications; and in the absence of the emperor, who was detained at Demotica by sickness, they ventured to brave the debility of a female reign. A Byzantine vessel, which had presumed to fish at the mouth of the harbour, was sunk by these audacious strangers; the fishermen were murdered. Instead of suing for pardon, the Genoese demanded satisfaction; required, in an haughty strain, that the Greeks should renounce the exercise of navigation; and encountered with regular arms the first sallies of the popular indignation. They instantly occupied the debatable land; and by the labour of a whole people, of either sex and of every age, the wall was raised, and the ditch was sunk, with incredible speed. At the same time, they attacked and burnt two Byzantine galleys; while the three others, the remainder of the Imperial navy, escaped from their hands, the habitations without the gates, or along the shore, were pillaged and destroyed; and the care of the regent, of the empress Irene, was confined to the preservation of the city. The return of Cantacuzene dispelled the public consternation; the emperor inclined to peaceful counsels; but he yielded to the obstinacy of his enemies, who rejected all reasonable terms, and to the ardour of his subjects, who threatened, in the style of Scripture, to break them in pieces like a potter's vessel. Yet they reluctantly paid the taxes, that he imposed for the construction of ships, and the expenses of the war; and as the two nations were masters, the one of the land, the other of the sea, Constantinople and Pera were pressed by the evils of a mutual siege. The merchants of the colony, who had believed that a few days would terminate the war, already murmured at their losses; the succours from their mother-country were delayed by the factions of Genoa; and the most cautious embraced the opportunity of a Rhodian vessel to remove their families and effects from the scene of hostility.

In the spring, the Byzantine fleet, <sup>Destruction of his fleet A.D. 1349.</sup> seven galleys and a train of smaller vessels, issued from the mouth of the harbour, and steered in a single line along the shore of Pera; unskilfully presenting their sides to the beaks of the adverse squadron. The crews were composed of peasants and mechanics; nor was their ignorance compensated by the native courage of barbarians: the wind was strong, the waves were rough; and no sooner did the Greeks perceive a distant and inactive enemy, than they leaped headlong into the sea, from a doubtful, to an inevitable, peril. The troops that marched to the attack of the lines of Pera were struck at the same moment with a similar panic; and the Genoese were astonished, and almost ashamed, at their double victory. Their triumphant vessels, crowned with flowers, and dragging after them the captive galleys, repeatedly passed and repassed before the palace: the only virtue of the emperor was patience; and the hope of revenge his sole consolation. Yet the distress of both parties interposed a temporary agreement; and the shame of the empire was disguised by a thin veil of dignity and power. Summoning the chiefs of the colony, Cantacuzene affected to despise the trivial object of the debate; and, after a mild reproof most liberally granted the lands, which had been previously resigned to the seeming custody of his officers.<sup>50</sup>

But the emperor was soon solicited to violate the treaty, and to join his arms with the Venetians, the perpetual enemies of Genoa and her colonies. While he compared the reasons of peace and war, his moderation was provoked by a wanton insult of the inhabitants of Pera, <sup>46</sup> Chardin (Voyages en Perse, tom. i. p. 48.) was assured at Caffa, that these fishes were sometimes twenty-four or twenty-six feet long, weighed eight or nine hundred pounds, and yielded three or four quintals of caviar. The corn of the Bosphorus had supplied the hemis. . . . . tom. iii. p. 515, 514. Vinsge di . . . . . 16 land or water carriage could only united under a wise and powerful monarch.

<sup>48</sup> Nic. Gregoras (l. xiii. c. 12.) is judicious and well-informed on the trade and colonies of the Black Sea. Chardin describes the present ruins of Caffa, where, in forty days, he saw above 400 sail employed in the corn and fish trade (Voyages en Perse, tom. i. p. 46-48.).

<sup>49</sup> See Nic. Gregoras, l. xvi. c. 1.

<sup>50</sup> The events of this war are related by Cantacuzene (l. iv. c. 11.) with obscurity and confusion, and by Nic. Gregoras (l. xvi. c. 1-7.) in a clear and honest narrative. The trust was less reasonable than the promise for the defeat of the fleet.

who discharged from their rampart a large stone that fell in the midst of Constantinople. On his just complaint, they coldly blamed the imprudence of their engineer; but the next day the insult was repeated, and they exulted in a second proof that the royal city was not beyond the reach of their artillery. Cantacuzene instantly signed his treaty with the Venetians; but the weight of the Roman empire was scarcely felt in the balance of these opulent and powerful republics.<sup>51</sup> From the Straits of Gibraltar to the mouth of the Tanais, their fleets encountered each other with various success; and a memorable battle was fought in the narrow sea, under the walls of Constantinople. It would not be an easy task to reconcile the accounts of the Greeks, the Venetians, and the Genoese;<sup>52</sup> and while I depend on the narrative of an impartial historian,<sup>53</sup> I shall borrow from each nation the facts that redound to their own disgrace, and the honour of their foes. The Venetians, with their allies the Catalans, had the advantage of number; and their fleet, with the poor addition of eight Byzantine galleys, amounted to seventy-five sail; the Genoese did not exceed sixty-four; but in those times their ships of war were distinguished by the superiority of their size and strength. The names and families of their naval commanders, Pisani, and Doria, are illustrious in the annals of their country; but the personal merit of the former was eclipsed by the fame and abilities of his rival. They engaged in tempestuous weather; and the tumultuary conflict was continued from the dawn to the extinction of light. The enemies of the Genoese applaud their prowess: the friends of the Venetians are dissatisfied with their behaviour; but all parties agree in praising the skill and boldness of the Catalans, who, with many wounds, sustained the brunt of the action. On the separation of the fleets, the event might appear doubtful; but the thirteen Genoese galleys, that had been sunk or taken, were compensated by a double loss of the allies; of fourteen Venetians, ten Catalans, and two Greeks; and even the grief of the conquerors expressed the assurance and habit of more decisive victories. Pisani confessed his defeat, by retiring into a fortified harbour, from whence, under the pretext of the orders of the senate, he steered with a broken and flying squadron for the Isle of Candia, and abandoned to his rivals the sovereignty of the sea. In a public epistle,<sup>54</sup> addressed to the doge and senate, Petrarca employs his eloquence to reconcile the maritime powers, the two luminaries of Italy. The orator celebrates the valour and victory of the Genoese, the first of men in the exercise of naval war: he drops a tear on the misfortunes of their Venetian brethren; but he exhorts them to pursue with fire and sword the base and perfidious Greeks; to purge the metropolis of the East from the heresy with which it was infected. Deserted by their friends, the Greeks were incapable of resistance; and three months after the battle, the emperor Cantacuzene solicited and subscribed a treaty, which forever banished the Venetians and Catalans, and granted to the Genoese a monopoly of trade, and almost a right of dominion. The Roman empire (I smile in transcribing the name) might soon have sunk into a province of Genoa, if the ambition of the republic had not been checked by the ruin of her freedom and naval power. A long contest of one hundred and thirty years was determined by the triumph of Venice; and the factions of the Genoese compelled them to seek for domestic peace under the protection of a foreign lord, the duke of Milan, or the French king. Yet the spirit of commerce survived that of conquest; and the colony of Pera still awed the capital and navigated the Euxine, till it was involved by the Turks in the final servitude of Constantinople itself.

CHAP. LXIV.

Conquests of Zingis Khan and the Moguls from China to Poland. — Escape of Constantinople and the Greeks. — Origin of the Ottoman Turks in Bithynia. — Reigns and Victories of Othman, Orchan, Amurath the First, and Bajazet the First. — Foundation and Progress of the Turkish Monarchy in Asia and Europe. — Danger of Constantinople and the Greek Empire.

FROM the petty quarrels of a city and her suburbs, from the cowardice and discord of the falling Greeks, I shall now ascend to the victorious Turks; whose domestic slavery was ennobled by martial discipline, religious enthusiasm, and the energy of the national character. The rise and progress of the Ottomans, the present sovereigns of Constantinople, are connected with the most important scenes of modern history; but they are founded on a previous knowledge of the great eruption of the Moguls and Tartars; whose rapid conquests may be compared with the primitive convulsions of nature, which have agitated and altered the surface of the globe. I have long since asserted my claim to introduce the nations, the immediate or remote authors of the fall of the Roman empire; nor can I refuse myself to those events, which, from their uncommon magnitude, will interest a philosophic mind in the history of blood.<sup>1</sup>

From the spacious highlands between China, Sileria, and the Caspian Sea, the tide of emigration and war has repeatedly been poured. These ancient seats of the Huns and Turks were occupied in the twelfth century by many pastoral

Their treaty with the emperor.
May 6.

Zingis Khan,
first emperor of the Moguls and Tartars.
A. D. 1206
— 1227.

51. This second war is darkly told by Cantacuzene (l. vi. c. 18. p. 24, 25. c. 73.), who wishes to disguise what he is so desirous to represent this sort of Nicæa, Georgias, which is still in MS. at Paris.

52. Muratori (Annali d'Italia, tom. vi. c. 114.) refers to the most ancient Chronicles of Venice (Cronica, the continuation of Ambrase Padoanus, tom. vi. p. 121, 122.) and Genoa (Cronica, the continuation of Ambrase Padoanus, tom. vi. p. 121, 122.) both which I have diligently consulted in his great Collection of the Histories of Italy.

53. See the Chronicle of Matteo Villani of Florence, l. vi. c. 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, in Muratori's Collection, tom. xiv.

54. The Abbé de Sade's Mémoires sur la Vie de Petrarque, tom. ii. p. 257, 258, represents this letter which he has copied from a MS. in the library of the Duke of Milan. Petrarque speaks with his astonishment and grief at the defeat and despair of the first emperor of the Mongols (p. 257, 258).

1. The reader is invited to review chapters xxvi, xxvii, and xxviii; the numbers of pastoral nomads, the conquests of Attila, and the Huns, which were compared at a time when I entertained the wish, rather than the hope, of concluding my history.

reduction of Otrar, Cogende, Bochara, Samarcand, Carizme, Herat, Merou, Nisabour, Balch, and Candahar; and the conquest of the rich and populous countries of Transoxiana, Carizme, and Chorasán. The destructive hostilities of Attila and the Huns have long since been elucidated by the example of Zingis and the Moguls; and in this more proper place I shall be content to observe, that, from the Caspian to the Indus, they ruined a tract of many hundred miles, which was adorned with the habitations and labours of mankind, and that five centuries have not been sufficient to repair the ravages of four years. The Mogul emperor encouraged or indulged the fury of his troops; the hope of future possession was lost in the ardour of rapine and slaughter; and the cause of the war exasperated their native fierceness by the pretence of justice and revenge. The downfall and death of the sultan Moliammed, who expired unpitied and alone, in a desert island of the Caspian Sea, is a poor atonement for the calamities of which he was the author. Could the Carizmian empire have been saved by a single hero, it would have been saved by his son Gelaiddin, whose active valour repeatedly checked the Moguls in the career of victory. Retreating, as he fought, to the banks of the Indus, he was oppressed by their innumerable host, till, in the last moment of despair, Gelaiddin spurred his horse into the waves, swam one of the broadest and most rapid rivers of Asia, and extorted the admiration and applause of Zingis himself. It was in this camp that the Mogul conqueror yielded with reluctance to the murmurs of his weary and wealthy troops, who sighed for the enjoyment of their native land. Incumbered with the spoils of Asia, he slowly measured back his footsteps, betrayed some pity for the misery of the vanquished, and declared his intention of rebuilding the cities which had been swept away by the tempest of his arms. After he had repassed the Oxus and Jaxartes, he was joined by two generals, whom he had detached with thirty thousand horse, to subdue the western provinces of Persia. They had trampled on the nations which opposed their passage, penetrated through the gates of Derbend, traversed the Volga and the desert, and accomplished the circuit of the Caspian Sea, by an expedition which had never been attempted, and has never been repeated. The return of Zingis was signalled by the overthrow of the rebellious or independent kingdoms of Tartary; and he died in the fulness of years and glory, with his last breath exhorting and instructing his sons to achieve the conquest of the Chinese empire.

His death.
A.D. 1227.

On the death of the Mogul ruler the six coasts of Zingis.

The harem of Zingis was composed of five hundred wives and concubines; and of his numerous progeny, four sons, illustrious by their birth and merit, exercised under their father the principal offices of peace and war. Toudi was his great huntsman, Zagatai<sup>21</sup> his judge, Oetui his minister, and Tuli his general; and their names and actions are often conspicuous in the history of his conquests. Firmly united for their own and the public interest, the three brothers and their families were content with dependent sceptres; and Oetui, by general consent, was proclaimed great khan, or emperor of the Moguls and Tartars. He was succeeded by his son Gayuk, after whose death the empire devolved to his cousins Mangou and Cublai, the sons of Tuli, and the grandsons of Zingis. In the sixty-eight years of his four first successors, the Mogul subdued almost all Asia, and a large portion of Europe. Without confining myself to the order of time, without expatiating on the detail of events, I shall present a general picture of the progress of their arms; I. In the East; II. In the South; III. In the West; and IV. In the North.

I. Before the invasion of Zingis, Of the northern China was divided into two empires of the North and South;<sup>22</sup> and the difference of origin and interest was smoothed by a general conformity of laws, language, and national manners. The Northern empire, which had been dismembered by Zingis, was finally subdued seven years after his death. After the loss of Peking, the emperor had fixed his residence at Kaifong, a city many leagues in circumference, and which contained, according to the Chinese annals, fourteen hundred thousand families of inhabitants and fugitives. He escaped from thence with only seven horsemen, and made his last stand in a third capital, till at length the hopeless monarch, protesting his innocence and accusing his fortune, ascended a funeral pile, and gave orders, that, as soon as he had stabbed himself, the fire should be kindled by his attendants. The dynasty of the Song, the native and ancient sovereigns of the whole empire, survived about forty-five years the fall of the Northern usurpers; and the perfect conquest was reserved for the arms of Cublai. During this interval, the Moguls were often diverted by foreign wars; and, if the Chinese seldom dared to meet their victors in the field, their passive courage presented an endless succession of cities to storm and of millions to slaughter. In the attack and defence of places, the engines of antiquity and the Greek fire were alternately employed: the use of gunpowder in cannon and bombs appears as a familiar practice;<sup>23</sup> and the sieges were conducted by the Mahometans and Franks, who had been liberally invited into the service of Cublai. After passing the great river, the troops and artillery were conveyed along a series of canals, till they invested the royal residence of Hamcheu, or Quinsay, in the country of silk, the most delicious climate of China. The emperor, a defenceless youth, surrendered his person and sceptre; and before he was sent in exile into Tartary, he struck nine times the ground with his forehead, to adore in prayer or thanksgiving the mercy of the great khan.

<sup>21</sup> Zagatai gave his name to his dominions of Maurendahar, or Transoxiana; and the Moguls of Hindostan, who migrated from that country, are styled Zagatai by the Persians. Thus, or an etymology, and the singular example of Uzbek, Nogai, &c. may warn us not absolutely to reject the derivations of a national, from a personal, name.

<sup>22</sup> In Marco Polo, and the Oriental geographers, the names of Cuhay and Manga distinguish the northern and southern empires, were those of the great khan, and, after China had been found, of the sixteenth century, in their

<sup>23</sup> I depend on the knowledge and history of the Pare Gaudai, who

Of the southern. A. D. 1279. Yet the war (it was now styled a rebellion) was still maintained in the southern provinces from Hamcheu to Canton; and the obstinate remnant of independence and hostility was transported from the land to the sea. But when the fleet of the Song was surrounded and oppressed by a superior armament, their last champion leaped into the waves with his infant emperor in his arms. "It is more glorious," he cried, "to die a prince, than to live a slave." An hundred thousand Chinese imitated his example; and the whole empire from Tonkin to the great wall submitted to the dominion of Cublai. His boundless ambition aspired to the conquest of Japan: his fleet was twice shipwrecked; and the lives of an hundred thousand Moguls and Chinese were sacrificed in the fruitless expedition. But the circumjacent kingdoms, Corea, Tonkin, Cochin-China, Pegu, Bengal, and Thibet, were reduced in different degrees of tribute and obedience by the effort or terror of his arms. He explored the Indian Ocean with a fleet of a thousand ships: they sailed in sixty-eight days, most probably to the isle of Borneo, under the equinoctial line; and though they returned not without spoil or glory, the emperor was dissatisfied that the savage king had escaped from their hands.

Of Persia and the empire of the caliphs. A. D. 1258. II. The conquest of Hindostan by the Moguls was reserved in a later period for the house of Timour; but that of Iran, or Persia, was achieved by Holagou Khan, the grandson of Zingis, the brother and lieutenant of the two successive emperors, Mangou and Cublai. I shall not enumerate the crowd of sultans, emirs, and atabeks, whom he trampled into dust: but the extirpation of the Assassins, or Ismaelians<sup>24</sup> of Persia, may be considered as a service to mankind. Among the hills to the south of the Caspian, these odious sectaries had reigned with impunity above an hundred and sixty years; and their prince, or Imam, established his lieutenant to lead and govern the colony of Mount Libanus, so famous and formidable in the history of the crusades<sup>25</sup>. With the fanaticism of the Koran the Ismaelians had blended the Indian transmigration, and the visions of their own prophets; and it was their first duty to devote their souls and bodies in blind obedience to the vicar of God. The daggers of his missionaries were felt both in the East and West: the Christians and the Moslems enumerate, and perhaps multiply, the illustrious victims that were sacrificed to the zeal, avarice, or resentment of the old man (as he was corruptly styled) of the mountain-

But these daggers, his only arms, were broken by the sword of Holagou, and not a vestige is left of the enemies of mankind, except the word assassin, which, in the most odious sense, has been adopted in the languages of Europe. The extinction of the Abbasides cannot be indifferent to the spectators of their greatness and decline. Since the fall of their Seljukian tyrants, the caliphs had recovered their lawful dominion of Bagdad and the Arabian Irak; but the city was distracted by theological factions, and the commander of the faithful was lost in a haram of seven hundred concubines. The invasion of the Moguls he encountered with feeble arms and haughty embassies. "On the divine decree," said the caliph Mostasem, "is founded the throne of the sons of Abbas; and their foes shall surely be destroyed in this world and in the next. Who is this Holagou that dares to arise against them? If he be desirous of peace, let him instantly depart from the sacred territory; and perhaps he may obtain from our clemency the pardon of his fault." This presumption was cherished by a perfidious vizir, who assured his master, that, even if the barbarians had entered the city, the women and children, from the terraces, would be sufficient to overwhelm them with stones. But when Holagou touched the phantom, it instantly vanished into smoke. After a siege of two months, Bagdad was stormed and sacked by the Moguls: and their savage commander pronounced the death of the caliph Mostasem, the last of the temporal successors of Maïomet; whose noble kinsmen, of the race of Abbas, had reigned in Asia above five hundred years. Whatever might be the designs of the conqueror, the holy cities of Mecca and Medina<sup>26</sup> were protected by the Arabian desert; but the Moguls spread beyond the Tigris and Euphrates, pillaged Aleppo and Damascus, and threatened to join the Franks in the deliverance of Jerusalem. Egypt was lost, had she been defended only by her feeble offspring: but the Mamalukes had breathed in their infancy the keenness of a Scythian air, equal in valour, superior in discipline, they met the Moguls in many a well-fought field; and drove back the stream of hostility to the eastward of the Euphrates. But it overflowed with resistless violence the kingdoms of Armenia and Anatolia, of which the former of Armenia. was possessed by the Christians, A. D. 1012-1272, and the latter by the Turks. The sultans of Iconium opposed some resistance to the Mogul arms, till Azzadin sought a refuge among the Greeks of Constantinople, and his feeble successors, the last of the Seljukian dynasty, were finally extirpated by the khans of Persia.

III. No sooner had Octai subverted the northern empire of China, Of Kozak, Russia, Persia, Hungary, &c. than he resolved to visit with his arms the most remote countries of the West. Fifteen hundred thousand Moguls founded ten castles in the hills above Tortosa. About the year 1270, they were extirpated by the Mamalukes.

<sup>24</sup> Ali that can be known of the Assassins of Persia and Syria, were poured from the country, and even profane, erudition of M. Falconet, in two memoires read before the Academy of Inscriptions (tom. xvi. p. 127-170.)

<sup>25</sup> The Ismaelians of Syria, 10,000 Assassins, had attacked at

<sup>26</sup> As a proof of the ignorance of the Chinese in foreign travels, I must observe, that some of their historians, and the Chinese of Fuzigai (a name for Medina, the country of Maïomet) (tom. x. p. 12.)

and Tartars were inscribed on the military roll: of these the great khan selected a third, which he intrusted to the command of his nephew Batou, the son of Tuli, who reigned over his father's conquests to the north of the Caspian Sea. After a festival of forty days, Batou set forward on this great expedition; and such was the speed and ardour of his innumerable squadrons, than in less than six years they had measured a line of ninety degrees of longitude, a fourth part of the circumference of the globe. The great rivers of Asia and Europe, the Volga and Kama, the Don and Borysthènes, the Vistula and Danube, they either swam with their horses, or passed on the ice, or traversed in leathern boats, which followed the camp, and transported their wagons and artillery. By the first victories of Batou, the remains of national freedom were eradicated in the immense plains of Turkestan and Kipzac.<sup>27</sup> In his rapid progress, he overran the kingdoms, as they are now styled, of Astracan and Cazan; and the troops which he detached towards Mount Caucasus, explored the most secret recesses of Georgia and Circassia. The civil discord of the great dukes, or princes, of Russia, betrayed their country to the Tartars. They spread from Livonia to the Black Sea, and both Moscow and Kiow, the modern and the ancient capitals, were reduced to ashes; a temporary ruin, less fatal than the deep, and perhaps indelible, mark, which a servitude of two hundred years has imprinted on the character of the Russians. The Tartars ravaged with equal fury the countries which they hoped to possess, and those which they were hastening to leave. From the permanent conquest of Russia, they made a deadly, though transient, inroad into the heart of Poland, and as far as the borders of Germany. The cities of Lublin and Cracow were obliterated: they approached the shores of the Baltic; and in the battle of Lignitz, they defeated the dukes of Silesia, the Polish palatines, and the great master of the Teutonic order, and filled nine sacks with the right ears of the slain. From Lignitz, the extreme point of their western march, they turned aside to the invasion of Hungary; and the presence or spirit of Batou inspired the host of five hundred thousand men: the Carpathian hills could not be long impervious to their divided columns; and their approach had been fondly disbelieved till it was irresistibly felt. The king, Bela the Fourth, assembled the military force of his counts and bishops; but he had alienated the nation by adopting a vagrant horde of forty thousand families of Comans, and these savage guests were provoked to revolt by the suspicion of treachery and the murder of their prince. The whole country north of the Danube was lost in a day, and depopulated in a summer; and the ruins of cities and churches were overspread with the bones of the natives, who expiated the sins of their Turkish ancestors.

An ecclesiastic, who fled from the sack of Waradin, describes the calamities which he had seen, or suffered; and the sanguinary rage of sieges and battles is far less atrocious than the treatment of the fugitives, who had been allured from the woods under a promise of peace and pardon, and who were coolly slaughtered as soon as they had performed the labours of the harvest and vintage. In the winter, the Tartars passed the Danube on the ice, and advanced to Gran or Strigonium, a German colony, and the metropolis of the kingdom. Thirty engines were planted against the walls; the ditches were filled with sacks of earth and dead bodies; and after a promiscuous massacre, three hundred noble matrons were slain in the presence of the khan. Of all the cities and fortresses of Hungary, three alone survived the Tartar invasion, and the unfortunate Bela hid his head among the islands of the Adriatic.

The Latin world was darkened by this cloud of savage hostility: a Russian fugitive carried the alarm to Sweden; and the remote nations of the Baltic and the ocean trembled at the approach of the Tartars,<sup>28</sup> whom their fear and ignorance were inclined to separate from the human species. Since the invasion of the Arabs in the eighth century, Europe had never been exposed to a similar calamity; and if the disciples of Mahomet would have oppressed her religion and liberty, it might be apprehended that the shepherds of Scythia would extinguish her cities, her arts, and all the institutions of civil society. The Roman pontiff attempted to appease and convert these invincible Pagans by a mission of Franciscan and Dominican friars; but he was astonished by the reply of the khan, that the sons of God and of Zingis were invested with a divine power to subdue or extirpate the nations; and that the pope would be involved in the universal destruction, unless he visited in person, and as a suppliant, the royal horde. The emperor Frederic the Second embraced a more generous mode of defence; and his letters to the kings of France and England, and the princes of Germany, represented the common danger, and urged them to arm their vassals in this just and rational crusade.<sup>29</sup> The Tartars themselves were awed by the fame and valour of the Franks: the town of Neustadt in Austria was bravely defended against them by fifty knights and twenty crossbows; and they raised the siege on the appearance of a German army. After wasting the adjacent kingdoms of Servia, Bosnia, and Bulgaria, Batou slowly retreated from the Danube to the Volga to enjoy the rewards of victory in the city and palace of Serai, which started at his command from the midst of the desert.

IV. Even the poor and frozen regions of the North attracted the arms of the Moguls: Sheibani

Of Siberia.

A. D. 1212.

See.

<sup>27</sup> The Dniele Kipzack, or plain of Kipzak, extends on either side of the Volga, in a boundless spine towards the Juk and Borysthènes, and is supposed to contain the primitive name and nation of the Cossacks.

<sup>28</sup> In the year 1253, the inhabitants of Gothia (Sweden) and Frise were prevented, by their fear of the Tartars, from sending, as usual, their ships to the herring-fishery on the coast of England, and as there was no exportation, forty or fifty of these fish were sold for a shilling (Matthew Paris, p. 790). It is whimsical enough, that the orders of a Mogul khan, who reigned on the borders of China, should have lowered the price of herrings in the English market.

<sup>29</sup> I shall copy his characteristic or flattening epithets of the different countries of Europe. Furens ac terrens ad arma Germani, strepens militum gentrix et alumna Franca, bellicosa et audax Hispania, &c.

and the khans of Iran or Persia. By their distance and power these royal lieutenants had soon been released from the duties of obedience; and after the death of Cbluai, they scorned to accept a sceptre or a title from his unworthy successors. According to their respective situation, they maintained the simplicity of the pastoral life, or assumed the luxury of the cities of Asia; but the princes and their hordes were alike disposed for the reception of a foreign worship. After some hesitation between the Gospel and the Koran, they conformed to the religion of Mahomet; and while they adopted for their brethren the Arabs and Persians, they renounced all intercourse with the ancient Moguls, the idolaters of China.

In this shipwreck of nations, some surprise may be excited by the escape of the Roman empire, whose relics, at the time of the Mogul invasion, were dismembered by the Greeks and Latins. Less potent than Alexander, they were pressed, like the Macedonian, both in Europe and Asia, by the shepherds of Scythia; and had the Tartars undertaken the siege, Constantinople must have yielded to the fate of Pekin, Samareand, and Bagdad. The glorious and voluntary retreat of Batou from the Danube was insulted by the vain triumph of the Franks and Greeks;<sup>34</sup> and in a second expedition, death surprised him in full march to attack the capital of the Cæsars. His brother Borgia carried the Tartar arms into Bulgaria and Thrace; but he was diverted from the Byzantine war by a visit to Novogorod, in the fifty-seventh degree of latitude, where he numbered the inhabitants and regulated the tributes of Russia. The Mogul khan formed an alliance with the Mamalukes against his brethren of Persia: three hundred thousand horse penetrated through the gates of Derbend; and the Greeks might rejoice in the first example of domestic war. After the recovery of Constantinople, Michael Paleologus,<sup>35</sup> at a distance from his court and army, was surprised and surrounded, in a Thracian castle, by twenty thousand Tartars. But the object of their march was a private interest: they came to the deliverance of Azzadin, the Turkish sultan; and were content with his person and the treasure of the emperor. Their general Noga, whose name is perpetuated in the hordes of Astracan, raised a formidable rebellion against Menzo Timour, the third of the khans of Kipzak; obtained in marriage Maria the natural daughter of Paleologus; and guarded the dominions of his friend and father. The subsequent invasions of a Scythian cast were those of outlaws and fugitives: and some thousands of Alani and Comans, who had been driven from their native seats, were reclaimed from a vagrant life, and enlisted in the service of the empire. Such was the influence in Europe of the invasion of the Moguls. The first terror of their arms secured, rather than disturbed, the peace of the Roman Asia. The sultan of Iconium solicited a personal interview with John Vataces; and his artful policy encouraged the Turks to defend their barrier against the common enemy.<sup>36</sup> That barrier indeed was soon overthrown; and the servitude and ruin of the Seljukians exposed the nakedness of the Greeks. The formidable Holagou threatened to march to Constantinople at the head of four hundred thousand men; and the groundless panic of the citizens of Nice will present an image of the terror which he had inspired. The accident of a procession, and the sound of a doleful litany, "From the fury of the Tartars, good Lord, deliver us!" had scattered the hasty report of an assault and massacre. In the blind credulity of fear, the streets of Nice were crowded with thousands of both sexes, who knew not from what or to whom they fled; and some hours elapsed before the firmness of the military officers could relieve the city from this imaginary foe. But the ambition of Holagou and his successors was fortunately diverted by the conquest of Bagdad, and a long vicissitude of Syrian wars; their hostility to the Moslems inclined them to unite with the Greeks and Franks;<sup>37</sup> and their generosity or contempt had offered the kingdom of Anatolia as the reward of an Armenian vassal. The fragments of the Seljukian monarchy were disputed by the emirs who had occupied the cities or the mountains; but they all confessed the supremacy of the khans of Persia; and he often interposed his authority, and sometimes his arms, to check their depredations, and to preserve the peace and balance of his Turkish frontier. The death of Cazan,<sup>38</sup> one of the greatest and most accomplished princes of the house of Zingis, removed this salutary control; and the decline of the Moguls gave a free scope to the rise and progress of the Ottoman empire.<sup>39</sup>

Escape of Constantinople and the Greek empire from the Moguls. A.D. 1210-1304.

After the retreat of Zingis, the sultan Gelaeddin of Carizme had returned from India to the possession and defence of his Persian kingdoms. In the space of eleven years, that hero fought in person fourteen battles; and such was his activity, that he led his cavalry in seventeen days from Teilis to Kerman, a march of a thousand miles. Yet he was oppressed by the jealousy of the Moslem princes, and the innumerable armies of the Moguls; and after his last defeat, Gelaeddin perished ignobly in the mountains of Kurdistan. His death dissolved a veteran and adventurous army, which included under the name of Carizmians or Corasmins many Turkman hordes, that had attached themselves to the like-wise, the Armenian prince, celebrates their friendship for himself and his nation.

Character of Cazan Khan, the rival and conqueror of Gengis Khan. In the conclusion of his history the arrival of 30,000 Tartars or successors of Cazan to restrain the

The origin of the Ottoman dynasty is illustrated by the critical learning of M. de Guignes (Hist. des Huns, tom. IV. p. 323-337) and d'Anville (Empire Turc, p. 11-22), two inhabitants of Paris, from whom the Orientals may learn the history and geography of their own country.

<sup>34</sup> Some repulse of the Moguls in Hungary (Matthew Paris, p. 545, 546) might perhaps be the consequence of the union and victory of the kings of the Franks on the confines of Bulgaria. Avelaractus (Ibnat. p. 310) after forty years, beyond the Euphrates, might be easily deceived.

<sup>35</sup> See Pachymer, l. iii. c. 25, and l. ix. c. 26, 27, and the false alarm at Nice, l. iii. c. 27. Nicephorus Gregoras, l. ix. c. 6.

<sup>36</sup> G. Acropolita, p. 36, 37. Nic. Greg. l. iii. c. 6, l. iv. c. 5.

<sup>37</sup> Avelaractus, who wrote in the year 1265, declares, that the Moguls, since the fabulous defeat of Batou, had not attacked either the Franks or Greeks, and of this he is a competent witness. Hayton, Decline of the Mogul khans of Persia. A.D. 1201, May 31.

Origin of the Ottomans. A.D. 1240, &c.

sultan's fortune. The bolder and more powerful chiefs invaded Syria, and violated the holy sepulchre of Jerusalem: the more humble engaged in the service of Aladin, sultan of Iconium; and among these were the obscure fathers of the Ottoman line. They had formerly pitched their tents near the southern banks of the Oxus, in the plains of Mahan and Nesa; and it is somewhat remarkable, that the same spot should have produced the first authors of the Parthian and Turkish empires. At the head, or in the rear, of a Carizmian army, Soliman Shah was drowned in the passage of the Euphrates: his son Ortothogrul became the soldier and subject of Aladin, and established at Surgut, on the banks of the Sangar, a camp of four hundred families or tents, whom he governed fifty-two years both in peace

Reuen of Othman
A.D. 1299
—1326.

and war. He was the father of Thaman, or Athman, whose Turkish name has been melted into the appellation of the caliph Othman; and if we describe that pastoral chief as a shepherd and a robber, we must separate from those characters all idea of ignominy and baseness. Othman possessed, and perhaps surpassed, the ordinary virtues of a soldier; and the circumstances of time and place were propitious to his independence and success. The Seljukian dynasty was no more; and the distance and decline of the Mogul khans soon enfranchised him from the control of a superior. He was situate on the verge of the Greek empire: the Koran sanctified his gazi, or holy war, against the infidels; and their political errors unlocked the passes of Mount Olympus, and invited him to descend into the plains of Bithynia. Till the reign of Palæologus, these passes had been vigilantly guarded by the militia of the country, who were repaid by their own safety and an exemption from taxes. The emperor abolished their privilege and assumed their office; but the tribute was rigorously collected, the custody of the passes was neglected, and the hardy mountaineers degenerated into a trembling crowd of peasants without spirit or discipline. It was on the twenty-seventh of July, in the year twelve hundred and ninety-nine of the Christian era, that Othman first invaded the territory of Nicomedia;<sup>40</sup> and the singular accuracy of the date seems to disclose some foresight of the rapid and destructive growth of the monster. The annals of the twenty-seven years of his reign would exhibit a repetition of the same incidents; and his hereditary troops were multiplied in each campaign by the accession of captives and volunteers. Instead of retreating to the hills, he maintained the most useful and defensible posts; fortified the towns and castles which he had first pillaged; and renounced the pastoral life for the baths and palaces of his infant capitals. But it was not till Othman was oppressed by age and infirmities, that he received the welcome news of the conquest of Prusa, which had been surrendered by famine or treachery to the arms of his son Othman. The glory of Othman is chiefly founded on that of his descendants; but the Turks have transcribed or composed a royal testament of his last counsels of justice and moderation.<sup>41</sup>

From the conquest of Prusa, we may date the true era of the Ottoman empire. The lives and possessions of the Christian subjects were redeemed by a tribute or ransom of thirty thousand crowns of gold ; and the city, by the labours of Orchan, assumed the aspect of a Mahometan capital ; Prusa was decorated with a mosch, a college, and an hospital, of royal foundation ; the Seljukian coin was changed for the name and impression of the new dynasty ; and the most skilful professors, of human and divine knowledge, attracted the Persian and Arabian students from the ancient schools of Oriental learning. The office of vizir was instituted for Aladin, the brother of Orchan ; and a different habit distinguished the citizens from the peasants, the Moslems from the infidels. All the troops of Othman had consisted of loose squadrons of Turkman cavalry ; who served without pay and fought without discipline ; but a regular body of infantry was first established and trained by the prudence of his son. A great number of volunteers was enrolled with a small stipend, but with the permission of living at home, unless they were summoned to the field ; their rude manners, and seditious temper, disposed Orchan to educate his young captives as his soldiers and those of the prophet ; but the Turkish peasants were still allowed to mount on horse back, and follow his standard, with the appellation and the hopes of freedomen. By these arts he formed an army of twenty-five thousand Moslems ; a train of battering engines was framed for the use of sieges ; and the first successful experiment was made on the cities of Nice and Nicomedia. He conquest

Orchan granted a safe-conduct to all who were desirous of departing with their families and effects; but the widows of the slain were given in marriage to the conquerors; and the sacrilegious plunder, the books, the vases, and the images, were sold or ransomed at Constantinople. The emperor Andronicus the Younger was vanquished and wounded by the son of Othman <sup>12</sup> he subdued the whole province or Kingdom of Bithynia, as far as the shores of the Bosphorus and Hellespont; and the Christians confessed the justice and clemency of a reign, which claimed the voluntary attachment of the Turks of Asia. Yet Orchan was 40 See Pachymer, l. x. c. 25, 26; l. xii. c. 33, 34, 36, and concerning the guard of the mountain, l. i. c. 3; Nicphorus Gregoras, l. vii. c. 1. and the 1st book of Leontius Chalcandyles, the dedicated in the year 1660 to Sultan Mustafa, and a valuable argument of the original history. In the life of the Kingless, Dr. Johnson praises Kunitas, the General History of the Turks to the present Year, London, 1675, as the best of histories, and says, "it is in the nature of those country men, for a little water, thirteen hundred flocks of geese and hares, in other words, thirteen hundred flocks of gold and silver, to furnish the historians with intricate and philosophical sentences, though he relates the battle and heroic flight of the younger Andronicus, the flight of the Turkish despotism, and the fall of the city of Constantinople, and the manner in which the Turkish empire was first raised up, and afterwards enlarged, and at length dissolved by the Turkish despotism." The Turkish despotism, as a new element of the Turkish despotism.

[illegible]

recommended another ally of his own nation ; not more sincere or zealous than himself, but more able to afford a prompt and powerful succour, by his situation along the Propontis and in the front of Constantinople. By the prospect

Marriage of Orchan with a Greek princess.
A. D. 1516.

Marriage of Orchan with a more advantageous treaty, the Turkish prince of Bithynia was A. D. 1516. detached from his engagements with Anne of Savoy; and the pride of Orchan dictated the most solemn protestations, that if he could obtain the daughter of Cantacuzene, he would invariably fulfil the duties of a subject and a son. Parental tenderness was silenced by the voice of ambition; the Greek clergy connived at the marriage of a Christian princess with a sectary of Mahomet; and the father of Theodora describes, with shameful satisfaction, the dishonour of the purple.<sup>49</sup> A body of Turkish cavalry attended the ambassadors, who disembarked from thirty vessels before his camp of Selybria. A stately pavilion was erected, in which the empress Irene passed the night with her daughters. In the morning, Theodora ascended a throne, which was surrounded with curtains of silk and gold: the troops were under arms; but the emperor alone was on horseback. At a signal the curtains were suddenly withdrawn, to disclose the bride, or the victim, encircled by kneeling eunuchs and hy-meneal torches: the sound of flutes and trumpets proclaimed the joyful event; and her pretended happiness was the theme of the nuptial song, which was chanted by such poets as the age could produce. Without the rites of the church, Theodora was delivered to her barbarous lord;
but it had been stipulated, that she should preserve her religion in the haram of Bursa; and her father celebrates her charity and devotion in this ambiguous situation. After his peaceful establishment on the throne of Constantinople, the Greek emperor visited his Turki ally, who with four sons, by various wives, expected him at Sentari, on the Asiatic shore. The two princes partook, with seeming cordiality, of the pleasures of the banquet and the chase; and Theodora was permitted to repass the Bos-phorus, and to enjoy some days in the society of her mother. But the friendship of Orchan was subservient to his religion and interest; and in the Genoese war he joined without a blush the enemies of Cantacuzene.

Establishment of the Ottomans in Europe.
A.D. 1253.

In the treaty with the empress Anne, the Ottoman prince had inserted a singular condition, that it should be lawful for him to sell his prisoners at Constantinople, or transport them into Asia. A naked crowd of Christians of both sexes and every age, of priests and monks, of matrons and virgins, was exposed in the public market; the whip was frequently used to quicken the charity of redemption; and the indigent Greeks deplored the fate of their brethren, who were led away to the worst evils of temporal and spiritual bondage.<sup>57</sup> Cantacuzene was reduced to subscribe the same terms; and their execution must have been still more pernicious to the empire: a body of ten thousand Turks had been detached to the assistance of the empress Anne; but the entire forces of Orchan were exerted in the service of his father. Yet these calamities were of a transient nature; as soon as the storm had passed away, the fugitives might return to their habitations; and at the conclusion of the civil and foreign wars, Europe was completely evacuated by the Moslems of Asia. It was in his last quarrel with his pupil that Cantacuzene inflicted the deep and deadly wound, which could never be healed by his successors, and which is poorly expiated by his theological dialogues against the prophet Mahomet. Ignorant of their own history, the modern Turks confound their first and their final passage of the Hellespont,<sup>58</sup> and describe the son of Orchan as a nocturnal robber, who, with eighty companions, explores by stratagem an hostile and unknown shore. Soliman, at the head of ten thousand horse, was transported in the vessels, and entertained as the friend, of the Greek emperor. In the civil wars of Romania, he performed some service and perpetrated more mischief; but the Chersonesus was insensibly filled with a Turkish colony; and the Byzantine court solicited in vain the restitution of the fortresses of Thrace. After some artful delays between the Ottoman prince and his son, their ransom was valued at sixty thousand crowns, and the first payment had been made, when an earthquake shook the walls and cities of the provinces; the dismantled places were occupied by the Turks; and Gallipoli, the key of the Hellespont, was rebuilt and repeopled by the policy of Soliman. The abdication of Cantacuzene dissolved the feeble bands of domestic alliance; and his last advice admonished his countrymen to decline a rash contest, and to compare their own weakness with the numbers and valour, the discipline and enthusiasm, of the Moslems. His prudent counsels were despised by the headstrong vanity of youth, and soon justified by the victories of the Ottomans. But as he practised in the field the exercise of the jerid, Soliman was killed by a fall from his horse; and the aged Orchan wept and expired on the tomb of his valiant son.

Death of Orchan and his son Soliman.

Death of Or-chan and his son Soliman.

But the Greeks had not time to rejoice in the death of their enemies; and the Turkish cimeter was wielded with the same spirit by Amorath the First, the son of Orchan, and the brother of Sohman. By the pale and fainting light of the Byzantine annals,<sup>2d</sup> we can discern, that he subdued without resistance the whole province of Romania or Thrace, from the Hellespont to Mount Hæmus, and the verge of the capital; and that Adrianople was

The reign and European conquests of Anurath I.
A. D. 1700-1789,
Sept.

49 See Cantacuzene, I, no. c. 9. Nicephorus Gregoras, who, for the light of Mount Thabor, brands the emperor with the names of tyrant and Herod, excuses, rather than blames, this Turkish marriage, and alleges the passion and power of Orhan, οὐρανός, αἰνέουσι τοὺς αὐτοὺς ὅν τι Περίουτος [Turkish] ἡγεμονία Σελτζούκ (I, v. 5). He afterwards celebrates his kingdom and armies. See his reign in Cantacuz. v 24-50.

40) The most lively and concise picture of this captivity may be found in the history of Ducak (c. 8), who fairly describes what Caracene confuses with a guilty blush:

51 In the passage, and the first conquests in Europe, Cantemir (p. 27, A.) gives a marvellous detail of Turkish games, nor can I not better satisfied with the consideration p. 11, A. They forget to consult the manuscript's record, the 17th book of Cantemir's. I likewise regret the last books, which are still manuscript, of Nicéphore Grecus.

12. After the conclusion of art, nature and Gregor's, there followed a dark interval of mutual recriminations. George Bernard Shaw, Marcel Proust, and Thomas Mann, all three wrote after the taking of Constantinople.

chosen for the royal seat of his government and religion in Europe. Constantinople, whose decline is almost coeval with her foundation, had often, in the lapse of a thousand years, been assaulted by the barbarians of the East and West; but never till this fatal hour had the Greeks been surrounded, both in Asia and Europe, by the arms of the same hostile monarchy. Yet the prudence or generosity of Amurath postponed for a while this easy conquest; and his pride was satisfied with the frequent and humble attendance of the emperor John Palæologus and his four sons, who followed at his summons the court and camp of the Ottoman prince. He marched against the Slavonian nations between the Danube and the Adriatic, the Bulgarians, Servians, Bosnians, and Albanians; and these warlike tribes, who had so often insulted the majesty of the empire, were repeatedly broken by his destructive inroads. Their countries did not abound either in gold or silver; nor were their rustic hamlets and townships enriched by commerce, or decorated by the arts of luxury. But the natives of the soil have been distinguished in every age by their hardness of mind and body; and they were converted by a prudent institution into the firmest and most faithful supporters of the Ottoman greatness.<sup>53</sup> The vizir of Amurath reminded his sovereign that, according to the Mahometan law, he was entitled to a fifth part of the spoil and captives; and that the duty might easily be levied, if vigilant officers were stationed at Gallipoli, to watch the passage, and to select for his use the stoutest and most beautiful of the Christian youth. The advice was followed; the edict was proclaimed; many thousands of the European captives were educated in religion and arms; and the new militia was consecrated and named by a celebrated dervish. Standing in the front of their ranks, he stretched the sleeve of his gown over the head of the foremost soldier, and his blessing was delivered in these words. "Let them be countrymen; and in the battle of Cossova, the league and independence of the Slavonian tribes was finally crushed. As the conqueror walked over the field, he observed that the greatest part of the slain consisted of beardless youths; and listened to the flattering reply of his vizir, that age and wisdom would have taught them not to oppose his irresistible arms. But the sword of his Janizaries could not defend him from the dagger of despair; a Servian soldier started from the crowd of dead bodies, and Amurath was pierced in the belly with a mortal wound. The grandson of Othman was mild in his temper, modest in his apparel, and a lover of learning and virtue: but the Moslems were scandalised at his absence from public worship; and he was corrected by the firmness of the mufti, who dared to reject his testimony in a civil cause: a mixture of servitude and freedom not unfrequent in Oriental history.<sup>55</sup>

<sup>The Janizaries.</sup> "called Janizaries (Yengi chern, or "new soldiers"); may their countenance be ever bright! their hand victorious! "their sword keen! may their spear always "hang over the heads of their enemies" and "where-soever they go, may they return with a "white face!"<sup>54</sup> Such was the origin of these haughty troops, the terror of the nations, and sometimes of the sultans themselves. Their valour has declined, their discipline is relaxed, and their tumultuary array is incapable of contending with the order and weapons of modern tactics; but at the time of their institution, they possessed a decisive superiority in war; since a regular body of infantry, in constant exercise and pay, was not maintained by any of the princes of Christendom. The Janizaries fought with the zeal of proselytes against their idolatrous

The character of Bajazet, the son and successor of Amurath, is strongly expressed in his surname <sup>The reign of Bajazet I. A.D. 1389—1403. March 9.</sup> Ildeirin, or the Lightning; and he might glory in an epithet, which was drawn from the fiery energy of his soul and the rapidity of his destructive march. In the fourteen years of his reign,<sup>56</sup> he incessantly moved at the head of his armies, from Boursa to Adrianople, from the Danube to the Euphrates; and, though he strenuously laboured for the propagation of the law, he invaded, with impartial ambition, the Christian and Mahometan princes of Europe and Asia. From Angora to Amasia <sup>His conquests from the Euphrates to the Danube.</sup> and Erzeroum, the northern regions of Anatolia were reduced to his obedience: he stripped of their hereditary possessions, his brother emirs of Ghermian and Caramania, of Aidin and Saraklian; and after the conquest of Iconium the ancient kingdom of the Seljukians again revived in the Ottoman dynasty. Nor were the conquests of Bajazet less rapid or important in Europe. No sooner had he imposed a regular form of servitude on the Servians and Bulgarians, than he passed the Danube to seek new enemies and new subjects in the heart of Moldavia.<sup>57</sup> Whatever yet adhered to the Greek empire in Thrace, Macedonia, and Thessaly, acknowledged a Turkish master: an obsequious bishop led him through the gates of Thermopylae into Greece; and we may observe, as a singular fact, that the widow of a Spanish chief, who possessed the ancient seat of the oracle of Delphi, deserved his favour by the sacrifice of a beauteous daughter. The Turkish communication between Europe and Asia had been dangerous and doubtful, till he stationed at Gallipoli a fleet of galleys, to command the Hellespont and intercept the Latin succours of Constantinople. While the monarch indulged his passions in a boundless range of injustice and cruelty, he imposed on his solas it were, between two attendants, an ambassador's arms, when he is erim Bayazet, is contained in Hydontides, and the Amir is lightning, is an example, that the conquerors and poets of every age have felt the truth of a saying which denotes the sublime from the principle of terror.

<sup>57</sup> Cantemir, who celebrates the victories of Bajazet at Nicopolis, at the Balkan, &c. &c. has also mentioned the conquest of the principality of Moldavia, which has been long promised, and is still unpublished.

<sup>53</sup> See Cantemir, p. 57—41. with his own large and curious annotations.

<sup>54</sup> White and black face are common and proverbial expressions of

the

the

riers the most rigid laws of modesty and abstinence; and the harvest was peaceably reaped and sold within the precincts of his camp. Provoked by the loose and corrupt administration of justice, he collected in a house the judges and lawyers of his dominions, who expected that in a few moments the fire would be kindled to reduce them to ashes. His ministers trembled in silence. But an Ethiopian bulloon presumed to insinuate the true cause of the evil; and future venality was left without excuse, by annexing an adequate salary to the office of cadi.<sup>55</sup> The humble title of emir was no longer suitable to the Ottoman greatness; and Bajazet condescended to accept a patent of sultan from the caliphs who served in Egypt under the yoke of the Mamalukes.<sup>56</sup> A last and frivolous homage that was yielded by force to opinion; by the Turkish conquerors to the house of Abbas and the successors of the Arabian prophet. The ambition of the sultan was inflamed by the obligation of deserving this august title, and he turned his arms against the kingdom of Hungary, the perpetual theatre of the Turkish victories and defeats. Sigismund, the Hungarian king, was the son and brother of the emperors of the West: his cause was that of Europe and the church; and, on the report of his danger, the bravest knights of France and Germany were eager to march under his standard and that of the cross. In the battle of Nicopolis, Bajazet defeated a confederate army of an hundred thousand Christians, who had proudly boasted, that if the sky should fall, they could uphold it on their lances. The far greater part were slain or driven into the Danube; and Sigismund, escaping to Constantinople by the river and the Black Sea, returned after a long circuit to his exalted kingdom.<sup>57</sup> In the pride of victory Bajazet threatened that he would besiege Buda; that he would subdue the adjacent countries of Germany and Italy; and that he would feed his horse with a bushel of oats on the altar of St. Peter at Rome. His progress was checked, not by the miraculous interposition of the apostle, not by a crusade of the Christian powers, but by a long and painful fit of the gout. The disorders of the moral, are sometimes corrected by those of the physical, world; and an acrimonious humour falling on a single fibre of one man, may prevent or suspend the misery of nations.

Such is the general idea of the Hungarian war; but the disastrous adventure of the French has procured us some numerials which illustrate the victory and character of Bajazet.<sup>61</sup>

<sup>55</sup> Le Beauve. Annal. Turc. p. 718, 719. The venality of the cadis, his long term of office, and the ease, and the trust the observations of our travellers, as may consult the feeling of the Turks themselves (D'Hierbelot, Biblioth. orientale, p. 217, 217, 220, 220).

<sup>56</sup> The fact, which is attested, by the Arabic history of Ben Schoua, de l'Etat, de l'Empire, et de l'Empire (p. 11, 11).

<sup>57</sup> He was born in 1392, and died in 1413. He was invited to Hungary to compose an eloquent history of that kingdom. Yet, if it is to be exact and useful, I should give the preference to some homely chronicler of the time and country.

<sup>61</sup> I should not complain of the labour of this work, if my materials were always derived from such books as the Chronique de France (vol. iv. p. 67, 68, 72, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000).

The duke of Burgundy, sovereign of Flanders, and uncle of Charles the Sixth, yielded to the ardour of his son, John count of Nevers; and the fearless youth was accompanied by four princes, his cousins, and those of the French monarch. Their inexperience was guided by the Sire de Coucy, one of the best and oldest captains of Christendom;<sup>62</sup> but the constable, admiral, and marshal of France<sup>63</sup> commanded an army which did not exceed the number of a thousand knights and squires. These splendid names were the source of presumption and the bane of discipline. So many might aspire to command, that none were willing to obey; their national spirit despised both their enemies and their allies; and in the persuasion that Bajazet would fly, or must fall, they began to compute how soon they should visit Constantinople and deliver the holy sepulchre. When their scouts announced the approach of the Turks, the gay and thoughtless youths were at table, already heated with wine; they instantly clasped their armour, mounted their horses, rode full speed to the vanguard, and resented as an affront the advice of Sigismund, which would have deprived them of the right and honour of the foremost attack. The battle of Nicopolis would not have been lost, if the French would have obeyed the prudence of the Hungarians: but it might have been gloriously won, had the Hungarians imitated the valour of the French. They dispersed the first line, consisting of the troops of Asia, forced a rampart of stakes, which had been planted against the cavalry; broke, after a bloody conflict, the Janizaries themselves; and were at length overwhelmed by the numerous squadrons that issued from the woods, and charged on all sides this handful of intrepid warriors. In the speed and secrecy of his march, in the order and evolutions of the battle, his enemies felt and admired the military talents of Bajazet. They accuse his cruelty in the use of victory. After reserving the count of Nevers, and four and twenty lords, whose birth and riches were attested by his Latin interpreters, the remainder of the French captives, who had survived the slaughter of the day, were led before his throne; and, as they refused to abjure their faith, were successively beheaded in his presence. The sultan was exasperated by the loss of his bravest Janizaries; and if it be true, that, on the eve of the engagement, the French had massacred their Turkish prisoners,<sup>64</sup> they might impute to themselves the consequences of a just retaliation. A knight, whose life had been spared, was permitted to return to Paris, that he might relate the deplorable tale, and solicit the ransom of the noble captives. In they are dry and desiccated, if compared with the pleasant humidity of France.

<sup>62</sup> An accurate Memoir on the Life of Enguerrand VII. Sire de Coucy, has been given by the Baron de Zurlauben. Hist. de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xvi. His rank and possessions were equally considerable in France and England. And, in 1375, he led an army of adventures into Switzerland, to recover a large patrimony which he claimed in right of his grandmother, the daughter of the emperor Albert I. of Austria (Münner, Voyage dans la Suisse Occidentale, tom. i. p. 118, 119).

<sup>63</sup> That military office, so respectable at present, was still more contemptible when it was created between two provinces (Dumol, Hist. de la Monarchie Française, tom. i. p. 11). One of these, the marshal of France, was the title of Bonaparte, who, after he had defeated the army of Austria, and secured the coast of Asia, and died on the field of Austerlitz.

<sup>64</sup> The French Count de la Roche de Verre quotes an Hist. Anecdote of St. Denis, l. xiv. c. 10, li. Œuvre de Maistre, tom. i. p. 210.

the mean while, the count of Nevers, with the princes and barons of France, were dragged along in the marches of the Turkish camp, exposed as a grateful trophy to the Moslems of Europe and Asia, and strictly confined at Boursa, as often as Bajazet resided in his capital. The sultan was pressed each day to expiate with their blood the blood of his martyrs; but he had pronounced that they should live, and either for mercy or destruction his word was irrevocable. He was assured of their value and importance by the return of the messenger, and the gifts and intercessions of the kings of France and of Cyprus. Lusignan presented him with a gold salt-cellar of curious workmanship, and of the price of ten thousand ducats; and Charles the Sixth despatched by the way of Hungary a cast of Norwegian hawks, and six horse-loads of scarlet cloth, of fine linen of Rheims, and of Arras tapestry, representing the battles of the great Alexander. After much delay, the effect of distance rather than of art, Bajazet agreed to accept a ransom of two hundred thousand ducats for the count of Nevers and the surviving princes and barons: the marshal Boucicault, a famous warrior, was of the number of the fortunate; but the admiral of France had been slain in the battle; and the constable, with the Sire de Coucy, died in the prison of Boursa. This heavy demand, which was doubled by incidental costs, fell chiefly on the duke of Burgundy, or rather on his Flemish subjects, who were bound by the feudal laws to contribute for the knighthood and captivity of the eldest son of their lord. For the faithful discharge of the debt, some merchants of Genoa gave security to the amount of five times the sum; a lesson to those warlike times, that commerce and credit are the links of the society of nations. It had been stipulated in the treaty, that the French captives should swear never to bear arms against the person of their conqueror; but the ungenerous restraint was abolished by Bajazet himself. "I despise," said he to the heir of Burgundy, "thy oaths and thy arms. Thou art young, and mayest be ambitious of effacing the disgrace or misfortune of thy first chivalry. Assemble thy powers, proclaim thy design, and be assured that Bajazet will rejoice to meet thee a second time in a field of battle." Before their departure, they were indulged in the freedom and hospitality of the court of Boursa. The French princes admired the magnificence of the Ottoman, whose hunting and hawking equipage was composed of seven thousand huntsmen and seven thousand falconers.<sup>65</sup> In their presence, and at his command, the belly of one of his chamberlains was cut open, on a complaint against him for drinking the goat's milk of a poor woman. The strangers were astonished by this act of justice; but it was the justice of a sultan who disdains to balance the weight of evidence, or to measure the degrees of guilt.

After his enfranchisement from an oppressive guardian, John Palæologus remained thirty-six years, the helpless, and, as it should seem, the careless spectator of the public ruin.<sup>66</sup> Love, or rather lust, was his only vigorous passion; and in the embraces of the wives and virgins of the city, the Turkish slave forgot the dishonour of the emperor of the Romans. Andronicus, his eldest son, had formed, at Adrianople, an intimate and guilty friendship with Sauzes, the son of Amurath; and the two youths conspired against the authority and lives of their parents. The presence of Amurath in Europe soon discovered and dissipated their rash counsels; and, after depriving Sauzes of his sight, the Ottoman threatened his vassal with the treatment of an accomplice and an enemy, unless he inflicted a similar punishment on his own son. Palæologus trembled and obeyed; and a cruel precaution involved in the same sentence the childhood and innocence of John the son of the criminal. But the operation was so mildly, or so unskillfully, performed, that the one retained the sight of an eye, and the other was afflicted only with the infirmity of squinting. Thus excluded from the succession, the two princes were confined in the tower of Anema; and the piety of Manuel, the second son of the reigning monarch, was rewarded with the gift of the Imperial crown. But at the end of two years, the turbulence of the Latins and the levity of the Greeks produced a revolution; and the two emperors were buried in the tower from whence the two prisoners were exalted to the throne. Another period of two years afforded Palæologus and Manuel the means of escape: it was contrived by the magic, or subtlety, of a monk, who was alternately named the angel or the devil; they fled to Scutari; their adherents armed in their cause; and the two Byzantine factions displayed the ambition and animosity with which Cesar and Pompey had disputed the empire of the world. The Roman world was now contracted to a corner of Thrace, between the Propontis and the Black Sea, about fifty miles in length and thirty in breadth; a space of ground not more extensive than the lesser principalities of Germany or Italy, if the remains of Constantinople had not still represented the wealth and populousness of a kingdom. To restore the public peace, it was found necessary to divide this fragment of the empire; and while Palæologus and Manuel were left in possession of the capital, almost all that lay without the walls was ceded to the blind princes, who fixed their residence at Rhodosto and Selybria. In the tranquil slumber of royalty, the passions of John Palæologus survived his reason and his strength; he deprived his favourite and heir of a blooming princess of Trebizond; and while the feeble emperor laboured to consummate his nuptials, Manuel, with an hundred of the noblest Greeks,

The emperor John Palæologus
A.D. 1355,
Jan. 5—
A.D. 1391.

Discord of the Greeks.

<sup>65</sup> Sherrefeldin Ali (Hist. de Timur Bec, l. v. c. 13.) allows Bajazet a part in the murder of his son. A part in the murder of his son.

as African lions (idem, l. vi. c. 15.). Bajazet was particularly fond of

from the red in

was sent on a peremptory summons to the Ottoman porte. They served with honour in the wars of Bajazet; but a plan of fortifying Constantinople excited his jealousy: he threatened their lives; the new works were instantly demolished; and we shall bestow a praise, perhaps above the merit of Palæologus, if we impute this last humiliation as the cause of his death.

The emperor Manuel A. D. 1201 1125, event was communicated to Manuel, who escaped with speed and secrecy from the palace of Boursa to the Byzantine throne. Bajazet affected a proud indifference at the loss of this valuable pledge; and while he pursued his conquests in Europe and Asia, left the emperor to struggle with his blind cousin John of Selybria, who, in eight years of civil war, asserted his right of primogeniture. At length the ambition of the victorious sultan pointed to the conquest of Constantinople; but he listened to the advice of his vizir, who represented, that such an enterprise might unite the powers of Christendom in a second and more formidable crusade. His epistle to the emperor was conceived in these words: "By the divine clemency, our invincible cimeter has reduced to our obedience almost all Asia, with many and large countries in Europe, excepting only the city of Constantinople; for beyond the walls thou hast nothing left. Resign that city, stipulate thy reward; or tremble, for thyself and thy unhappy people, at the consequences of a rash refusal." But his ambassadors were instructed to soften their tone, and to propose a treaty, which was subscribed with submission and gratitude. A truce of ten years was purchased by an annual tribute of thirty thousand crowns of gold: the Greeks deplored the public toleration of the law of Mahomet, and Bajazet enjoyed the glory of establishing a Turkish cadli, and founding a royal mosque in the metropolis of the Eastern church.<sup>77</sup> Yet this truce was soon violated by the restless sultan: in the cause of the prince of Selybria, the lawful emperor, an army of Ottomans again threatened Constantinople; and the distress of Manuel implored the protection of the king of France. His plaintive embassy obtained much pity and some relief; and the conduct of the succour was intrusted to the marshal Boucicault;<sup>78</sup> whose religious chivalry was inflamed by the desire of revenging his captivity on the infidels. He sailed with four ships of war, from Aigues-mortes to the Hellespont; forced the passage, which was guarded by seventeen Turkish galleys; landed at Constantinople a supply of six hundred men at arms and sixteen hundred archers; and reviewed them in the adjacent plain, without condescending to number or array the multitude of Greeks. By his presence, the blockade was raised both by sea and land ; the flying squadrons of Bajazet were driven to a more respectful distance ; and several castles in Europe and Asia were stormed by the emperor and the marshal, who fought with equal valour by each other's side. But the Ottomans soon returned with an increase of numbers ; and the intrepid Boucicault, after a year's struggle, resolved to evacuate a country, which could no longer afford either pay or provisions for his soldiers. The marshal offered to conduct Manuel to the French court, where he might solicit in person a supply of men and money ; and advised in the mean while, that, to extinguish all domestic discord, he should leave his blind competitor on the throne. The proposal was embraced the prince of Selybria was introduced to the capital ; and such was the public misery, that the lot of the exile seemed more fortunate than that of the sovereign. Instead of applauding the success of his vassal, the Turkish sultan claimed the city as his own ; and on the refusal of the emperor John, Constantinople was more closely pressed by the calamities of war and famine. Against such an enemy, prayers and resistance were alike unavailing ; and the savage would have devoured his prey, if, in the fatal moment, he had not been overthrown by another savage stronger than himself. By the victory of Timour or Tamerlane, the fall of Constantinople was delayed about fifty years ; and this important, though accidental, service may justly introduce the life and character of the Mogul conqueror.

CHAP. LXV.

Elevation of Timour, or Tamerlane, to the Throne of Samarcand. — His Conquests in Persia, Georgia, Tartary, Russia, India, Syria, and Anatolia. — His Turkish War. — Defeat and Captivity of Bajazet. — Death of Timour. — Civil War of the Sons of Bajazet. — Restoration of the Turkish Monarchy by Mahomet the First. — Siege of Constantinople by Amurath the Second.

THE conquest and monarchy of the world was the first object of the ambition of TIMOUR. To live in the memory and esteem of future ages, was the second wish of his magnanimous spirit. All the civil and military transactions of his reign were diligently recorded in the journals of his secretaries.<sup>1</sup> The authentic narrative was revised by the persons best informed of each particular transaction; and it is believed in the empire and family of Timour, that the monarch himself composed the commentaries<sup>2</sup> of his life, and the institutions<sup>3</sup> of his government.<sup>4</sup> But these

HISTORIES OF TIMOTHY, OR TURNERFAME.

67 Castemur, p. 50-53. Of the Greeks, Ducas alone (c. 17, 15) acknowledges the Turkish cahıs at Constantinople. Yet even Ducas dissembles the mosque

68 Mémoires du bon Messire Jean le Maingre, dit Boucicaut, Mar-
chal de France, partie I<sup>re</sup>, c. 70. 71

1 These journals were communicated to Shereefuddin, or Cherefidin Alt, a native of Yezdi, who composed in the Persian language a history of Timour P. . . .

2 These Commentaries are written in French, but Mr. White gives some hope that they may be imported and translated by his friend Minor Dace, who is resident in the East of this "empire" and is thus in a position of an interesting and experienced person.

7 I am ignorant whether the original positioner, in the Turk Man language, be still extant. I therefore cannot write a translation, and most valuable index was put in the hands of the the six other members of Major F. A. "Red" Weaver's patrol, the post-war. He was the first to be transported to the United States by French POWs (NVA) and Major Weaver was the first to be added to the list of "American" POWs. He was the first to be added to the list of "American" POWs. He was the first to be added to the list of "American" POWs.

the footsteps of man; and their daily subsistence was often trusted to the fortune of the chace. At length the armies encountered each other; but the treachery of the standard-bearer, who, in the heat of action, reversed the Imperial standard of Kipzak, determined the victory of the Zagatais; and Toctamish (I speak the language of the Institutions) gave the tribe of Touthi to the wind of desolation.<sup>18</sup> He fled to the Christian duke of Lithuania; again returned to the banks of the Volga; and, after fifteen battles with a domestic rival, at last perished in the wilds of Siberia. The pursuit of a flying enemy carried Timour into the tributary provinces of Russia: a duke of the reigning family was made prisoner amidst the ruins of his capital; and Yeletz, by the pride and ignorance of the Orientals, might easily be confounded with the genuine metropolis of the nation. Moscow trembled at the approach of the Tartar, and the resistance would have been feeble, since the hopes of the Russians were placed in a miraculous image of the Virgin, to whose protection they ascribed the casual and voluntary retreat of the conqueror. Ambition and prudence recalled him to the south, the desolate country was exhausted, and the Mogul soldiers were enriched with an immense spoil of precious furs, of linen of Antioch,<sup>19</sup> and of ingots of gold and silver.<sup>20</sup> On the banks of the Don, or Tanais, he received an humble deputation from the consuls and merchants of Egypt,<sup>21</sup> Venice, Genoa, Catalonia, and, Biscay, who occupied the commerce and city of Tana, or Azoph, at the mouth of the river. They offered their gifts, admired his magnificence, and trusted his royal word. But the peaceful visit of an emir, who explored the state of the magazines and harbour, was speedily followed by the destructive presence of the Tartars. The city was reduced to ashes; the Moslems were pillaged and dismissed; but all the Christians, who had not fled to their ships, were condemned either to death or slavery.<sup>22</sup> Revenge prompted him to burn the cities of Serai and Astrachan, the monuments of rising civilisation; and his vanity proclaimed, that he had penetrated to the region of perpetual daylight, a strange phenomenon, which authorised his Mahometan doctors to dispense with the obligation of evening prayer.<sup>23</sup>

III. Of Hindostan. A. D. 1398, 1399. III. When Timour first proposed to his princes and emirs the invasion of India or Hindostan,<sup>24</sup> he was answered by a murmur of discontent: "The rivers! and the mountains and deserts! and the soldiers clad in armour! and the elephants,

"destroyers of men!" But the displeasure of the emperor was more dreadful than all these terrors; and his superior reason was convinced, that an enterprise of such tremendous aspect was safe and easy in the execution. He was informed by his spies of the weakness and anarchy of Hindostan: the soubahs of the provinces had erected the standard of rebellion; and the perpetual infancy of sultan Mahmoud was despised even in the haram of Delhi. The Mogul army moved in three great divisions; and Timour observes with pleasure, that the ninety-two squadrons of a thousand horse most fortunately corresponded with the ninety-two names or epithets of the prophet Mahomet.

Between the Jihoon and the Indus they crossed one of the ridges of mountains, which are styled by the Arabian geographers The stony girdles of the earth. The highland robbers were subdued or extirpated; but great numbers of men and horses perished in the snow; the emperor himself was let down a precipice on a portable scaffold, the ropes were one hundred and fifty cubits in length; and, before he could reach the bottom, this dangerous operation was five times repeated. Timour crossed the Indus at the ordinary passage of Attok; and successively traversed, in the footsteps of Alexander, the Punjab, or five rivers,<sup>25</sup> that fall into the master-stream. From Attok to Delhi, the high road measures no more than six hundred miles; but the two conquerors deviated to the south-east; and the motive of Timour was to join his grandson, who had achieved by his command the conquest of Moultan. On the eastern bank of the Hyphasis, on the edge of the desert, the Macedonian hero halted and wept: the Mogul entered the desert, reduced the fortress of Batnir, and stood in arms before the gates of Delhi, a great and flourishing city, which had subsisted three centuries under the dominion of the Mahometan kings. The siege, more especially of the castle, might have been a work of time; but he tempted, by the appearance of weakness, the sultan Mahmoud and his vizir to descend into the plain, with ten thousand cuirassiers, forty thousand of his foot-guards, and one hundred and twenty elephants, whose tusks are said to have been armed with sharp and poisoned daggers. Against these monsters, or rather against the imagination of his troops, he condescended to use some extraordinary precautions of fire and a ditch, of iron spikes and a rampart of bucklers; but the event taught the Moguls to smile at their own fears; and, as soon as these unwieldy animals were routed, the inferior species <sup>18</sup> Institutions of Timour, p. 115, 125. Mr White, the editor, bestows some amplification on the superfluous account of Sherfeddin, i. m. c. 15, 14, who was ignorant of the designs of Timour, and the true springs of action.

<sup>19</sup> The furs of Russia are more credit than the ingots. But the linen of Antioch has never been famous, and Antioch was in ruins. I suspect that it was some manufacture of Europe, which the Hæmæ merchants had imported by the way of Novogorod.

<sup>20</sup> M. l'evêque Hist. de Russie, tom. ii. p. 217. Vie de Timour, p. 61-67, but to the French version of the Institutions has corrected the error of Sherfeddin, and marked the true limit of Timour's conquests. His arguments are superfluous, and a simple appeal to the Russian annals is sufficient to prove that Moscovy, who six years before had been taken by Toctamish, escaped the arms of a more formidable invader.

<sup>21</sup> The consuls of Venice, as mentioned in Barbaro's letters, were then resident at Kaniuso, or Kaniuso.

<sup>22</sup> The city of Azoph is described by Sherfeddin (i. m. c. 55) and much more particularly by the author of an Italian chronicle (Andreas de Redibus de Quero, in Chron. Tarvisiano, in Muratori, Script. Rerum Italicarum, tom. vi. p. 802, 803.) He had conversed with the Mirans, two Timour brothers, one of whom had been sent a deputy to the camp of Timour, and the other had lost at Azoph three sons and 19,000 lieutenants.

<sup>23</sup> Sherfeddin only says, l. m. c. 15, that the rays of the setting, and those of the rising, sun, were scarcely separated by any interval; a problem which may be solved in the latitude of Moscow (the 56th degree), with the aid of the aurora borealis, and a long summer twilight. But a day of forty days, Khoudieramid Dierbollet (p. 380) would rigorously confine us within the polar circle.

<sup>24</sup> For the Indian war, see the Institutions, p. 165-179, the fourth book of Sherfeddin, and the history of Ferishta in Dow, vol. ii. p. 126, which throws a general light on the affairs of Hindostan.

<sup>25</sup> The rivers of the Punjab, the five eastern branches of the Indus, have been laid down for the first time with truth and accuracy in Major Rennel's incomparable map of Hindostan. In his Critical Memoir he illustrates with judgment and learning the marches of Alexander and Timour.

of the secrecy of the haram is an unpardonable offence among the Turkish nations;<sup>31</sup> and the political quarrel of the two monarchs was embittered by private and personal resentment. Yet in his first expedition, Timour was satisfied with the siege and destruction of Siwas or Sebaste, a strong city on the borders of Anatolia; and he revenged the indiscretion of the Ottoman, on a garrison of four thousand Armenians, who were buried alive for the brave and faithful discharge of their duty. As a Musilman he seemed to respect the pious occupation of Bajazet, who was still engaged in the blockade of Constantinople: and after this salutary lesson, the Mogul conqueror checked his pursuit, and turned aside to the invasion of Syria and Egypt. In these transactions, the Ottoman prince, by the Orientals, and even by Timour, is styled the Kaiser of Roum, the Caesar of the Romans: a title which, by a small anticipation, might be given to a monarch who possessed the provinces, and threatened the city, of the successors of Constantine.<sup>32</sup>

The military republic of the Mamalukes still reigned in Egypt and Syria; but the dynasty of the Turks was overthrown by that of the Circassians;<sup>33</sup> and their favourite Barkok, from a slave and a prisoner, was raised and restored to the throne. In the midst of rebellion and discord, he braved the menaces, corresponded with the enemies, and detained the ambassadors, of the Mogul, who patiently expected his decease, to revenge the crimes of the father on the feeble reign of his son Farage. The Syrian emirs<sup>34</sup> were assembled at Aleppo to repel the invasion: they confided in the fame and discipline of the Mamalukes, in the temper of their swords and lances of the purest steel of Damascus, in the strength of their walled cities, and in the populousness of sixty thousand villages; and instead of sustaining a siege, they threw open their gates, and arrayed their forces in the plain. But these forces were not cemented by virtue and union; and some powerful emirs had been seduced to desert or betray their more loyal companions. Timour's front was covered with a line of Indian elephants, whose turlets were filled with archers and Greek fire: the rapid evolutions of his cavalry completed the dismay and disorder; the Syrian crowds fell back on each other; many thousands were stifled or slaughtered in the entrance of the great street; the Moguls entered with the fugitives; and, after a short defence, the citadel, the impregnable citadel of Aleppo, was surrendered by cowardice or treachery. Among the suppliants and captives, Timour distinguished the doctors of the law, whom he invited to the dangerous honour of a personal conference.<sup>35</sup> — The Mogul prince was a zealous Musulman; but his Persian schools had taught him to revere the memory of Ali and Hosein; and he had imbibed a deep prejudice against the Syrians, as the enemies of the son of the daughter of the apostle of God. To these doctors he proposed a captious question, which the casuists of Bochara, Samarcand, and Herat, were incapable of resolving. "Who are the true martyrs, of those who are slain on my side, or on that of my enemies?" But he was silenced, or satisfied, by the dexterity of one of the cadhis of Aleppo, who replied in the words of Mahomet himself, that the motive, not the ensign, constitutes the martyr; and that the Moslems of either party, who fight only for the glory of God, may deserve that sacred appellation. The true succession of the caliphs was a controversy of a still more delicate nature, and the frankness of a doctor, too honest for his situation, provoked the emperor to exclaim, "Ye are as false as those of Damascus: Moawiyah was an usurper, Yezid a tyrant, and Ali alone is the lawful successor of the prophet." A prudent explanation restored his tranquillity; and he passed to a more familiar topic of conversation. "What is your age?" said he to the cadhi. "Fifty years." — "It would be the age of my eldest son: you see me here (continued Timour) a poor, lame, decrepit mortal." Yet by my arm has the Almighty been pleased to subdue the kingdoms of Iran, Touran, and the Indies. I am not a man of blood; and God is my witness, that in all my wars I have never been the aggressor, and that my enemies have always been the authors of their own calamity." During this peaceful conversation, the streets of Aleppo streamed with blood, and re-echoed with the cries of mothers and children, with the shrieks of violated virgins. The rich plunder that was abandoned to his soldiers might stimulate their avarice; but their cruelty was enforced by the peremptory command of producing an adequate number of heads, which, according to his custom, were curiously piled in columns and pyramids; the Moguls celebrated the feast of victory, while the surviving Moslems passed the night in tears and in chains. I shall not dwell on the march of the destroyer from Aleppo to Damascus, where he was rudely encountered, and almost overthrown, by the armies of Egypt. A retrograde motion was imputed to his distress and despair: one of his nephews deserted to the enemy; and Syria rejoiced in the tale of his defeat, when the sultan was driven by the revolt of the Mamalukes to escape with precipitation and shame to his palace of Cairo. Abandoned by their prince, the inhabitants of Damascus still defended their walls; and Timour consented to raise the siege, if they would adorn his retreat with a gift or ransom; each article of nine pieces. But no sooner had

Sack of Aleppo,
A. D. 1400,
Nov. 11.

<sup>31</sup> The common delicacy of the Orientals, in never peering of their eyes at the women in company.

<sup>32</sup> I have been led by the cadhi and his aman to have been coined five years afterwards (D'Hérichy, p. 724).

<sup>33</sup> See the reign of Barkok in the Pharmazie, by M. de Guignes (tom. i. lxxxv.), who, from the Chah-nama of Abolghasani, Ferishta, and Antaki, has added some facts to our common stock of materials.

<sup>34</sup> For these recent and domestic transactions, Arabshah, though a partian, is a credit witness: tom. i. c. 64, 68, tom. ii. c. 1, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100.

he introduced himself into the city, under colour of a truce, than he perfidiously violated the treaty; imposed a contribution of ten millions of gold; and animated his troops to chastise the posterity of those Syrians who had executed, or approved, the murder of the grandson of Mahomet. A family which had given honourable burial to the head of Hosein, and a colony of artificers, whom he sent to labour at Samarcand, were alone reserved in the general massacre; and, after a period of seven centuries, Damascus was reduced to ashes, because a Tartar was moved by religious zeal to avenge the blood of an Arab. The losses and fatigues of the campaign obliged Timour to renounce the conquest of Palestine and Egypt; but in his return to the Euphrates, he delivered Aleppo to the flames; and justified his pious motive by the pardon and reward of two thousand sectaries of Ali, who were desirous to visit the tomb of his son. I have expatiated on the personal anecdotes which mark the character of the Mogul hero; but I shall briefly mention, that he erected on the ruins of Bagdad a pyramid of ninety thousand heads; again visited Georgia; encamped on the banks of the Araxes; and proclaimed his resolution of marching against the Ottoman emperor. Conscious of the importance of the war, he collected his forces from every province; eight hundred thousand men were enrolled on his military list;<sup>37</sup> but the splendid commands of five, and ten, thousand horse, may be rather expressive of the rank and pension of the chiefs, than of the genuine number of effective soldiers.<sup>38</sup> In the pillage of Syria, the Moguls had acquired immense riches; but the delivery of their pay and arrears for seven years, more firmly attached them to the Imperial standard.

During this diversion of the Mogul arms, Bajazet had two years to collect his forces for a more serious encounter. They consisted of four hundred thousand horse and foot,<sup>39</sup> whose merit and fidelity were of an unequal complexion. We may discriminate the Janizaries, who have been gradually raised to an establishment of forty thousand men; a national cavalry, the Spahis of modern times; twenty thousand cuirassiers of Europe, clad in black and impenetrable armour; the troops of Anatolia, whose princes had taken refuge in the camp of Timour; and a colony of Tartars, whom he had driven from Kipzak, and to whom Bajazet had assigned a settlement in the plains of Adrianople. The fearless confidence of the sultan urged him to meet his antagonist; and, as if he had chosen that spot for revenge, he displayed his banners near the ruins of the unfortunate Suvas. In the mean while, Timour moved from the Araxes through the countries of Armenia and Anatolia; his boldness was secured by the wisest precautions; his speed was guided by order and discipline; and the woods, the mountains, and the rivers, were diligently explored by the flying squadrons, who marked his road and preceded his standard. Firm in his plan of fighting in the heart of the Ottoman kingdom, he avoided their camp; dexterously inclined to the left; occupied Casarea; traversed the salt desert and the river Halys; and invested Angora: while the sultan, immovable and ignorant in his post, compared the Tartar swiftness to the crawling of a snail; and he returned on the wings of indignation to the relief of Angora; and as both generals were alike impatient for action, the plains round that city were the scene of a memorable battle, which has immortalised the glory of Timour and the shame of Bajazet. For this signal victory the Mogul emperor was indebted to himself, to the genius of the moment, and the discipline of thirty years. He had improved the tactics, without violating the manners, of his nation,<sup>41</sup> whose force still consisted in the missile weapons, and rapid evolutions, of a numerous cavalry. From a single troop to a great army, the mode of attack was the same; a foremost line first advanced to the charge, and was supported in a just order by the squadrons of the great vanguard. The general's eye watched over the field, and at his command the front and rear of the right and left wings successively moved forwards in their several divisions, and in a direct or oblique line: the enemy was pressed by eighteen or twenty attacks; and each attack afforded a chance of victory. If they all proved fruitless or unsuccessful, the occasion was worthy of the emperor himself, who gave the signal of advancing to the standard and main body, which he led in person.<sup>42</sup> But in the battle of Angora, the main body itself was supported, on the flanks and in the rear, by the bravest squadrons of the reserve, commanded by the sons and grandsons of Timour. The conqueror of Hindostan ostentatiously showed a line of elephants, the trophies, rather than the instruments, of victory; the use of the Greek fire was familiar to the Moguls and Ottomans: but had they borrowed from Europe the recent invention of gunpowder and cannon, the artificial thunder, in the hands of either nation, must have turned the fortune of the day.<sup>43</sup> In that day Bajazet displayed the and Bagdad, A. D. 1401, July 25.

Battle of Angora, A. D. 1402, July 28.

Involute Anatoli, A. D. 1402.

<sup>36</sup> The marches and occupations of Timour between the Syrian and Ottoman wars, are recorded by Macretidein (l. vi. c. 29-35) and Arabshah (tom. ii. c. 15-18).

<sup>37</sup> This number, 800,000 was extracted by Arabshah, or rather by Ebn Schowkan, exatnator of Timour, on the faith of a Syrian officer (tom. i. p. 147); and it is not excessive enough, that a Greek historian (Plerzo, l. i. c. 22) adds no more than 200,000 men. Plerzo reckons 100,000; another Latin contemporary (from Turcoman, and Murad, tom. vi. p. 100) 1,000,000; and the enormous sum of 1,000,000 is quoted by a foreign writer, who was present at the battle of Angora (Huet, l. ii. c. 10, p. 82).

<sup>38</sup> Timour, in his last moments, had it designed to calculate his troops, his soldiers, or his horses.

<sup>39</sup> A warlike nation, whose efforts were directed by the Great Mogul.

<sup>40</sup> The number of troops which he led against the Ottoman army, is not stated in the German or other histories. It is evident, that the Moguls were in more than a million.

<sup>41</sup> It is not necessary to remark the differences between Angora and the preceding battle, which was fought on the banks of the Araxes, or between Angora and the battle of Kipzak, to which the Turkish writers refer, as being the same.

<sup>42</sup> The Turkish writers, in general, do not mention the fact of Bajazet's being present in person. A better account is given by the French historian, who has preserved the Turkish version of the battle.

<sup>43</sup> The Turkish writers, in general, do not mention the fact of Bajazet's being present in person. A better account is given by the French historian, who has preserved the Turkish version of the battle.

qualities of a soldier and a chief; but his genius sunk under a stronger ascendancy; and, from various motives, the greatest part of his troops failed him in the decisive moment. His rigour and avarice had provoked a mutiny among the Turks; and even his son Soliman too hastily withdrew from the field. The forces of Anatolia, loyal in their revolt, were drawn away to the banners of their lawful princes. His Tartar allies had been tempted by the letters and emissaries of Timour; <sup>44</sup> who reproached their ignoble servitude under the slaves of their fathers; and offered to their hopes the dominion of their new, or the liberty of their ancient, country. In the right wing of Bajazet the cuirassiers of Europe charged, with faithful hearts and irresistible arms; but these men of iron were soon broken by an artful flight and headlong pursuit: and the Janizaries, alone, without cavalry or missile weapons, were encompassed by the circle of the Mogul hunters. Their valour was at length oppressed by heat, thirst, and the weight of numbers; and the unfortunate sultan, afflicted with the gout in his hands and feet, was transported from the field on the fleetest of his horses.

Defeat and captivity of Bajazet.

He was pursued and taken by the titular khan of Zagatai; and after his capture, and the defeat of the Ottoman powers, the kingdom of Anatolia submitted to the conqueror, who planted his standard at Kiotahia, and dispersed on all sides the ministers of rapine and destruction. Muza Mehmed Sultan, the eldest and best beloved of his grandsons, was despatched to Bursa, with thirty thousand horse; and such was his youthful ardour, that he arrived with only four thousand at the gates of the capital, after performing in five days a march of two hundred and thirty miles. Yet fear is still more rapid in its course: and Soliman, the son of Bajazet, had already passed over to Europe with the royal treasure. The spoil, however, of the palace and city was immense: the inhabitants had escaped; but the buildings, for the most part of wood, were reduced to ashes. From Bursa, the grandson of Timour advanced to Nice, even yet a fair and flourishing city; and the Mogul squadrons were only stopped by the waves of the Propontis. The same success attended the other nizams and emirs in their excursions: and Smyrna, defended by the zeal and courage of the Rhodian knights, alone deserved the presence of the emperor himself. After an obstinate defence, the place was taken by storm; all that breathed was put to the sword; and the heads of the Christian heroes were launched from the engines, on board of two carracks, or great ships of Europe, that rode at anchor in the harbour. The Moslems of Asia rejoiced in their deliverance from a dangerous and domestic foe, and a parallel was drawn between the two rivals, by observing that Timour, in fourteen days, had reduced a fortress which had sustained seven years the siege, or at least the blockade, of Bajazet. <sup>45</sup>

<sup>44</sup> Timour has described this secret and important negotiation with the Tartars, which is accordingly preserved by the poetical licence of the Arabian (tom. i. c. 12. p. 211. Tarikh Amshir), the Persian (p. 221.), and Persian historians (Khawassir, apud D'Herbelot, p. 282.).

<sup>45</sup> For the war of Anatolia or Romya, I add some hints in the Instructions, to the various narratives of Sherefeddin (l. i. c. 14. p. 51.) and Arabalah (tom. i. c. 20. p. 5.). On this part only of Timour's

The iron cage, in which Bajazet was imprisoned by Tamerlane, so long and so often repeated as a moral lesson, is now rejected as a fable by the modern writers, who smile at the vulgar credulity. <sup>46</sup> They appeal with confidence to the Persian history of Sherefeddin Ali, which has been given to our curiosity in a French version, and from which I shall collect and abridge a more specious narrative of this memorable transaction. No sooner was Timour informed that the captive Ottoman was at the door of his tent, than he

The story of his iron cage

disproved by the Persian historian of Timour.

graciously stepped forwards to receive him, seated him by his side, and mingled with just reproaches a soothing pity for his rank and misfortune. "Alas!" said the emperor, "the decree of fate is now accomplished by your own fault: it is the web which you have woven, the thorns of the tree which yourself have planted. I wished to spare, and even to assist the champion of the Moslems: you braved our threats; you despised our friendship; you forced us to enter your kingdom with our invincible armies. Behold the event. Had you vanquished, I am not ignorant of the fate which you reserved for myself and my troops. But I disdain to retaliate: your life and honour are secure; and I shall express my gratitude to God by my clemency to man." The royal captive showed some signs of repentance, accepted the humiliation of a robe of honour, and embraced with tears his son Mousa, who, at his request, was sought and found among the captives of the field. The Ottoman princes were lodged in a splendid pavilion; and the respect of the guards could be surpassed only by their vigilance. On the arrival of the haram from Bursa, Timour restored the queen Despina and her daughter to their father and husband; but he piously required, that the Serbian princess, who had hitherto been indulged in the profession of Christianity, should embrace without delay the religion of the prophet. In the feast of victory, to which Bajazet was invited, the Mogul emperor placed a crown on his head and a sceptre in his hand, with a solemn assurance of restoring him with an increase of glory to the throne of his ancestors. But the effect of this promise was disappointed by the sultan's untimely death: amidst the care of the most skilful physicians, he expired of an apoplexy at Akshehr, the Antioch of Pisidia, about nine months after his defeat. The victor dropped a tear over his grave; his body, with royal pomp, was conveyed to the mausoleum which he had erected at Bursa; and his son Mousa, after receiving a rich present of gold and jewels, of horses and arms, was invested by a patent in red ink with the kingdom of Anatolia.

Such is the portrait of a generous conqueror, which has been extracted from his own memoirs, and dedicated to his son and grandson, nineteen years after his decease; <sup>47</sup> and, at a time when the truth was remembered by thou-history, it is lawful to quote the Turks (Contempr, p. 55-55. Amal, Leucanay, p. 520. 522.) and the Greeks (Phranza, l. i. c. 29. Ducas, c. 13-17. Tricorandides, l. i. c. 10.).

<sup>46</sup> The sceptum of Voltaire, Essai sur l'histoire (narrative, c. 88.) is ready in this, as on every occasion, to reject a popular tale, and to diminish the magnitude of vice and virtue, and on most occasions to his unreflexion is reason his sands, a manifest falsehood would have implied a satire on his real conduct. Weighty indeed is this evidence, adopted by all the Persian histories; <sup>48</sup> yet flattery, more especially in the East, is base and audacious; and the harsh and ignominious treatment of Bajazet is attested by a chain of witnesses, some of whom shall be produced in the order of their time and country.

<sup>47</sup> See the History of Sherefeddin (l. i. c. 19. 52. 53. 60.) This

1. The reader has not forgot the <sup>attested, 1. by the French;</sup> garrison of French, whom the marshal Boucault left behind him for the defence of Constantinople. They were on the spot to receive the earliest and most faithful intelligence of the overthrow of their great adversary; and it is more than probable, that some of them accompanied the Greek embassy to the camp of Tamerlane. From their account, the hardships of the prison and death of Bajazet are affirmed by the marshal's servant and historian, within the distance of seven years. <sup>49</sup> 2. The

<sup>2 by the Italians;</sup> name of Poggius the Italian <sup>50</sup> is deservedly famous among the revivers of learning in the fifteenth century. His elegant dialogue on the vicissitudes of fortune <sup>51</sup> was composed in his fiftieth year, twenty-eight years after the Turkish victory of Tamerlane; <sup>52</sup> whom he celebrates as not inferior to the illustrious barbarians of antiquity. Of his exploits and discipline Poggius was informed by several ocular witnesses; nor does he forget an example so apposite to his theme as the Ottoman monarch, whom the Scythian confined like a wild beast in an iron cage, and exhibited a spectacle to Asia. I might add the authority of two Italian chronicles, perhaps of an earlier date, which would prove at least that the same story, whether false or true, was imported into Europe with the first tidings of the revolution. <sup>53</sup> 3. At a veil to the eyes of intemperance. To escape a similar indignity, it is said, that his successors, except in a single instance, have abstained from legitimate nuptials; and the Ottoman practice and belief, at least in the sixteenth century, is attested by the observing Busbequius, <sup>55</sup> ambassador from the court of Vienna to the great Soliman. 4. Such is the separation of language, that the testimony of a Greek is not less independent than that of a Latin or an Arab. I suppress the names of Chalcondyles and Ducas, who flourished in a later period, and who speak in a less positive tone; but more attention is due to George Phranza, <sup>56</sup> protovestiare of the last emperors, and who was born a year before the battle of Angora. Twenty-two years after that event, he was sent ambassador to Amurath the Second; and the historian might converse with some veteran janizaries, who had been made prisoners with the sultan, and had themselves seen him in his iron cage. 5. The last evidence, in every sense, is <sup>5 by the Turks.</sup> that of the Turkish annals, which have been consulted or transcribed by Leunclavius, Pocock, and Cantemir. <sup>57</sup> They unanimously deplore the captivity of the iron cage; and some credit may be allowed to national historians, who cannot stigmatise the Tartar without uncovering the shame of their king and country.

<sup>3 by the Arabs;</sup> the time when Poggius flourished at Rome, Ahmed Ebn Arabshah composed at Damascus the florid and malevolent history of Timour, for which he had collected materials in his journeys over Turkey and Tattary. <sup>54</sup> Without any possible correspondence between the Latin and the Arabian writer, they agree in the fact of the iron cage; and their agreement is a striking proof of their common veracity. Ahmed Arabshah likewise relates another outrage, which Bajazet endured, of a more domestic and tender nature. His indiscreet mention of women and divorces was deeply resented by the jealous Tartar: in the feast of victory, the wine was served by female cupbearers, and the sultan beheld his own concubines and wives confounded among the slaves, and exposed without

From these opposite premises, a <sup>Probable conclusion.</sup> fair and moderate conclusion may be deduced. I am satisfied that Sherefeddin Ali has faithfully described the first ostentatious interview, in which the conqueror, whose spirits were harmonised by success, affected the character of generosity. But his mind was insensibly alienated by the unseasonable arrogance of Bajazet; the complaints of his enemies, the Anatolian princes, were just and vehement; and Timour betrayed a design of leading his royal captive in triumph to Samarcand. An attempt to facilitate his escape, by digging a mine under the tent, provoked the Mogul emperor to impose a harsher restraint; and in his perpetual marches, an iron cage on a wagon might be invented, not as a wanton insult, but as a rigorous precaution. Timour had read in some fabulous history a similar treatment of one of his predecessors, a king of Persia; and Bajazet was condemned to represent the person, and expiate the guilt, of the Roman Caesar. <sup>58</sup> But the strength of his mind and <sup>Death of Bajazet.</sup> body fainted under the trial, and <sup>1477.</sup> his premature death might, with- <sup>March 9.</sup> work was finished at Shiraz, in the year 1121, and dedicated to sultan Farukhan, the son of Shorokh, the son of Timour, who reigned in Faristan on his father's life-time.

<sup>48</sup> After the perusal of Khondemir, Ebn Schouhan, See the learned D'Hieret (Histoire Orientale, p. 822) may affirm, that this fable is not mentioned in the most authentic histories, but his denial of the visible testimony of Arabshah, leaves some room to suspect his accuracy.

10 Et fut lui même (Bajazet) pris, et mené en prison, en laquelle

(from v. p. 305-308.) Poggius was born in the year 1400, and died in 1470.

<sup>51</sup> The dialogue de Varietate Fortune (of which a complete and elegant edition has been published at Paris in 1725, in 8vo.) was composed a short time before the death of pope Martin V. (p. 3.) and consequently about the end of the year 1450.

<sup>52</sup> See a splendid and elegant edition of Tamerlane, p. 36-39. (see enim noni) says Poggius, qui tuere in ejus castra . . . . .

vaunt cepit, excoque in modum fore occlusum per omnem Asiam circumdedit, et in domo sua circumdedit, et in domo sua circumdedit.

<sup>53</sup> The Chronicon Turanicum of Murad, Sultan Rerum Italianarum, tom. 2, p. 300, & the Acta et Epistolae (tom. 1, p. 974.) The two authors, Andre de Rubens de Chiro, and James de Balazet, were both of noble families, and both christians, the one of Trevis, the other of Ferrara. The evidence of the latter is the most positive.

<sup>54</sup> See Arabshah, tom. 1, c. 28-31. He travelled in regiones Rumicae, A. H. 894, D. 1473, July 17, tom. 1, c. 2, p. 15.

<sup>55</sup> Busbequius in negotio Turco, c. 10, p. 12. Yet his respectable authority is somewhat shaken by the subsequent marriages of Amurath II. with a Serbian, and of Mahomet II. with an Asiatic princess. Cantemir, p. 57-58.

<sup>56</sup> See the testimony of George Phranza, l. 1, c. 29, and his life in Hystories de Script. Byzant. pars. c. 10. Chalcondyles and Ducas speak in general terms of Bajazet's chain.

<sup>57</sup> See the testimony of George Phranza, l. 1, c. 29, and his life in Hystories de Script. Byzant. pars. c. 10. Chalcondyles and Ducas speak in general terms of Bajazet's chain.

<sup>58</sup> The evidence of the latter is the most positive.

out injustice, be ascribed to the severity of Timour. He warred not with the dead; a tear and a sepulchre were all that he could bestow on a captive who was delivered from his power; and if Mousa, the son of Bajazet, was permitted to reign over the ruins of Bursa, the greatest part of the province of Anatolia had been restored by the conqueror to their lawful sovereigns.

From the Irish and Volga to the Persian Gulf, and from the Ganges to Damascus and the Archipelago, Asia was in the hand of Timour; his armies were invincible, his ambition was boundless, and his zeal might aspire to conquer and convert the Christian kingdoms of the West, which already trembled at his name. He touched the utmost verge of the land; but an insuperable, though narrow, sea rolled between the two continents of Europe and Asia;<sup>59</sup> and the lord of so many tomans, or myriads, of horse, was not master of a single galley. The two passages of the Bosphorus and Hellespont, of Constantinople and Gallipoli, were possessed, the one by the Christians, the other by the Turks. On this great occasion, they forgot the difference of religion, to act with union and firmness in the common cause: the double straits were guarded with ships and fortifications; and they separately withheld the transports which Timour demanded of either nation, under the pretence of attacking their enemy. At the same time they soothed his pride with tributary gifts and suppliant embassies, and prudently tempted him to retreat with the honours of victory. Soliman, the son of Bajazet, implored his clemency for his father and himself; accepted, by a red patent, the investiture of the kingdom of Romania, which he already held by the sword; and reiterated his ardent wish, of casting himself in person at the feet of the king of the world. The Greek emperor<sup>60</sup> (either John or Manuel) submitted to pay the same tribute which he had stipulated with the Turkish sultan, and ratified the treaty by an oath of allegiance, from which he could absolve his conscience so soon as the Mogul arms had retired from Anatolia. But the fears and fancy of nations ascribed to the ambitious Tamerlane a new design of vast and romantic compass; a design of subduing Egypt and Africa, marching from the Nile to the Atlantic Ocean, entering Europe by the Straits of Gibraltar, and, after imposing his yoke on the kingdoms of Christendom, of returning home by the deserts of Russia and Tartary. This remote, and perhaps imaginary, danger was averted by the submission of the sultan of Egypt—the honours of the prayer and the coin, attested at Cairo the supremacy of Timour; and a rare gift of a ganyff, or camelopard, and nine ostriches, represented at Samarcand the tribute of the African world. Our imagination is not less astonished by the portrait of a Mogul, who, in his camp, before Smyrna, meditates, and almost accomplishes, the invasion of the Chinese empire.<sup>61</sup> Timour was urged to this enterprise by national honour and religious zeal. The torrents which he had shed of Musulman blood could be expiated only by an equal destruction of the infidels; and as he now stood at the gates of paradise, he might best secure his glorious entrance by demolishing the idols of China, founding moschs in every city, and establishing the profession of faith in one God, and his prophet Mahomet. The recent expulsion of the house of Zingis was an insult on the Mogul name; and the disorders of the empire afforded the fairest opportunity for revenge. The illustrious Hongvou, founder of the dynasty of Ming, died four years before the battle of Angora; and his grandson, a weak and unfortunate youth, was burnt in his palace, after a million of Chinese had perished in the civil war.<sup>62</sup> Before he evacuated Anatolia, Timour despatched beyond the Sihoon a numerous army, or rather colony, of his old and new subjects, to open the road, to subdue the Pagan Calmucks and Mungals, and to found cities and magazines in the desert; and, by the diligence of his lieutenant, he soon received a perfect map and description of the unknown regions, from the source of the Irish to the wall of China. During these preparations, the emperor achieved the final conquest of Georgia; passed the winter on the banks of the Araxes; appeased the troubles of Persia; and slowly returned to his capital, after a campaign of four years and nine months.

On the throne of Samarcand,<sup>63</sup> he displayed, in a short repose, his magnificence and power; listened to the complaints of the people; distributed a just measure of rewards and punishments; employed his riches in the architecture of palaces and temples; and gave audience to the ambassadors of Egypt, Arabia, India, Tartary, Russia, and Spain, the last of whom presented a suit of tapestry which eclipsed the pencil of the Oriental artists. The marriage of six of the emperor's grandsons was esteemed an act of religion as well as of paternal tenderness; and the pomp of the ancient caliphs was revived in their nuptials. They were celebrated in the gardens of Canighul, decorated with innumerable tents and pavilions, which displayed the luxury of a great city, and the spoils of a victorious camp. Whole forests were cut down to supply fuel for the kitchens; the plain was spread with pyramids of meat, and vases of every liquor, to which thousands of guests were courteously invited: the orders of the state, and the nations of the earth, were marshalled at the royal banquet; nor were the ambassadors of Europe (says the haughty Persian) excluded from the feast; since even the cavases, the smallest of fish, find their place in

H. s. triumph at Samarcand. A. D. 1404, July. A. D. 1405, January 8.

<sup>59</sup> Arabshah (tom. ii. c. 25) describes, like a curious traveller, the straits of Geydon and Constantinople. To acquire a just idea of these events, I have compared the narratives and productions of the Greeks, Turks, Greeks, and Arabs. The various and contradictory mentions the hostile union of the Christians and Ottomans. See Timour, p. 90.

<sup>60</sup> Since the name of Manuel had been transferred to the sultan of Roum, the Greek prince at Constantinople, when Timour, in 1403, was confederated with the Christian empire of falling. The sultan, Manuel, under the title of Timour, who is obtained by correcting the name of the Greek prince at Constantinople, p. 90.

<sup>61</sup> See Sherifeddin, l. v. c. 1, who marks, in a just itinerar, the road to China, which Arabshah (tom. ii. c. 55), points in vague and rhetoric colours.

<sup>62</sup> See Sherifeddin, l. v. c. 1, 70. In the 15th part of the Relations de Thevenot, D'Albe, Hist. de la Chine (tom. i. p. 507, 508, 510, edition), and for the chronology of the Chinese emperors, De Guignes, Hist. des Huns, tom. i. p. 71, 72.

<sup>63</sup> For the return, triumph, and death of Timour, see Sherifeddin (l. vi. c. 1—30) and Arabshah (tom. ii. c. 55—57).

the ocean.<sup>64</sup> The public joy was testified by illuminations and masquerades; the trades of Samarcand passed in review; and every trade was emulous to execute some quaint device, some marvellous pageant, with the materials of their peculiar art. After the marriage-contracts had been ratified by the cadhis, the bridegrooms and their brides retired to the nuptial chambers; nine times, according to the Asiatic fashion, they were dressed and undressed; and at each change of apparel, pearls and rubies were showered on their heads, and contemptuously abandoned to their attendants. A general indulgence was proclaimed: every law was relaxed, every pleasure was allowed; the people was free, the sovereign was idle; and the historian of Timour may remark, that, after devoting fifty years to the attainment of empire, the only happy period of his life were the two months in which he ceased to exercise his power. But he was soon awakened to the cares of government and war.

The standard was unfurled for the invasion of China, the emirs made their report of two hundred thousand, the select and veteran soldiers of Iran and Touman; their baggage and provisions were transported by five hundred great wagons, and an immense train of horses and camels; and the troops might prepare for a long absence, since more than six months were employed in the tranquil journey of a caravan from Samarcand to Peking. Neither age, nor the severity of the winter, could retard the impatience of Timour: he mounted on horseback, passed the Sihoon on the ice, marched seventy-six parasangs, three hundred miles, from his capital, and pitched his last camp in the neighbourhood of Otrar, where he was expected by the angel of

His death on the road to China.
A.D. 1105,
April 1.

His death on the road to China, A. D. 1165, April 1.

death. Fatigue, and the immoderate use of iced water, accelerated the progress of his fever; and the conqueror of Asia expired in the seventieth year of his age, thirty-five years after he had ascended the throne of Zagatai. His designs were lost; his armies were disbanded; China was saved, and fourteen years after his decease, the most powerful of his children sent an embassy of friendship and commerce to the court of Peking.<sup>65</sup>

Character and
merits of Timour

The fame of Timour has pervaded the East and West; his posterity is still invested with the Imperial title and the admiration of his subjects, who revered him almost as a deity, may be justified in some degree by the praise or confession of his bitterest enemies.<sup>66</sup> Although he was lame of an hand and foot, his form and stature were not unworthy of his rank; and his vigorous health, so essential to him-self and to the world, was corroborated by temperance and exercise. In his familiar discourse he was grave and modest, and if he was ignorant of the Arabic language, he spoke with fluency and elegance the Persian and Turkish idioms. It was his delight to converse with the learned on topics of history and science; and the amusement of his leisure hours was the game of chess, which he improved or corrupted with new refinements.<sup>67</sup> In his religion, he was a zealous, though not perhaps an orthodox, Musulman;<sup>68</sup> but his sound understanding may tempt us to believe, that a superstitious reverence for omens and prophecies, for saints and astrologers, was only affected as an instrument of policy. In the government of a vast empire, he stood alone and absolute, without a rebel to oppose his power, a favourite to seduce his affections, or a minister to mislead his judgment. It was his firmest maxim, that whatever might be the consequence, the word of the prince should never be disputed or recalled; but his foes have maliciously observed, that the commands of anger and destruction were more strictly executed than those of beneficence and favour. His sons and grandsons, of whom Timour left six and thirty at his decease, were his first and most submissive subjects; and whenever they deviated from their duty, they were corrected, according to the laws of Zingis, with the bastinado, and afterwards restored to honour and command. Perhaps his heart was not devoid of the social virtues; perhaps he was not incapable of loving his friends and pardoning his enemies; but the rules of morality are founded on the public interest; and it may be sufficient to applaud the wisdom of a monarch, for the liberality by which he is not impoverished, and for the justice by which he is strengthened and enriched. To maintain the harmony of authority and obedience, to chastise the proud, to protect the weak, to reward the deserving, to banish vice and idleness from his dominions, to secure the traveller and merchant, to restrain the depredations of the soldier, to cherish the labours of the husbandman, to encourage industry and learning, and, by an equal and moderate assessment, to increase the revenue, without increasing the taxes, are indeed the duties of a prince; but, in the discharge of these duties, he finds an ample and immediate recompence. Timour might boast, that, at his accession to the throne, Asia was the prey of anarchy and rapine; whilst under his prosperous monarchy, a child, fearless and unhurt, might carry a purse of gold from the East to the West. Such was his confidence of merit, that from this reformation he derived an excuse for his victories, and a title to universal dominion. The four following observations will serve to appreciate his claim to the public gratitude; and perhaps we shall conclude, that the Mogul emperor was rather the scourge than the benefactor of mankind. 1. If some partial disorders, some local oppressions, were healed by the sword of Timour, the remedy was far more pernicious than the disease. By their rapine, cruelty, and discord, the petty tyrants of Persia might afflict their subjects; but whole nations from the court of Herat, to which place they returned in 1122 from 64 Shereshfeldin, Ustye 213.

most potent sovereigns of Russia. As the king of Castile, and the current extract Mariva, Hist. Hesp. p. 186.
discount at Hist. de Lumin. 18. to have been some correspondence with the court of Charles VII. King of Velye et Univers. Hist. Ann. p. 276.
65 See the translation of the Persian account of the Arab embassy, a curious and original piece on the title page of the Revue des Deux Mondes. The primary ground of this is in the Ustye 213.
Lumin. Hist. formerly text. It was in the year 1123 that they departed from the court of the king of Castile.

From Arabic ṭarq 'the way'. The bright or softer colours are borrowed from Sanskrit, e.g. ṭarq 'the way'.

were crushed under the footsteps of the reformer. The ground which had been occupied by flourishing cities, was often marked by his abominable trophies, by columns, or pyramids, of human heads. Astracan, Carizme, Delhi, Ispahan, Bagdad, Aleppo, Damascus, Boursa, Smyrna, and a thousand others, were sacked, or burnt, or utterly destroyed, in his presence, and by his troops; and perhaps his conscience would have been startled, if a priest or philosopher had dared to number the millions of victims whom he had sacrificed to the establishment of peace and order.<sup>62</sup> 2. His most destructive wars were rather inroads than conquests. He invaded Turkestan, Kipzak, Russia, Hindostan, Syria, Anatolia, Armenia, and Georgia, without a hope or a desire of preserving those distant provinces. From thence he departed laden with spoil; but he left behind him neither troops to awe the contumacious, nor magistrates to protect the obedient, natives. When he had broken the fabric of their ancient government, he abandoned them to the evils which his invasion had aggravated or caused, nor were these evils compensated by any present or possible benefits. 3. The kingdoms of Transoxiana and Persia were the proper field which he laboured to cultivate and adorn, as the perpetual inheritance of his family. But his peaceful labours were often interrupted, and sometimes blasted, by the absence of the conqueror. While he triumphed on the Volga or the Ganges, his servants, and even his sons, forgot their master and their duty. The public and private injuries were poorly redressed by the tardy rigour of enquiry and punishment; and we must be content to praise the Institutions of Timour, as the specious idea of a perfect monarchy. 4. Whatsoever might be the blessings of his administration, they evaporated with his life. To reign, rather than to govern, was the ambition of his children and grandchildren;<sup>70</sup> the enemies of each other and of the people. A fragment of the empire was upheld with some glory by Sharokh, his youngest son; but after his decease, the scene was again involved in darkness and blood; and before the end of a century, Transoxiana and Persia were trampled by the Uzbeks from the north, and the Turkmen of the black and white sheep. The race of Timour would have been extinct, if an hero, his descendant in the fifth degree, had not fled before the Uzbek arms to the conquest of Hindostan. His successors (the great Moguls)<sup>71</sup> extended their sway from the mountains of Cashmir to Cape Comorin, and from Candahar to the Gulf of Bengal. Since the reign of Aurungzebe, their empire has been dissolved; their treasures of Delhi have been rifled by a Persian robber; and the richest of their kingdoms is now possessed by a company of Christian merchants, of a remote island in the Northern Ocean.

did not nor will he believe that Sharokh had abolished the use and refer to an who has a cads of the the fifth of moderation thusiasm in bah, and

M. de Guignes (Hist. des Huns, tom. iv. l. xx.), Fraser's History of Nadir Shah, p. 1-62. The story of Timour's descendants is un-

Far different was the fate of the Ottoman monarchy. The massy trunk was bent to the ground, but no sooner did the hurricane pass away, than it again rose with fresh vigour and more lively vegetation. When Timour, in every sense, had evacuated Anatolia, he left the cities without a palace, a treasure, or a king. The open country was over-spread with hordes of shepherds and robbers of Tartar or Turkman origin; the recent conquests of Bajazet were restored to the emirs, one of whom, in base revenge, demolished his sepulchre; and his five sons were eager, by civil discord, to consume the remnant of their patrimony. I shall enumerate their names in the order of their age and actions.<sup>72</sup> 1. It is doubtful, whether I relate the story of the true Mustapha, or of an impostor who personated that lost prince. He fought by his father's side in the battle of Angora: but when the captive sultan was permitted to enquire for his children, Mousa alone could be found; and the Turkish historians, the slaves of the triumphant faction, are persuaded that his brother was confounded among the slain. If Mustapha escaped from that disastrous field, he was concealed twelve years from his friends and enemies; till he emerged in Thessaly, and was hailed by a numerous party, as the son and successor of Bajazet. His first defeat would have been his last, had not the true, or false, Mustapha been saved by the Greeks, and restored, after the decease of his brother Mahomet, to liberty and empire. A degenerate mind seemed to argue his spurious birth: and if, on the throne of Adrianople, he was adored as the Ottoman sultan, his flight, his fetters, and an ignominious gibbet, delivered the impostor to popular contempt. A similar character and claim was asserted by several rival pretenders; thirty persons are said to have suffered under the name of Mustapha; and these frequent executions may perhaps insinuate, that the Turkish court was not perfectly secure of the death of the lawful prince. 2. After his father's captivity, Isa<sup>73</sup> reigned for some time in the neighbourhood of Angora, Sinope, and the Black Sea; and his ambassadors were dismissed from the presence of Timour with fair promises and honourable gifts. But their master was soon deprived of his province and life, by a jealous brother, the sovereign of Anasias; and the final event suggested a pious allusion, that the law of Moses and Jesus, of Isa and Mousa, had been abrogated by the greater Mahomet. 3. Soliman is not numbered in the list of the Turkish emperors: yet he checked the victorious progress of the Moguls; and after their departure, united for a while the thrones of Adrianople and Boursa. In war he was brave, perfectly told, and the second and third parts of Sherefeddin are unknown.

72 Arabshah, tom. ii. c. 26, whose testimony on this occasion is weighty and valuable. The existence of Isa (unknown to the Turks) is likewise confirmed by Sherefeddin (l. i. c. 57).

sons of Bajazet.
A. D. 1403-1421.

1. Mustapha;

2. Isa;

3. Soliman,
A. D. 1403-1419;

Mustapha,
p. 30-39
and best

active, and fortunate : his courage was softened by clemency ; but it was likewise inflamed by presumption, and corrupted by intemperance and idleness. He relaxed the nerves of discipline, in a government where either the subject or the sovereign must continually tremble : his vices alienated the chiefs of the army and the law ; and his daily drunkenness, so contemptible in a prince and a man, was doubly odious in a disciple of the prophet. In the slumber of intoxication he was surprised by his brother Mousa ; and as he fled from Adrianople towards the Byzantine capital, Soliman was overtaken and slain in a bath, after a reign of seven years and ten months. 4. The investiture of Mousa degraded him as the slave of the Moguls: his tributary kingdom of Anatolia was confined within a narrow limit, nor could his broken militia and empty treasury contend with the lardy and veteran bands of the sovereign of Romania. Mousa fled in disguise from the palace of Boursa; traversed the Propontis in an open boat; wandered over the Walachian and Servian hills; and after some vain attempts, ascended the throne of Adrianople, so recently stained with the blood of Soliman. In a reign of three years and a half, his troops were victorious against the Christians of Hungary and the Morea; but Mousa was ruined by his timorous disposition and unseasonable clemency. After resigning the sovereignty of Anatolia, he fell a victim to the perfidy of his ministers, and the superior ascendant of his brother Mahomet. 5. The final victory of Mahomet was the just recompence of his prudence and moderation. Before his father's captivity, the royal youth had been intrusted with the government of Amasia, thirty days' journey from Constantinople, and the Turkish frontier against the Christians of Trebizond and Georgia. The castle, in Asiatic warfare, was esteemed impregnable; and the city of Amasia,<sup>74</sup> which is equally divided by the river Iris, rises on either side in the form of an amphitheatre, and represents on a smaller scale the image of Bagdad. In his rapid career, Timour appears to have overlooked this obscure and contumacious angle of Anatolia; and Mahomet, without provoking the conqueror, maintained his silent independence, and chased from the province the last stragglers of the Tartar host. He relieved himself from the dangerous neighbourhood of Isa; but in the contests of their more powerful brethren, his firm neutrality was respected; till, after the triumph of Mousa, he stood forth the heir and avenger of the unfortunate Soliman. Mahomet obtained Anatolia by treaty, and Rumania by arms; and the soldier who presented him with the head of Mousa, was rewarded as the benefactor of his king and country. The eight years of his sole and peaceful reign were usefully employed in banishing the vices of civil discord, and restoring on a firmer basis the fabric of the Ottoman monarchy. His last care was the choice of two vizirs, Bajazet and Ibrahim,<sup>75</sup> who might guide the youth of his son Amurath; and such was their union and prudence, that they concealed above forty days the emperor's death, till the arrival of his successor in the palace of Boursa. A new war was kindled in Europe by the prince, or impostor, Mustapha; the first vizir lost his army and his head; but the more fortunate Ibrahim, whose name and family are still revered, extinguished the last pretender to the throne of Bajazet, and closed the scene of domestic hostility.

In these conflicts, the wisest Turks, and indeed the body of the nation, were strongly attached to the unity of the empire; and Romania and Anatolia, so often torn asunder by private ambition, were animated by a strong and invincible tendency of cohesion. Their efforts might have instructed the Christian powers; and had they occupied, with a confederate fleet, the Straits of Gallipoli, the Ottomans, at least in Europe, must have been speedily annihilated. But the schism of the West, and the factions and wars of France and England, diverted the Latins from this generous enterprise: they enjoyed the present respite, without a thought of futurity; and were often tempted by a momentary interest to serve the common enemy of their religion. A colony of Genoese,<sup>76</sup> which had been planted at Phocæa<sup>77</sup> on the Ionian coast, was enriched by the lucrative monopoly of alum;<sup>78</sup> and their tranquillity, under the Turkish empire, was secured by the annual payment of tribute. In the last civil war of the Ottomans, the Genoese governor, Adorno, a bold and ambitious youth, embraced the party of Amurath; and undertook, with seven stout galleys, to transport him from Asia to Europe. The sultan and five hundred guards embarked on board the admiral's ship, which was manned by eight hundred of the bravest Franks. His life and liberty were in their hands; nor can we, without reluctance, applaud the fidelity of Adorno, who, in the midst of the passage, knelt before him, and gratefully accepted a discharge of his arrears of tribute. They landed in sight of Mustapha and Gallipoli: two thousand Italians, armed with lances and battle-axes, attended Amurath to the conquest of Adrianople; and this venal service was soon repaid by the ruin of the commerce and colony of Phocæa.

If Timour had generously marched at the request, and to the relief, of the Greek emperor, he might be entitled to the praise and gratitude of the Christians.<sup>79</sup> But a Musulman, who carried

State of the Greek empire, A.D. 1402-1425.

74 Arabshah, loc. citat. Abulfeda, Geograph. tab. xvii. p. 302.
Busbequius, epist. i. p. 96, 97. in Itinere t. P. et Amasino

75 The virtues of Ibrahim are praised by a contemporary Greek (Ducas, c. 25). His descendants are the sole nobles in Turkey: they content themselves with the administration of his pious endowments, are excluded from public offices, and receive two annual visits from the sultan (Dionysius, 30 ff.).

[illegible]

Geographical Index of his last and learned French translator, M. Laplacier (item vi p. 299).

75. Thucydides is not enumerated by Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxv. 52) among the places productive of alum, he reckons Egypt as the first, and the island of Melos, where alum mines are described by Tournefort (note a little later), a traveller and chemist. After the loss of Thucydides the Germans in 1454 found that useful mineral.

[illegible]

into Georgia the sword of persecution, and respected the holy warfare of Bajazet, was not disposed to pity or succour the idolaters of Europe. The Tartar followed the impulse of ambition; and the deliverance of Constantinople was the accidental consequence. When Manuel abdicated the government, it was his prayer, rather than his hope, that the ruin of the church and state might be delayed beyond his unhappy days; and after his return from a western pilgrimage, he expected every hour the news of the sad catastrophe. On a sudden, he was astonished and rejoiced by the intelligence of the retreat, the overthrow, and the captivity of the Ottoman. Manuel<sup>80</sup> immediately sailed from Modon in the Morea, ascended the throne of Constantinople, and dismissed his blind competitor to an easy exile in the isle of Lesbos. The ambassadors of the son of Bajazet were soon introduced to his presence; but their pride was fallen, their tone was modest; they were awed by the just apprehension, lest the Greeks should open to the Moguls the gates of Europe. Soliman saluted the emperor by the name of father; solicited at his hands the government or gift of Romania; and promised to deserve his favour by inviolable friendship, and the restitution of Thessalonica, with the most important places along the Strymon, the Propontis, and the Black Sea. The alliance of Soliman exposed the emperor to the enmity and revenge of Mausa; the Turks appeared in arms before the gates of Constantinople; but they were repulsed by sea and land; and unless the city was guarded by some foreign mercenaries, the Greeks must have wondered at their own triumph. But, instead of prolonging the division of the Ottoman powers, the policy or passion of Manuel was tempted to assist the most formidable of the sons of Bajazet. He concluded a treaty with Mahomet, whose progress was checked by the insuperable barrier of Gallipoli: the sultan and his troops were transported over the Bosphorus; he was hospitably entertained in the capital; and his successful sally was the first step to the conquest of Romania. The ruin was suspended by the prudence and moderation of the conqueror: he faithfully discharged his own obligations and those of Soliman, respected the laws of gratitude and peace; and left the emperor guardian of his two younger sons, in the vain hope of saving them from the jealous cruelty of their brother Amurath. But the execution of his last testament would have offended the national honour and religion: and the divan unanimously pronounced, that the royal youths should never be abandoned to the custody and education of a Christian dog. On this refusal, the Byzantine councils were divided: but the age and caution of Manuel yielded to the presumption of his son John; and they unsheathed a dangerous weapon of revenge, by dismissing the true or false Mustapha, who had long been detained as a captive and hostage, and for whose maintenance they received an annual pension of three hundred thousand aspers.<sup>81</sup> At the door of his prison, Mustapha subscribed to every proposal; and the keys of Gallipoli, or rather of Europe, were stipulated as the price of his deliverance. But no sooner was he seated on the throne of Romania, than he dismissed the Greek ambassadors with a smile of contempt, declaring, in a pious tone, that, at the day of judgment, he would rather answer for the violation of an oath, than for the surrender of a Musulman city into the hands of the infidels. The emperor was at once the enemy of the two rivals, from whom he had sustained, and to whom he had offered, an injury; and the victory of Amurath was followed, in the ensuing spring, by the siege of Constantinople.<sup>82</sup>

The religious merit of subduing the city of the Cæsars, attracted from Asia a crowd of volunteers, who aspired to the crown of martyrdom: their military ardour was inflamed by the promise of rich spoils and beautiful females; and the sultan's ambition was consecrated by the presence and prediction of Seid Bechar, a descendant of the prophet,<sup>83</sup> who arrived in the camp, on a mule, with a venerable train of five hundred disciples. But he might blush, if a fanatic could blush, at the failure of his assurances. The strength of the walls resisted an army of two hundred thousand Turks: their assaults were repelled by the sallies of the Greeks and their foreign mercenaries; the old resources of defence were opposed to the new engines of attack; and the enthusiasm of the dervish, who was snatched to heaven in visionary converse with Mahomet, was answered by the credulity of the Christians, who beheld the Virgin Mary, in a violet garment, walking on the rampart and animating their courage.<sup>84</sup> After a siege of two months, Amurath was recalled to Bourra by a domestic revolt, which had been kindled by Greek treachery, and was soon extinguished by the death of a guiltless brother. While he led his Janizaries to new conquests in Europe and Asia, the Byzantine empire was indulged in a servile and precarious respite of thirty years. Manuel sunk into the grave; and John Palæologus was permitted to reign, for an annual tribute of three hundred thousand aspers, and the dereliction of almost all that he held beyond the suburbs of Constantinople.

In the establishment and restoration of the Turkish empire, the first merit must doubtless be assigned to the personal qualities of the sultans; since, in human life, the most important scenes will depend on the character of a single actor. By some shades of wisdom and virtue, they may be discriminated from each other; but, except in a single instance, a period of nine reigns,

See of Constantinople by Amurath II. A.D. 1422, June 10, August 21.

The emperor John Palæologus II. A.D. 1425, July 21—A.D. 1448, Oct. 51.

Hereditary succession and grant of the Ottomans.

<sup>80</sup> For the reigns of Manuel and John, of Mahomet I. and Amurath II., see the Ottoman history of Cantemir (p. 71—201) and the three Greeks, Chalcondyles, Phranza, and Ducas, who is still superior to his rivals.

<sup>81</sup> The Turkish asper (from the Greek ἀσπρὸν) is, or was, a piece of gold or silver money, at present much debased, but which was formerly equivalent to the fifth part, at least, of a Venetian ducat or sequin; and the 200,000 aspers, a precisely accurate or exact tribute, may be computed at 2000 sterling (Leunclav. Pandect. Turc. p. 105—108).

<sup>82</sup> For the siege of Constantinople in 1422, see the particular and contemporary narrative of John Caninas, published by Leo Allatius, at the end of his edition of Urologia (p. 148—169).

<sup>83</sup> Cf. Cantemir, p. 80. Caninus, who describes Seid Bechar without name him, supposes that the friend of Mahomet arrived in his attire the privilege of a prophet, and that the farest of the Greek monks were promoted to the suit and his disciples.

<sup>84</sup> For this miraculous apparition, the Greeks appeal to the Musulman saint; but who will bear testimony for Seid Bechar?

and two hundred and sixty-five years, is occupied, from the elevation of Othman to the death of Soliman, by a rare series of warlike and active princes, who impressed their subjects with obedience and their enemies with terror. Instead of the slothful luxury of the seraglio, the heirs of royalty were educated in the council and the field: from early youth they were intrusted by their fathers with the command of provinces and armies; and this manly institution, which was often productive of civil war, must have essentially contributed to the discipline and vigour of the monarchy. The Ottomans cannot style themselves, like the Arabian caliphs, the descendants or successors of the apostle of God; and the kindred which they claim with the Tartar khans of the house of Zingis, appears to be founded in flattery rather than in truth.<sup>85</sup> Their origin is obscure; but their sacred and indefeasible right, which no time can erase, and no violence can infringe, was soon and unalterably implanted in the minds of their subjects. A weak or vicious sultan may be deposed and strangled; but his inheritance devolves to an infant or an idiot: nor has the most daring rebel presumed to ascend the throne of his lawful sovereign.<sup>86</sup> While the transient dynasties of Asia have been continually subverted by a crafty vizir in the palace or a victorious general in the camp, the Ottoman succession has been confirmed by the practice of five centuries, and is now incorporated with the vital principle of the Turkish nation.

Education and discipline of the Turks. To the spirit and constitution of that nation, a strong and singular influence may however be ascribed.

The primitive subjects of Othman were the four hundred families of wandering Turkomans, who had followed his ancestors from the Oxus to the Sangar; and the plains of Anatolia are still covered with the white and black tents of their rustic brethren. But this original drop was dissolved in the mass of voluntary and vanquished subjects, who, under the name of Turks, are united by the common ties of religion, language, and manners. In the cities, from Erzeroum to Belgrade, that national appellation is common to all the Moslems, the first and most honourable inhabitants; but they have abandoned, at least in Romania, the villages, and the cultivation of the land, to the Christian peasants. In the vigorous age of the Ottoman government, the Turks were themselves excluded from all civil and military honours; and a servile class, an artificial people, was raised by the discipline of education to obey, to conquer, and to command.<sup>87</sup> From the time of Orchan and the first Amurath, the sultans were persuaded that a government of the sword must be renewed in each generation with new soldiers; and that such soldiers must be sought, not in effe-minate Asia, but among the hardy and warlike natives of Europe. The provinces of Thrace, Macedonia, Albania, Bulgaria, and Servia, became the perpetual seminary of the Turkish army; and when the royal fifth of the captives was diminished by conquest, an inhuman tax, of the fifth child, or of every fifth year, was rigorously levied on the Christian families. At the age of twelve or fourteen years, the most robust youths were torn from their parents; their names were enrolled in a book; and from that moment they were clothed, taught, and maintained, for the public service. According to the promise of their appearance, they were selected for the royal schools of Boura, Pera, and Adrianople, intrusted to the care of the bashaws, or dispersed in the houses of the Anatolian peasantry. It was the first care of their masters to instruct them in the Turkish language: their bodies were exercised by every labour that could fortify their strength. they learned to wrestle, to leap, to run, to shoot with the bow, and afterwards with the musket; till they were drafted into the chambers and companies of the Janizaries, and severely trained in the military or monastic discipline of the order. The youths most conspicuous for birth, talents, and beauty, were admitted into the inferior class of Ayamoghlans, or the more liberal rank of Iechoghlans, of whom the former were attached to the palace, and the latter to the person of the prince. In four successive schools, under the rod of the white eunuchs, the arts of horsemanship and of darning the javelin were their daily exercise, while those of a more studious cast applied themselves to the study of the Koran, and the knowledge of the Arabic and Persian tongues. As they advanced in seniority and merit, they were gradually dismissed to military, civil, and even ecclesiastical employments: the longer their stay, the higher was their expectation; till, at a mature period, they were admitted into the number of the forty agas, who stood before the sultan, and were promoted by his choice to the government of provinces and the first honours of the empire.<sup>88</sup> Such a mode of institution was admirably adapted to the form and spirit of a despotic monarchy. The ministers and generals were, in the strictest sense, the slaves of the emperor, to whose bounty they were indebted for their instruction and support. When they left the seraglio, and suffered their beards to grow as the symbol of enfranchisement, they found themselves in an important office, without faction or friendship, without parents and without heirs, dependent on the hand which had raised them from the dust, and which, on the slightest displeasure, could break in pieces these statues of glass, as they are aptly termed by the Turkish proverb.<sup>89</sup> In the slow and painful steps of education, their characters and talents were unfolded to a discern-

GA. REP. D. COMM. (1970-1971) WITH THAT HE WOULD assume the title of "senator".
He was slain at presumed to tyrants, and Murder, &c.

p. 281. This political here it was a good wlog, and justified against the French ambassador the revolution of England. Memoir, Hist. des Croisades, tome. II, p. 131. His prescriptive indicates the singular exception of continuing offices in the same families.

of the Ottoman policy, and the transmutation of Christian children into Turkish soldiers.

55 This sketch of the Turkish education and discipline is chiefly borrowed from Rieu's State of the Ottoman Empire, the Statistical and Descriptive Inquiry, Compendium of the Turkish Marches by Hogg, 1774, in fact, and a description of the Serail, &c. approved by Mr. Creeves, but all of which are trustworthy, and inserted in the second volume of my work.

<sup>50</sup> From a series of cases, not the case of Van der Vorst, p. 173, it may be inferred that the procurator is not a procurator.

the younger Andronicus, was less a slave in his temper and situation; and the conquest of Bithynia by the Turks admonished him to seek a temporal and spiritual alliance with the Western princes. After a separation and silence of fifty years, a secret agent, the monk Barlaam, was despatched to pope Benedict the Twelfth; and his artful instructions appear to have been drawn by the master-hand of the great domestic.<sup>1</sup>

The arguments for a ruse and union. "Most holy father," was he commissioned to say, "the emperor is not less desirous than yourself of an union between the two churches: but in this delicate transaction, he is obliged to respect his own dignity and the prejudices of his subjects. The ways of union are twofold; force, and persuasion. Of force, the inefficacy has been already tried; since the Latins have subdued the empire, without subduing the minds of the Greeks. The method of persuasion, though slow, is sure and permanent. A deputation of thirty or forty of our doctors would probably agree with those of the Vatican, in the love of truth and the unity of belief; but on their return, what would be the use, the recompence of such agreement? the scorn of their brethren, and the reproaches of a blind and obstinate nation. Yet that nation is accustomed to reverence the general councils, which have fixed the articles of our faith; and if they reprobate the decrees of Lyons, it is because the Eastern churches were neither heard nor represented in that arbitrary meeting. For this salutary end, it will be expedient, and even necessary, that a well-chosen legate must be sent into Greece, to convene the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem; and, with their aid, to prepare a free and universal synod. But at this moment," continued the subtle agent, "the empire is assaulted and endangered by the Turks, who have occupied four of the greatest cities in Anatolia. The Christian inhabitants have expressed a wish of returning to their allegiance and religion; but the forces and revenues of the emperor are insufficient for their deliverance: and the Roman legate must be accompanied, or preceded, by an army of Franks, to expel the infidels, and open a way to the holy sepulchre." If the suspicious Latins should require some pledge, some previous effect of the sincerity of the Greeks, the answers of Barlaam were perspicuous and rational. "1. A general synod can alone consummate the union of the churches; nor can such a synod be held till the three Oriental patriarchs, and a great number of bishops, are enfranchised from the Mahometan yoke. 2. The Greeks are alienated by a long series of oppression and injury: they must be reconciled by some act of bro“therly love, some effectual succour, which may “fortify the authority and arguments of the “emperor, and the friends of the union. 3. If “some difference of faith or ceremonies should “be found incurable, the Greeks however are “the disciples of Christ; and the Turks are “the common enemies of the Christian name.

“The Armenians, Cyprians, and Rhodians, are “equally attacked; and it will become the piety “of the French princes to draw their swords in “the general defence of religion. 4. Should “the subjects of Andronicus be treated as the “worst of schismatics, of heretics, of Pagans, a “judicious policy may yet instruct the powers “of the West to embrace an useful ally, to “uphold a sinking empire, to guard the con“fines of Europe; and rather to join the “Greeks against the Turks, than to expect the “union of the Turkish arms with the troops “and treasures of captive Greece.” The rea“sons, the offers, and the demands, of Andro-“nicus, were cluded with cold and stately indif“ference. The kings of France and Naples “declined the dangers and glory of a crusade:
“the pope refused to call a new synod to deter“mine old articles of faith, and his regard for “the obsolete claims of the Latin emperor and “clergy engaged him to use an offensive super-“scription; “To the moderator<sup>2</sup> of the Greeks,
“and the persons who style themselves the pa“triarchs of the Eastern churches.” For such “an embassy, a time and character less propitious “could not easily have been found. Benedict
“the Twelfth<sup>3</sup> was a dull peasant, perplexed with “scruples, and immersed in sloth and wine: his “pride might enrich with a third crown the papal “tiara, but he was alike unfit for the regal and
“the pastoral office.

After the decease of Andronicus, while the Greeks were distracted by intestine war, they could not presume to agitate a general union of the Christians. But as soon as Cantacuzene had subdued and pardoned his enemies, he was anxious to justify, or at least to extenuate, the introduction of the Turks into Europe; and the nuptials of his daughter with a Musulman prince. Two officers of state, with a Latin interpreter, were sent in his name to the Roman court, which was transplanted to Avignon, on the banks of the Rhone, during a period of seventy years; they represented the hard necessity which had urged him to embrace the alliance of the miscreants, and edifying sounds by his command the specious and edifying sounds of union and crusade. Pope Clement the Sixth,<sup>4</sup> the successor of Benedict, received them with hospitality and honour, acknowledged the innocence of their sovereign, excused his distress, applauded his magnanimity, and displayed a clear knowledge of the state and revolutions of the Greek empire.

1. This curious instruction was transcribed (I believe) from the Vatican archives, by Hieronymus Bayanus, in his continuation of the Annals of Baronius (Antwerp, 1666-1677, in six volumes in folio). I have contented myself with the Atla Fleury (Hist. Ecclesiastiq. e. ton. xx. p. 1-3.), whose abstracts I have always found to be clear, accurate, and important.

2 The unmarkedness of this title is borne out by means of: and mo'end or, as synonymous to mo'end, qur'end is a word of Persian origin, and even in the most recent editions of the qur'an it is found, not in the Glossary of Darius, but in the Thesaurus of Herbert Spencer.

[illegible]

which he had imbibed from the honest accounts of a Savoyard lady, an attendant of the empress Anne.<sup>5</sup> If Clement was ill endowed with the virtues of a priest, he possessed however the spirit and magnificence of a prince, whose liberal hand distributed benefices and kingdoms with equal facility. Under his reign Avignon was the seat of pomp and pleasure: in his youth he had surpassed the licentiousness of a baron; and the palace, nay, the bed-chamber of the pope, was adorned, or polluted, by the visits of his female favourites. The wars of France and England were adverse to the holy enterprise; but his vanity was amused by the splendid idea; and the Greek ambassadors returned with two Latin bishops, the ministers of the pontiff. On their arrival at Constantinople, the emperor and the nuncios admired each other's piety and eloquence: and their frequent conferences were filled with mutual praises and promises, by which both parties were amused, and neither could be deceived. "I am delighted," said the devout Cantacuzene, "with the project of our holy war, which must redound to my personal glory, as well as to the public benefit of Christendom. My dominions will give a free passage to the armies of France: my troops, my galleys, my treasures, shall be consecrated to the common cause; and happy would be my fate, could I deserve and obtain the crown of martyrdom. Words are insufficient to express the ardour with which I sigh for the re-union of the scattered members of Christ. If my death could avail, I would gladly present my sword and my neck: if the spiritual phoenix could arise from my ashes, I would erect the pile, and kindle the flame with my own hands." Yet the Greek emperor presumed to observe, that the articles of faith which divided the two churches had been introduced by the pride and precipitation of the Latins: he disclaimed the servile and arbitrary steps of the first Palæologus; and firmly declared, that he would never submit his conscience unless to the decrees of a free and universal synod. "The situation of the times," continued he, "will not allow the pope and myself to meet either at Rome or Constantinople; but some maritime city may be chosen on the verge of the two empires, to unite the bishops, and to instruct the faithful of the East and West." The nuncios seemed content with the proposition; and Cantacuzene affects to deplore the failure of his hopes, which were soon overthrown by the death of Clement. And the different temper of his successor. His own life was prolonged, but it was prolonged in a cloister; and, except by his prayers, the humble monk was incapable of directing the counsels of his pupil or the state.<sup>6</sup>

Yet of all the Byzantine princes, that pupil, John Palæologus, was the best disposed to embrace, to believe, and to obey, the shepherd of the West. His mother, Anne of Savoy, was baptized in the bosom of the Latin church: her marriage with Andronicus imposed a change of name, of apparel, and of worship, but her heart was still faithful to her country and religion; she had formed the infancy of her son, and she governed the emperor, after his mind, or at least his stature, was enlarged to the size of man. In the first year of his deliverance and restoration, the Turks were still masters of the Hellespont; the son of Cantacuzene was in arms at Adrianople; and Palæologus could depend neither on himself nor on his people. By his mother's advice, and in the hope of foreign aid, he abjured the rights both of the church and state; and the act of slavery,<sup>7</sup> subscribed in purple ink, and sealed with the golden bull, was privately intrusted to an Italian agent. The first article of the treaty is an oath of fidelity and obedience to Innocent the Sixth and his successors, the supreme pontiffs of the Roman and Catholic church. The emperor promises to entertain with due reverence their legates and nuncios; to assign a palace for their residence, and a temple for their worship; and to deliver his second son Manuel as the hostage of his faith. For these condescensions he requires a prompt succour of fifteen galleys, with five hundred men at arms, and a thousand archers, to serve against his Christian and Musulman enemies. Palæologus engages to impose on his clergy and people the same spiritual yoke; but as the resistance of the Greeks might be justly foreseen, he adopts the two effectual methods of corruption and education. The legate was empowered to distribute the vacant benefices among the ecclesiastics who should subscribe the creed of the Vatican: three schools were instituted to instruct the youth of Constantinople in the language and doctrine of the Latins; and the name of Andronicus, the heir of the empire, was enrolled as the first student. Should he fail in the measures of persuasion or force, Palæologus declares himself unworthy to reign; transferred to the pope all regal and paternal authority; and invests Innocent with full power to regulate the family, the government, and the marriage of his son and successor. But this treaty was neither executed nor published: the Roman galleys were a vain and imaginary aid; the submission of the Greeks; and it was only by the secrecy, that their sovereign escaped the dishonour of this fruitless humiliation.

The tempest of the Turkish arms soon burst on his head; and, after the loss of Adrianople and Romania, he was enclosed in his capital, the vassal of the haughty Amurath, with the miserable hope of being the last devoured by the savage. In this abject state, Palæologus embraced the resolution of embarking for Venice, and casting himself at the feet of the pope. He was the first of the Byzantine princes who had ever visited the unknown regions of the West, yet in them alone he could seek consolation or relief: and with less violation of his dignity he

<sup>5</sup> Trevis of Lodi.
<sup>6</sup> Palæologus I.
 with Anna of V.
 A. D. 1369.

<sup>6</sup> Her name most probably corresponds with Zorger. She had a eunuch, and a slave, and a dog, who were with her to the very end of her life. Her piety was not without its fruits. She died in the year 1380, and was buried in the church of the Holy Spirit at Constantinople.

<sup>7</sup> See the whole in relation to Cantacuzene's reign, where it is

Visit of John Palæologus
 to the pope at Rome.

A. D. 1369,
 October 15, &c.

the process in the security of his house, and the fact of the anti-christianity of the emperor.

<sup>7</sup> See the whole in relation to Cantacuzene's reign, where it is

might appear in the sacred college than at the Ottoman Porte. After a long absence, the Roman pontiff was returning from Avignon to the banks of the Tyber; Urban the Fifth,<sup>8</sup> of a mild and virtuous character, encouraged or allowed the pilgrimage of the Greek prince; and, within the same year, enjoyed the glory of receiving in the Vatican the two Imperial shadows who represented the majesty of Constantine and Charlemagne. In this suppliant visit, the emperor of Constantinople, whose vanity was lost in his distress, gave more than could be expected of empty sounds and formal submissions. A previous trial was imposed; and in the presence of four cardinals, he acknowledged, as a true Catholic, the supremacy of the pope, and the double procession of the Holy Ghost. After this purification he was introduced to a public audience in the church of St. Peter; Urban, in the midst of the cardinals, was seated on his throne; the Greek monarch, after three genuflexions, devoutly kissed the feet, the hands, and at length the mouth, of the holy father, who celebrated high mass in his presence, allowed him to lead the bridle of his mule, and treated him with a sumptuous banquet in the Vatican. The entertainment of Palæologus was friendly and honourable; yet some difference was observed between the emperors of the East and West;<sup>9</sup> nor could the former be entitled to the rare privilege of chanting the Gospel in the rank of a deacon.<sup>10</sup> In favour of his proselyte, Urban strove to rekindle the zeal of the French king, and the other powers of the West; but he found them cold in the general cause, and active only in their domestic quarrels. The last hope of the emperor was in an English mercenary, John Hawkwood,<sup>11</sup> or Acuto, who, with a band of adventurers, the white brotherhood, had ravaged Italy from the Alps to Calabria; sold his services to the hostile states; and incurred a just excommunication by shooting his arrows against the papal residence. A special licence was granted to negotiate with the outlaw, but the forces, or the spirit, of Hawkwood were unequal to the enterprise; and it was for the advantage, perhaps, of Palæologus to be disappointed of a succour, that must have been costly, that could not be effectual, and which might have been dangerous.<sup>12</sup> The disconsolate Greek<sup>13</sup> prepared for his return, but even his return was impeded by a most ignominious obstacle. On his arrival at Venice, he had borrowed large sums at exorbitant usury; but his coffers were empty, his creditors were impatient, and his person was detained as the best security for the payment. His eldest son Andronicus, the regent of Constantinople, was repeatedly urged to exhaust every resource; and, even by stripping the churches, to extricate his father from captivity and disgrace. But the unnatural youth was insensible of the disgrace, and secretly pleased with the captivity of the emperor; the state was poor, the clergy were obstinate; nor could some religious scruple be wanting to excuse the guilt of his indifference and delay. Such undutiful neglect was severely reprov'd by the piety of his brother Manuel, who instantly sold or mortgaged all that he possessed, embarked for Venice, relieved his father, and pledged his own freedom to be responsible for the debt. On his return to Constantinople, the parent and king distinguished his two sons with suitable rewards; but the faith and manners of the slothful Palæologus had not been improv'd by his Roman pilgrimage; and his apostasy or conversion, devoid of any spiritual or temporal effects, was speedily forgotten by the Greeks and Latins.<sup>14</sup>

Thirty years after the return of Palæologus, his son and successor, Manuel, from a similar motive, but on a larger scale, again visited the countries of the West. In a preceding chapter I have related his treaty with Bajazet, the violation of that treaty, the siege or blockade of Constantinople, and the French succour under the command of the gallant Boucicault.<sup>15</sup> By his ambassadors, Manuel had solicited the Latin powers; but it was thought that the presence of a distressed monarch would draw tears and supplies from the hardest barbarians;<sup>16</sup> and the monarch who advised the journey, prepared the reception of the Byzantine prince. The land was occupied by the Turks; but the navigation of Venice was safe and open: Italy received him as the first, or, at least, as the second of the Christian princes; Manuel was pitied as the champion and confessor of the faith; and the dignity of his behaviour prevented that pity from sinking into contempt. From Venice he proceeded to Padua and Pavia; and even the duke of Milan, a secret ally of Bajazet, gave him safe and honourable conduct to the verge of his dominions.<sup>17</sup> On the confines of France<sup>18</sup> the royal officers undertook the care of his person, journey, and expenses; and two 8 See the two first original Lives of Urban V. in Martene, Script. Rerum Italicarum, tom. i. par. p. 627, 628, 629, 630. For the historical Annals of Spandau (tom. i. p. 373, A. D. 1366, Nov. 7) and Raynaldus (Floury, Hist. Eccles. tom. xx. p. 175, 174). Yet, in some variations, I suspect the papal writers of slightly magnifying the genuflexions of Palaeologus.

9. Pavlo minus quam a fuisse Imperator Romanorum. Yet this title of Imperator Germanicus was no longer equated with Urbis V. p. 623.).

10 It was conceded to the witnesses of Charles' age, and to them only on Christmas day. On that day, however, the "superstitious" dances were content to serve the purpose as he had done with the boys and the girls. Charles' age might have been 17, though even the property of A. D. 1768, November 1, for the whole year. He seems to have had a small value on the privilege, and the time of the year, and the time of the year.

<sup>12</sup> This torrent of English has not been noted by any other scholar.

France and leads after the peace of Breitenburg in 1763. Yet the expedition of Münster (1762-63) was not a failure either, for it had established a common cause against the European coalition and a the original historians. Nor do I find more in credit the Italian historians separated from Italy, who have taken on the contents

14 If return in 13 would then generate of Mammals, Sept 25, 1971, abundance. Page 1323 of 1319. The author was in 1971 for the case of var and ppm in 1971 of Andromeda.

reactions, as observed by the primary radical  $\text{C}_2\text{H}_5\text{O}^\bullet$  and  $\text{C}_2\text{H}_5^\bullet$ .

The following table shows the number of persons who have been convicted of crimes in the State of New York, from 1880 to 1890, and the number of persons who have been sentenced to the State Prison, from 1880 to 1890, by the State of New York.

to the fact that the French writers, in the last century, had not yet discovered the value of the  $\log$  function, and that the  $\log$  function was not yet known to the French writers.

thousand of the richest citizens, in arms and on horseback, came forth to meet him as far as Charenton, in the neighbourhood of the capital. At the gates of Paris, he was saluted by the chancellor and the parliament; and Charles the Sixth, attended by his princes and nobles, welcomed his brother with a cordial embrace. The successor of Constantine was clothed in a robe of white silk, and mounted on a milk-white steed; a circumstance, in the French ceremonial, of singular importance: the white colour is considered as the symbol of sovereignty; and, in a late visit, the German emperor, after an haughty demand and a peevish refusal, had been reduced to content himself with a black courser. Manuel was lodged in the Louvre; a succession of feasts and balls, the pleasures of the banquet and the chase, were ingeniously varied by the politeness of the French, to display their magnificence, and amuse his grief: he was indulged in the liberty of his chapel; and the doctors of the Sorbonne were astonished, and possibly scandalised, by the language, the rites, and the vestments, of his Greek clergy. But the slightest glance on the state of the kingdom must teach him to despair of any effectual assistance. The unfortunate Charles, though he enjoyed some lucid intervals, continually relapsed into furious or stupid insanity: the reins of government were alternately seized by his brother and uncle, the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, whose factious competition prepared the miseries of civil war. The former was a gay youth, dissolved in luxury and love: the latter was the father of John count of Nevers, who had so lately been ransomed from Turkish captivity; and, if the fearless son was ardent to revenge his defeat, the more prudent Burgundy was content with the cost and peril of the first experiment. When Manuel had satiated the curiosity, and perhaps fatigued the patience, of the French, he resolved on a visit to the adjacent island. In his progress from Dover, he was entertained at Canterbury with due reverence by the prior and monks of St. Austin; and, on Blackheath, king Henry the Fourth, with the English court, saluted the Greek hero (I copy our old historian), who, during many days, was lodged and treated in London as emperor of the East.<sup>19</sup> But the state of England was still more adverse to the design of the holy war. In the same year, the hereditary sovereign had been deposed and murdered: the reigning prince was a successful usurper, whose ambition was punished by jealousy and remorse: nor could Henry of Lancaster withdraw his person or forces from the defence of a throne incessantly shaken by conspiracy and rebellion. He pitied, he praised, he feasted, the emperor of

of England,
A. D. 1393,
December.

Manuel was lodged in the Louvre; a succession of feasts and balls, the pleasures of the banquet and the chase, were ingeniously varied by the politeness of the French, to display their magnificence, and amuse his grief: he was indulged in the liberty of his chapel; and the doctors of the Sorbonne were astonished, and possibly scandalised, by the language, the rites, and the vestments, of his Greek clergy. But the slightest glance on the state of the kingdom must teach him to despair of any effectual assistance. The unfortunate Charles, though he enjoyed some lucid intervals, continually relapsed into furious or stupid insanity: the reins of government were alternately seized by his brother and uncle, the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, whose factious competition prepared the miseries of civil war. The former was a gay youth, dissolved in luxury and love: the latter was the father of John count of Nevers, who had so lately been ransomed from Turkish captivity; and, if the fearless son was ardent to revenge his defeat, the more prudent Burgundy was content with the cost and peril of the first experiment. When Manuel had satiated the curiosity, and perhaps fatigued the patience, of the French, he resolved on a visit to the adjacent island. In his progress from Dover, he was entertained at Canterbury with due reverence by the prior and monks of St. Austin; and, on Blackheath, king Henry the Fourth, with the English court, saluted the Greek hero (I copy our old historian), who, during many days, was lodged and treated in London as emperor of the East.<sup>19</sup> But the state of England was still more adverse to the design of the holy war. In the same year, the hereditary sovereign had been deposed and murdered: the reigning prince was a successful usurper, whose ambition was punished by jealousy and remorse: nor could Henry of Lancaster withdraw his person or forces from the defence of a throne incessantly shaken by conspiracy and rebellion. He pitied, he praised, he feasted, the emperor of Constantinople; but if the English monarch assumed the cross, it was only to appease his people, and perhaps his conscience, by the merit or semblance of this pious intention.<sup>20</sup> Satisfied, however, with gifts and honours, Manuel returned to Paris; and, after a residence of two years in the West, shaped his course through Germany and Italy, embarked at Venice, and patiently expected, in the Morea, the moment of his ruin or deliverance. Yet he had escaped the ignominious necessity of offering his religion to public or private sale. The Latin church was distracted by the great schism: the kings, the nations, the universities, of Europe, were divided in their obedience between the popes of Rome and Avignon; and the emperor, anxious to conciliate the friendship of both parties, abstained from any correspondence with the indignant and unpopular rivals. His journey coincided with the year of the jubilee; but he passed through Italy without desiring, or deserving, the plenary indulgence which abolished the guilt or penance of the sins of the faithful. The Roman pope was offended by this neglect; accused him of irreverence to an image of Christ; and exhorted the princes of Italy to reject and abandon the obstinate schismatic.<sup>21</sup>

His return to Greece.
A. D. 1402.

During the period of the crusades, the Greeks beheld with astonishment and terror the perpetual stream of emigration that flowed, and continued to flow, from the unknown climates of the West. The visits of their last emperors removed the veil of separation, and they disclosed to their eyes the powerful nations of Europe, whom they no longer presumed to brand with the name of barbarians. The observations of Manuel, and his more inquisitive followers, have been preserved by a Byzantine historian of the times:<sup>22</sup> his scattered ideas I shall collect and abridge; and it may be amusing enough, perhaps instructive, to contemplate the rude pictures of Germany, France, and England, whose ancient and modern state are so familiar to our minds. I. GERMANY (says the Greek Chalcondyles) is of ample latitude from Vienna to the Ocean; and it stretches (a strange geography) from Prague in Bohemia to the river Tartessus, and the Pyrenean mountains.<sup>23</sup> The soil, except in figs and olives, is sufficiently fruitful; the air is salubrious; the bodies of the natives are robust and healthy; and these cold regions are seldom visited with the calamities of pestilence, or earthquakes. After the Scythians or Tartars, the Germans are the most numerous of nations; they are brave and patient, and were they united under a single head, their force would be irresistible. By the gift of the pope,

Greek knowledge and descriptions

of Germany;

<sup>19</sup> A short note of Manuel in England, is extracted by H. Hody from a MS. at Lambeth (de Graecis illustribus, p. 114). C. P. Imperator, duo varoque et horrendis Paganorum in-sultibus corruatus, ut p. 100. sequens textum triumphalem persequitur Anglorum Regem (statuere decrevit, &c.). Rex (scilicet Edwardus III.) p. 764. I. m. h. m. p. r. a. t. i. o. n. e. s. u. p. e. r. i. o. r. u. m. d. e. c. i. t. u. m. t. a. n. t. u. m. b. e. n. e. f. i. c. i. u. m. d. e. l. o. n. d. o. n. i. a. n. s. e. p. e. r. m. i. t. t. i. t. d. i. e. c. t. u. m. g. l. o. r. i. o. s. e. p. r. o. e. x. p. r. e. s. b. e. n. e. f. i. c. i. u. m. s. o. l. v. e. n. s. e. t. u. m. p. e. n. s. i. t. t. a. n. t. u. m. h. i. s. t. o. r. i. o. d. o. n. a. t. u. m. He repeats the same in his 11. d. c. l. i. x. N. o. t. a. t. i. o. n. e. 372. p.

<sup>20</sup> Shakepeare, again, ends the play of Henry IV. with that prince's vow of a crusade, and his belief that he should die in Jerusalem.

<sup>21</sup> This fact is preserved in the H. de France, p. 13. 179. 1478, published by M. Martin (Paris, 1766, c. 1. p. 17). The same is related, when the Greek text is referred to, which was probably a work of sculpture.

<sup>22</sup> The Greek and Turkish history of Laonicus Chalcondyles ends with the winter of 1165, and the abrupt conclusion seems to mark, that he laid down his pen in the same year. We know that he was an Athenian, and that some contemporaries of the same name contributed to the revival of the Greek language in Italy. But in his

41—50

<sup>23</sup> I shall not animadvert on the geographical errors of Chalcondyles. In this instance, he perhaps followed, and my task, Herodotus (l. iii. c. 73), whose text may be explained (Herodotus de rebus, tom. ii. p. 213, 220), or whose ignorance may be excused. If the modern Greeks never read Strabo, or any of their lesser geographers?

they have acquired the privilege of choosing the Roman emperor; <sup>94</sup> nor is any people more devoutly attached to the faith and obedience of the Latin patriarch. The greatest part of the country is divided among the princes and prelates; but Strasburgh, Cologne, Hanhurg, and more than two hundred free cities, are governed by sige and equal laws, according to the will, and for the advantage, of the whole community. The use of duels, or single combats on foot, prevails among them in peace and war; their industry excels in all the mechanic arts, and the Germans may boast of the invention of gunpowder and cannon, which is now diffused over the greatest part of the world. II. The king-part of the world. II. The kingdom of FRANCE is spread above fifteen or twenty days' journey from Germany to Spain, and from the Alps to the British Ocean; containing many flourishing cities, and among these Paris, the seat of the king, which surpasses the rest in riches and luxury. Many princes and lords alternately wait in his palace, and acknowledge him as their sovereign; the most powerful are the dukes of Bretagne and Burgundy, of whom the latter possesses the wealthy province of Flanders, whose harbours are frequented by the ships and merchants of our own, and the more remote, seas. The French are an ancient and opulent people: and their language and manners, though somewhat different, are not dissimilar from those of the Italians. Vain of the Imperial dignity of Charlemagne, of their victories over the Saracens, and of the exploits of their heroes, Oliver and Rowland;<sup>25</sup> they esteem themselves the first of the Western nations; but this foolish arrogance has been recently humbled by the unfortunate events of their wars against the English, the inhabitants of the British island. III. BRITAIN, of the British Island. THE DUTCH, in the ocean, and opposite to the shores of Flanders, may be considered either as one, or as three islands; but the whole is united by a common interest, by the same manners, and by a similar government. The measure of its circumference is five thousand stadia: the land is overspread with towns and villages, though destitute of wine, and not abounding in fruit-trees, it is fertile in wheat and barley; in honey and wool; and much cloth is manufactured by the inhabitants. In populousness and power, in riches and luxury, London,<sup>26</sup> the metropolis of the isle, may claim a pre-eminence over all the cities of the West. It is situate on the Thames, a broad and rapid river, which at the distance of thirty miles falls into the Gallic Sea; and the daily flow and ebb of the tide affords a safe entrance and departure to the vessels of commerce. The king is the head of a powerful and turbulent aristocracy; his principal vassals hold their estates by a free and unalterable tenure; and the laws define the limits of his authority and their obedience. The kingdom has been often afflicted by foreign conquest and domestic sedition; but the natives are bold and hardy, renowned in arms and victorious in war. The form of their shields or targets is derived from the Italians, that of their swords from the Greeks; the use of the long bow is the peculiar and decisive advantage of the English. Their language bears no affinity to the idioms of the continent: in the habits of domestic life, they are not easily distinguished from their neighbours of France; but the most singular circumstance of their manners is their disregard of conjugal honour and of female chastity. In their mutual visits, as the first act of hospitality, the guest is welcomed in the embraces of their wives and daughters: among friends they are lent and borrowed without shame: nor are the islanders offended at this strange commerce, and its inevitable consequences.<sup>47</sup> Informed as we are of the customs of old England, and assured of the virtue of our mothers, we may smile at the credulity, or resent the injustice, of the Greek, who must have confounded a modest salute<sup>48</sup> with a criminal embrace. But his credulity and injustice may teach an important lesson; to distrust the accounts of foreign and remote nations, and to suspend our belief of every tale that deviates from the laws of nature and the character of man.<sup>49</sup>

After his return, and the victory of Timour, Manuel reigned many years in prosperity and peace. As long as the sons of Bajazet solicited his friendship and spared his dominions, he was satisfied with the national religion; and his leisure was employed in composing twenty theological dialogues for its defence. The appearance of the Byzantine ambassadors at the council of Constantine<sup>29</sup> announces the restoration of the Turkish power, as well as of the Latin church; the conquest of the sultans, Mahomet and Amurath, reconciled the emperor to the Vatican; and the siege of Constantinople almost tempted him to acquiesce in the double procession of the Holy Ghost. When Martin the Fifth ascended without a rival the chair of St. Peter, a friendly intercourse of letters and embassies was revived between the East and West. Ambition on one side, and distress on the other, dictated the same decent language of charity and peace: the artful Greek expressed a desire of marrying his six sons to Italian princesses; and the Roman, not less artful, despatched the daughter of the marquis of Montferrat, with

24. A citizen of new Rome, while new Rome survived, would have scorned to dignify the German ἄρξ with the titles of βασιλεὺς or διοκράτωρ Ῥωμαίων, but all pride was extinct in the bosom of ῥητορδοξίαι, and he described the Byzantine prince, and his subject, by the proper, though humble, names of Ἕλληνας, and βασιλεὺς Ἑλληνῶν.

2) Most of the old romances were translated in the sixteenth century into French prose, and soon became the favourite amusement of the knights and ladies in the court of Charles VI. If a Greek believed in the exploits of Rowland and Oliver, he may surely be excused, since the monks of St. Denis, the national historians, have inserted the fables of archbishop Turpin in their Chronicles of France.

Tables of an archbishop Turpin in their chronicles or I ranse ὅτι τοῦτον . . . οὐκ ἐπὶ τὰς ἀνάγκας τε προσηλόντες τοῖς ἐν τῇ πόλει ταύτῃ παλαιά + νέωσι, οὕτως τε αὖτε πρὸς αὐτὴν εὐχρηστικὰς συνέσεις καὶ πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς διέτασσιν. Even since the time of Eusebius (the mid-fourth cent.), London appears to have maintained this preoccupation of wealth and magnificence, and her gradual increase has, at last, kept pace with the general improvement of Europe.

27. If the double sense of the verb eva (ocular, and in utero geno) be emotional, the context and poetic horror of Chalcandyles can leave no doubt of his meaning and mistake in 191.

25 Erasmus (Epist. Frodo Andrelini) has a pretty passage on the English fashion of kissing strangers on their arrival and departure, from whence, however, he draws no moral at all, and none.

20) Perhaps we may apply this remark to the community of wives among the old Britons, as it is supposed by Caesar and Dion (Dion Cassius, 2, lxxviii, p. 1007) to have been as odious an institution. The Asperitas of Othobare, so certain at first, is become less visible and scoldish, in proportion as we have studied the manners of that gentle and amorous people.

for the ecclesiastical history of the times, the Annals of Sponanus, the Recherches de Lapon, the xv and xvii and xviii volumes of the History, or rather the Continuation, of Henry a company of noble virgins, to soften, by their charms, the obstinacy of the schismatics. Yet under this mask of zeal, a discerning eye will perceive that all was hollow and insincere in the court and church of Constantinople. According to the vicissitudes of danger and repose, the emperor advanced or retreated; alternately instructed and disavowed his ministers; and escaped from an importunate pressure by urging the duty of enquiry, the obligation of collecting the sense of his patriarchs and bishops, and the impossibility of convening them at a time when the Turkish arms were at the gates of his capital. From a review of the public transactions it will appear, that the Greeks insisted on three successive measures, a succour, a council, and a final re-union; while the Latins eluded the second, and only promised the first, as a consequential and voluntary reward of the third. But we have an opportunity of unfolding the most secret intentions of Manuel, as he explained them in a private conversation without artifice or disguise. In his declining age, the emperor had associated John Palæologus, the second of the name, and the eldest of his sons, on whom he devolved the greatest part of the authority and weight of government. One day, in the presence only of the historian Phranza,<sup>31</sup> his favourite chamberlain, he opened to his colleague and successor the true principle of his negotiations with the pope.<sup>32</sup> "Our last resource," said Manuel, "against the Turks is their fear of our union with the Latins, of the warlike nations of the West, who may arm for our relief and for their destruction. As often as you are threatened by the miscreants, present this danger before their eyes. Propose a council; consult on the means; but ever delay and avoid the convocation of an assembly, which cannot tend either to our spiritual or temporal emolument. The Latins are proud; the Greeks are obstinate; neither party will recede or retract; and the attempt of a perfect union will confirm the schism, alienate the churches, and leave us, without hope or defence, at the mercy of the barbarians." Inpatient of this salutary lesson, the royal youth arose from his seat, and departed in silence; and the wise monarch continues Phranza, casting his eyes on me, thus resumed his discourse. "My son deems himself a great and heroic prince, but, alas! our miserable age does not afford scope for heroism or greatness. His daring spirit might have suited the happier times of our ancestors; but the present state requires not an emperor, but a cautious steward of the last relics of our fortunes. Well do I remember the fifty expectations which he built on our alliance with Mustapha; and much do I fear, that his rash courage will urge the ruin of our house, and that even religion may precipitate our down-

"fal." Yet the experience and authority of Manuel preserved the peace, and eluded the council; till, in the seventy-eighth year of his age, and in the habit of a monk, he terminated his career, dividing his precious moveables among his children and the poor, his physicians and his favourite servants. Of his six sons,<sup>33</sup> Andronicus the Second was invested with the principality of Thessalonica, and died of a leprosy soon after the sale of that city to the Venetians and its final conquest by the Turks. Some fortunate incidents had restored Peloponnesus, or the Morea, to the empire; and in his more prosperous days, Manuel had fortified the narrow isthmus of six miles<sup>34</sup> with a stone wall and one hundred and fifty-three towers. The wall was overthrown by the first blast of the Ottomans: the fertile peninsula might have been sufficient for the four younger brothers, Theodore and Constantine, Demetrius and Thomas; but they wasted in domestic contests the remains of their strength; and the least successful of the rivals were reduced to a life of dependence in the Byzantine palace.

The eldest of the sons of Manuel, John Palæologus the Second, was acknowledged, after his father's death, as the sole emperor of the Greeks. He immediately proceeded to repudiate his wife, and to contract a new marriage with the princess of Trebizond; beauty was in his eyes the first qualification of an empress; and the clergy had yielded to his firm assurance, that unless he might be indulged in a divorce, he would retire to a cloister, and leave the throne to his brother Constantine. The first, and in truth the only, victory of Palæologus, was over a Jew,<sup>35</sup> whom, after a long and learned dispute, he converted to the Christian faith; and this momentous conquest is carefully recorded in the history of the times. But he soon resumed the design of uniting the East and West; and, regardless of his father's advice, listened, as it should seem with sincerity, to the proposal of meeting the pope in a general council beyond the Adriatic. This dangerous project was encouraged by Martin the Fifth, and coldly entertained by his successor Eugenius, till, after a tedious negotiation, the emperor received a summons from a Latin assembly of a new character, the independent prelates of Basil, who styled themselves the representatives and judges of the Catholic church.

The Roman pontiff had fought and conquered in the cause of ecclesiastical freedom; but the victorious clergy were soon exposed to the tyranny of their deliverer; and his sacred character was invulnerable to those arms which they found so keen and effectual against the civil magistrate. Their great charter, the right of election, was annition. Though last, Simonides, Εὐαγγέλιον, 1004, so deficient in accuracy, and in the edition of the Biblioth. Græc. tom. vi. p. 63, 636.

<sup>31</sup> From his early youth, George Phranza, or Phranza, was employed in the service of the great emperor. He is called by the Greek writers, Βασιλικὸς ἀρχαῖος, and is the father of a family which has since been ennobled from a high rank, and has the honour of having produced a pope, who reigned in the year 1522. Phranza is mentioned in the history of the emperor John, and in the history of the emperor Manuel.

<sup>32</sup> See Phranza, l. i. c. 17. While the emperor Manuel was at the Greek court, he was visited by the emperor of the East, and the emperor of the West, who were both present at the coronation of the emperor Manuel.

<sup>33</sup> See Phranza, l. i. c. 17. The eldest of the sons of Manuel, John Palæologus the Second, was acknowledged, after his father's death, as the sole emperor of the Greeks.

<sup>34</sup> The wall of Manuel, which was built by the emperor Manuel, was destroyed by the Turks, and the wall of the emperor Manuel was destroyed by the Turks.

hiliated by appeals, evaded by trusts or commendams, disappointed by reversionary grants, and superseded by previous and arbitrary reservations.<sup>35</sup> A public auction was instituted in the court of Rome: the cardinals and favourites were enriched with the spoils of nations; and every country might complain that the most important and valuable benefices were accumulated on the heads of aliens and absentees. During their residence at Avignon, the ambition of the popes subsided in the meaner passions of avarice<sup>37</sup> and luxury; they rigorously imposed on the clergy the tributes of first-fruits and tithes; but they freely tolerated the impunity of vice, disorder, and corruption.

A. D. 1378-1392. These manifold scandals were aggravated by the great schism of the West, which continued above fifty years. In the furious conflicts of Rome and Avignon, the vices of the rivals were mutually exposed; and their precarious situation degraded their authority, relaxed their discipline, and multiplied their wants and exactions. To heal the Council of Pisa, A.D. 1199, of the year 1199, and Constance<sup>38</sup> were successively convened; but these great assemblies, conscious of their strength, resolved to vindicate the privileges of the Christian aristocracy. From a personal sentence against two pontiffs, whom they rejected, and a third, their acknowledged sovereign, whom they deposed, the fathers of Constance proceeded to examine the nature and limits of the Roman supremacy; nor did they separate till they had established the authority, above the pope, of a general council. It was enacted, that, for the government and reformation of the church, such assemblies should be held at regular intervals; and that each synod, before its dissolution, should appoint the time and place of the subsequent meeting. By the influence of the court of Rome, the next convocation at Sienna was easily eluded; but the bold and vigorous proceedings of the council of Basil<sup>99</sup> had almost been fatal to the reigning pontiff, Eugenius the Fourth. A just suspicion of his design prompted the fathers to hasten the promulgation of their first decree, that the representatives of the church-militant on earth were invested with a divine and spiritual jurisdiction over all Christians, without excepting the pope; and that a general council could not be dissolved, prorogued, or transferred, unless by their free deliberation and consent. On the notice that Eugenius had fulminated a bull for that purpose, they ventured to summon, to admonish, to threaten, to censure, the contumacious successor of St. Peter. After many delays, to allow time for repentance, they finally declared, that, unless he submitted within the term of sixty days, he was suspended from the exercise of all temporal and ecclesiastical authority. And to mark their jurisdiction over the prince as well as the priest, they assumed the government of Avignon, annulled the alienation of the sacred patrimony, and protected Rome from the imposition of new taxes. Their boldness was justified, not only by the general opinion of the clergy, but by the support and power of the first monarchs of Christendom: the emperor Sigismund declared himself the servant and protector of the synod; Germany and France adhered to their cause; the duke of Milan was the enemy of Eugenius; and he was driven from the Vatican by an insurrection of the Roman people. Rejected at the same time by his temporal and spiritual subjects, submission was his only choice: by a most humiliating bull, the pope repealed his own acts, and ratified those of the council; incorporated his legates and cardinals with that venerable body; and seemed to resign himself to the decrees of the supreme legislature. Their fame pervaded the countries of the East; and it was in their presence that Sigismund received the ambassadors of the Turkish sultan,<sup>40</sup> who laid at his feet twelve large vases, filled with robes of silk and pieces of gold.

[illegible]

The original article of the author is published in the Journal of the American Library Association, Vol. 1, No. 1, 1906, pp. 1-10. The article is also published in the Journal of the American Library Association, Vol. 1, No. 1, 1906, pp. 1-10.

The fathers of Basil aspired to the glory of reducing the Greeks, as well as the Bohemians, within the pale of the church; and their deputies invited the emperor and patriarch of Constantinople to unite with an assembly which possessed the confidence of the Western nations. Palaeologus was not averse to the proposal; and his ambassadors were introduced with due honours into the Catholic senate. But the choice of the place appeared to be an insuperable obstacle, since he refused to pass the Alps, or the sea of Sicily, and positively required that the synod should be adjourned to some convenient city in Italy, or at least on the Danube. The other articles of this treaty were more readily stipulated; it was agreed to defray the travelling expenses of the emperor, with a train of seven hundred persons,<sup>41</sup> to remit an immediate sum of eight thousand ducats;<sup>42</sup> for the accommodation of the Greek clergy; and in his absence to grant a supply of ten thousand ducats, with three hundred archers and some galleys, for the protection of Constantinople. The city of Avignon advanced the funds for the preliminary expenses; and the embarkation was prepared at Marseilles with some difficulty and delay.

[illegible]

John Palæologus embarks in the pope's galleys.
A.D. 1457,
Nov. 24.

In his distress, the friendship of Palæologus was disputed by the ecclesiastical powers of the West ; but the dexterous activity of a prevailed over the slow debates and temper of a republic. The decrees of usually tended to circumscribe the of the pope, and to erect a supreme tribunal in the church. Eugene patient of the yoke ; and the union might afford a decent pretence a rebellious synod from the Rhine. The independence of the fathers they passed the Alps : Savoy or which they succeeded with reluctance, at Constantinople as situate far pillars of Hercules ;<sup>43</sup> the emperor were apprehensive of the dangers of migration ; they were offended by an aration, that after suppressing the of the Bohemians, the council would the old heresy of the Greeks,<sup>44</sup> of Eugenius, all was smooth, and and respectful : and he invited the onarch to heal by his presence the e Latin, as well as of the Eastern, rary, near the coast of the Adriatic, d for their amicable interview ; and ndulgence of forgery and theft, a decree was procured, which transmod, with its own consent, to that Nine galleys were equipped for t Venice, and in the isle of Candia ; e anticipated the slower vessels of a Roman admiral was commissioned, and destroy ;<sup>45</sup> and these priestly ight have encountered each other seas where Athens and Sparta had attended for the pre-eminence of ulted by the impertinuity of the o were ready to fight for the possi- ble person, Palæologus he-itated t his palace and country on a niment. His father's advice still memory : and reason must sug- ce the Latins were divided among ey could never unite in a foreign nion. d dissuaded the unreasonable s advice was impartial, since he e council ; and it was enforced by elief, that the German Cæsar would reek his heir and successor in the West.<sup>46</sup> Even the Turkish sultan was a counsellor whom it might be unsafe to trust, but whom it was dangerous to offend. Amurath was unskilled in the disputes, but he was apprehensive of the union, of the Christians. From his own treasures, he offered to relieve the wants of the Byzantine court; yet he declared with seeming magnanimity, that Constantinople should be secure and inviolate, in the absence of her sovereign.<sup>47</sup> The resolution of Palæologus was decided by the most splendid gifts and the most specious promises: he wished to escape for a while from a scene of danger and distress; and after dismissing with an ambiguous answer the messengers of the council, he declared his intention of embarking in the Roman galleys. The age of the patriarch Joseph was more susceptible of fear than of hope; he trembled at the perils of the sea, and expressed his apprehension, that his feeble voice, with thirty perhaps of his orthodox brethren, would be oppressed in a foreign land by the power and numbers of a Latin synod. He yielded to the royal mandate, to the flattering assurance, that he would be heard as the oracle of nations, and to the secret wish of learning from his brother of the West, to deliver the church from the yoke of kings.<sup>48</sup> The five cross-bearers, or dignitaries, of St. Sophia, were bound to attend his person; and one of these, the great ecclesiarch or preacher, Sylvester Syropulus,<sup>49</sup> has composed a free and curious history<sup>50</sup> of the false union.<sup>51</sup> Of the clergy that reluctantly obeyed the summons of the emperor and the patriarch, submission was the first duty, and patience the most useful virtue. In a chosen list of twenty bishops, we discover the metropolitan titles of Heraclea and Cyzicus, Nice and Nicomedia, Ephesus and Trebizond, and the personal merit of Mark and Bessarion, who, in the confidence of their learning and eloquence, were promoted to the episcopal rank. Some monks and philosophers were named to display the science and sanctity of the Greek church; and the service of the choir was performed by a select band of singers and musicians. The patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, appeared by their genuine or fictitious deputies; the primate of Russia represented a national church, and the Greeks might contend with the Latins in the extent of their spiritual empire. The precious vases of St. Sophia were exposed to the winds and waves, that the patriarch might officiate with

[illegible]

43. The duke (in 26-31) attests his own indignation, and that of his own troops, and the like denunciations, who excused the rash decision, could neither deny nor justify an act so monstrous.

44. Consequently, the poet's nephew and natural, expressly declared, the duke's excuse was that the duke's troops were as he was sovereign (26-31). But, as he himself said, that was not the reason. The naval victory of the signal was less pure victory, and, till the hostile squadron appeared, both parties tried to conceal their quarrel from the troops.

45. Scrupulus mentions the hopes of P'ia-t'ien (p. 36), and the last advice of Ssu-ma (p. 37). At first, the weak emperor was unfilled of his friend's death, had he known it sooner, he would have been much less so.

... was of the ... program
... Turkish
... mentioned by Symonin (p. 1), and Amrath
... word He might threaten (p. 122, 219), but he never at-
... the city

18 The reader will smile at the simplicity with which he imparted these homilies to his favourites. ταυτην πληροφοριαν σχησεν ηλπιζε και δε ο τον Παπα ελευθερωσαι τι εκκλινει απο τη αποστολη αυτου δοτικας παρα τον βασιλεως (μ. 12). Yet it would have been difficult for him to have understood the issue of Gregory VII.

19 The Christian name of Sylvester is borrowed from the Latin caesdr. In modern Greek, caesdr, as a diminutive, is added to the end of words, not as any reasoning of Caesdrion, the editor, excuse his changing into Synagros (Syngr), because the Synagros of his own manuscript, whose name is subscribed with his own hand in the title of the council of Florence. Why might not the author be of Syrian extraction?

54) From the conclusion of the history, I should fix the date to the year 1111, four years after the synod, when the great eccl<sup>i</sup>-arch had abdicated his office (sectio xii. p. 750-750.). His passions were cooled by time and retirement, and, although Synopulus is often partial, he is never intemperate.

is highly interesting; erate.

51 Pera iudiorum monita non tunc inter Graecos et Latinos (Hagen Comamune, 1604, in folio), was first published with a base and florid versification by Robert T. Neuchamp, a chaplain to Charles II, in his exile. The text of the treatise, which preached a polemic title, for the beginning of the original is wanted, and the polemic title may be raised with the best of the Byzantine writers for the merits of his native land, and even of his style, but he is excluded from the orthodox collections of the councils.

becoming splendour ; whatever gold the emperor could procure, was expended in the massy ornaments of his bed and chariot ;<sup>52</sup> and while they affected to maintain the prosperity of their ancient fortune, they quarrelled for the division of fifteen thousand ducats, the first alms of the Roman pontiff. After the necessary preparations, John Palæologus, with a numerous train, accompanied by his brother Demetrius, and the most respectable persons of the church and state, embarked in eight vessels with sail and oars, which steered through the Turkish Straits of Gallipoli to the Archipelago, the Morea, and the Adriatic Gulf.<sup>53</sup>

After a tedious and troublesome navigation of seventy-seven days, this religious squadron cast anchor before Venice; and their reception proclaimed the joy and magnificence of that powerful republic. In the command of the world, the modest Augustus had never claimed such honours from his subjects as were paid to his feeble successor by an independent state. Seated on the poop, on a lofty throne, he received the visit, or, in the Greek style, the adoration, of the doge and senators.<sup>34</sup> They sailed in the Bucentaur, which was accompanied by twelve stately galleys: the sea was over-spread with innumerable gondolas of pomp and pleasure; the air resounded with music and acclamations; the mariners, and even the vessels, were dressed in silk and gold; and in all the emblems and pageants, the Roman eagles were blended with the lions of St. Mark. The triumphal procession, ascending the great canal, passed under the bridge of the Rialto; and the Eastern strangers gazed with admiration on the palaces, the churches, and the populousness of a city, that seems to float on the bosom of the waves.<sup>35</sup> They sighed to behold the spoils and trophies with which it had been decorated after the sack of Constantinople. After an hospitable entertainment of fifteen days, Palæologus pursued his journey by land and water from Venice to Ferrara: and, on this occasion, the pride of the Vatican was tempered by policy to indulge the ancient dignity of the emperor of the East.

He made his entry on a black horse; but a milk-white steed, whose trappings were embroidered with golden eagles, was led before him; and the canopy was borne over his head by the princes of Este, the sons or kinsmen of Nicholas, marquis of the city, and a sovereign more powerful than himself.<sup>56</sup> Palaologus did not alight till he reached the bottom of the staircase: the pope advanced to the door of the apartment; refused his proffered genuflection; and, after a paternal embrace, conducted the emperor to a seat on his left hand. Nor would the patriarch descend from his galley, till a ceremony, almost equal, had been stipulated between the bishops of Rome and Constantinople. The latter was saluted by his brother with a kiss of union and charity; nor would any of the Greek ecclesiastics submit to kiss the feet of the Western primate. On the opening of the synod, the place of honour in the centre was claimed by the temporal and ecclesiastical chiefs; and it was only by alleging that his predecessors had not assisted in person at Nice or Chalcedon, that Eugenius could evade the ancient precedents of Constantine and Marcian. After much debate, it was agreed that the right and left sides of the church should be occupied by the two nations; that the solitary chair of St. Peter should be raised the first of the Latin line; and that the throne of the Greek emperor, at the head of his clergy, should be equal and opposite to the second place, the vacant seat of the emperor of the West.<sup>37</sup>

But as soon as festivity and form had given place to a more serious treaty, the Greeks were dissatisfied with their journey, with themselves, and with the pope. The artful pencil of his emissaries had painted him in a prosperous state; at the head of the princes and prelates of Europe, obedient at his voice, to believe and to arm. The thin appearance of the universal synod of Ferrara betrayed his weakness; and the Latins opened the first session with only five archbishops, eighteen bishops, and ten abbots, the greatest part of whom were the subjects or countrymen of the Italian pontiff. Except the duke of Burgundy, none of the potentates of the West condescended to appear in person, or by their ambassadors; nor was it possible to suppress the judicial acts of Basil against the dignity and person of Eugenius, which were finally concluded by a new election. Under these circumstances, a truce or delay was asked and granted, till Palæologus could expect from the consent of the Latins some temporal reward for an unpopular union; and, after the first session, the public proceedings were adjourned above six months. The emperor, with a chosen band of his favourites and Janizaries, fixed his summer residence at a pleasant spacious monastery, six miles from Ferrara; forgot, in the pleasures of the chace, the distress of the church and state; and persisted in destroying the game, without listening to the just complaints of the marquis or the husbandman.<sup>58</sup> In the mean while, his unfortunate Greeks were exposed to all the miseries of exile and poverty; for the support of each

Council of the Greeks and Latins at Ferrara and Florence.
A. D. 1458,
Oct. 8—
A. D. 1459,
July 6.

52 Scytopolus (p. 633) simply expresses his intention in οὐκ ἔστιν ἡμῶν ἐκ τῆς ἡμετέρας ἀρχῆς, and the Latin of Crælius may add a statement of his first par phrase: Et pompâ circumductus noster Imperator Italicis populis adque deamuratus Iupiter crederetur, aut et rous exequenta (p. 633).

to Varnie and that the before the

[illegible]

most splendid of the Christian cities. For the spoils of Constantinople at Venice, see Symonds, l.c. 87.

of Venice, see Symposium, p. 17.

57 The Latin vulgar was provoked to laughter at the strange dresses of the Greek, and deeply envied the length of their garments, their sleeves, and their hems, nor was the emperor distinguished, except by the purple colour, and his diadem or corona with a jewel on the top.

[illegible]

While they were lost in a cloud of dust and darkness, the pope and emperor were desirous of a seeming union, which could alone accomplish the purposes of their interview; and the obstinacy of public dispute was softened by the arts of private and personal negotiation. The patriarch Joseph had sunk under the weight of age and infirmities; his dying voice breathed the counsels of charity and concord, and his vacant benefice might tempt the hopes of the ambitious clergy. The ready and active obedience of the archbishops of Russia and Nice, of Isidore and Bessarion, was prompted and recompensed by their speedy promotion to the dignity of cardinals. Bessarion, in the first debates, had stood forth the most strenuous and eloquent champion of the Greek church; and if the apostate, the bastard, was reprobated by his country,<sup>65</sup> he appears in ecclesiastical story a rare example of a patriot who was recommended to court-favour by loud opposition and well-timed compliance. With the aid of his two spiritual coadjutors, the emperor applied his arguments to the general situation and personal characters of the bishops, and each was successively moved by authority and example. Their revenues were in the hands of the Turks, their persons in those of the Latins; an episcopal treasure, three robes and forty ducats, was soon exhausted; <sup>66</sup> the hopes of their return still depended on the ships of Venice and the alms of Rome; and such was their indigence, that their arrears, the payment of a debt, would be accepted as a favour, and might operate as a bribe.<sup>67</sup> The danger and relief of Constantinople might excuse some prudent and pious dissimulation; and it was insinuated, that the obstinate heretics who should resist the consent of the East and West, would be abandoned in a hostile land to the revenge or justice of the Roman pontiff.<sup>68</sup> In the first private assembly of the Greeks, the formulary of union was approved by twenty-four, and rejected by twelve, members; but the five cross-bearers of St. Sophia, who aspired to represent the patriarch, were disqualified by ancient discipline; and their right of voting was transferred to an obsequious train of monks, grammarians, and profane laymen. The will of the monarch produced a false and servile unanimity, and no more than two patriots had courage to speak their own sentiments and those of their country. Demetrius, the emperor's brother, retired to Venice, that he might not be witness of the union; and Mark of Ephesus, mistaking perhaps his pride for his conscience, disclaimed all communion with the Latin heretics, and avowed himself the champion and confessor of the orthodox creed.<sup>69</sup> In the treat-between the two nations, several forms of consent were proposed, such as might satisfy the Latins, without dishonouring the Greeks: and they weighed the scruples of words and syllables, till the theological balance trembled with a slight preponderance in favour of the Vatican. It was agreed (I must entreat the attention of the reader), that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son, as from one principle and one substance; that he proceeds by the Son, being of the same nature and substance, and that he proceeds from the Father and the Son, by one inspiration and production. It is less difficult to understand the articles of the preliminary treaty; that the pope should defray all the expenses of the Greeks in their return home; that he should annually maintain two galleys and three hundred soldiers for the defence of Constantinople; that all the ships which transported pilgrims to Jerusalem should be obliged to touch at that port; that as often as they were required, the pope should furnish ten galleys for a year, or twenty for six months; and that he should powerfully solicit the princes of Europe, if the emperor had occasion for land-forces.

The same year, and almost the same day, were marked by the deposition of Eugenius at Basil; and, at Florence, by his re-union of the Greeks and Latins. In the former synod (which he styled indeed an assembly of damns), the pope was branded with the guilt of simony, perjury, tyranny, heresy, and schism; <sup>70</sup> and declared to be inexcusable in his vices, unworthy of any title, and incapable of holding any ecclesiastical office. In the latter he was received as the true and holy vicar of Christ, who, after a separation of six hundred years, had reconciled the Catholics of the East and West, in one fold, and under one shepherd. The act of union was subscribed by the pope, the emperor, and the principal members of both churches; even by those who, like Syropulus, <sup>71</sup> had been deprived of the right of voting. Two copies might have sufficed for the East and West; but Eugenius was not satisfied, unless four authentic and similar transcripts were signed and attested as the monuments of his victory. <sup>72</sup> On a memorable day, the 6th of July, the successors of St. Peter and Constantine ascended their thrones; the two nations assembled in the cathedral of Florence; their representatives, cardinal Julian and Bessarion archbishop of Nice, appeared in the pulpit, and, after reading in their respective tongues the act of union, they mutually embraced, in the name and the presence of their applauding brethren. The pope and his mini-

Fugerus deposed at Basl.
A. D. 1179,
June 25.

Re union of the Greeks at Florence
A. D. 1478,
1479.

65 See the polite altercation of Mark and Bessarion in Syropoulos (p. 237), who never dissembles the vices of his own party, and fairly praises the virtues of the Latins.

66 For the poverty of the Greek bishops, see a remarkable passage of Lucas (c. 31.). One had possessed, for his whole property, three old gowns, &c. By teaching one and twenty years in his monastery, Bessarion himself had collected forty gold dinars, but of these the archbishop had expended twenty-eight in his ravage from Peloponnesus, and the remainder at Constantinople (Symonides, p. 127).

67 Syropulus denies that the Greeks received any money in fire they had subscribed the act of union (p. 287). Yet he relates some suspicious circumstances, and their bribery and corruption are positively without being silenced by the soothing or the lashes of the royal attendants (Synopol p. 257, 258).

69) I had forgot brother pugilist and orthodox protester a few white bound, who usually lay quiet on the face of the emperor's decree, but who barked most furiously while the act of union was revealing.

(7) From the original lives in the copies, in which the Compendium (tom. iii p. ii. tom. xiv), the manners of Eugenius IV appear to have been decent, and even exemplary. His situation, exposed to the world and to his enemies, was a restraint, and is a pledge 71 Syropulus, rather than subscribe, would have assisted, as the least evil, at the ceremony of the union. He was compelled to do both, and the great ecclesiarch poorly excuses his submission to the emperor (p. 200, 202).

[illegible]

sters then officiated according to the Roman liturgy; the creed was chanted with the addition of filioque; the acquiescence of the Greeks was poorly excused by their ignorance of the harmonious, but inarticulate, sounds; <sup>73</sup> and the more scrupulous Latins refused any public celebration of the Byzantine rite. Yet the emperor and his clergy were not totally unmindful of national honour. The treaty was ratified by their consent: it was tacitly agreed that no innovation should be attempted in their creed or ceremonies: they spared, and secretly respected, the generous firmness of Mark of Ephesus; and, on the decease of the patriarch, they refused to elect his successor, except in the cathedral of St. Sophia.

In the distribution of public and private rewards, the liberal pontiff exceeded their hopes and his promises: the Greeks, with less pomp and pride, returned by the same road of Ferrara and Venice; and their reception at Constantinople was such as will be described in the following chapter. <sup>74</sup> The success of the first trial encouraged Eugenius to repeat the same edifying scenes; and the deputies of the Armenians, the Maronites, the Jacobites of Syria and Egypt, the Nestorians and the Ethiopians, were successively introduced, to kiss the feet of the Roman pontiff, and to announce the obedience and the orthodoxy of the East. These Oriental embassies, unknown in the countries which they presumed to represent, <sup>75</sup> diffused over the West the fame of Eugenius; and a clamour was artfully propagated against the remnant of a schism in Switzerland and Savoy, which alone impeded the harmony of the Christian world. The vigour of opposition was succeeded by the lassitude of despair: the council of Basil was silently dissolved, and Fœlix, renouncing the tiara, again withdrew to the devout or delicious hermitage of Ripaille. <sup>76</sup> A general peace was secured by mutual acts of oblivion and indemnity: all ideas of reformation subsided; the popes continued to exercise and abuse their ecclesiastical despotism; nor has Rome been since disturbed by the mischiefs of a contested election. <sup>77</sup>

The journeys of three emperors were unavailing for their temporal, or perhaps their spiritual, salvation; but they were productive of a beneficial consequence; the revival of the Greek learning in Italy, from whence it was propagated to the last nations of the West and North. In their lowest servitude and depression, the subjects of the Byzantine throne were still possessed of a golden key that could unlock the treasures of antiquity; of a musical and prolific language, that gives a soul to the objects of sense, and a body to the abstractions of philosophy. Since the barriers of the monarchy, and even of the capital, had been trampled under foot, the various barbarians had doubtless corrupted the form and substance of the national dialect; and ample glossaries have been composed, to interpret a multitude of words of Arabic, Turkish, Slavonian, Latin, or French origin. <sup>78</sup> But a purer idiom was spoken in the court and taught in the college; and the flourishing state of the language is described, and perhaps embellished, by a learned Italian, <sup>79</sup> who, by a long residence and noble marriage, <sup>80</sup> was naturalised at Constantinople about thirty years before the Turkish conquest. "The vulgar speech," says Philéppus, <sup>81</sup> "has been depraved by the people, and infected by the multitude of strangers and merchants, who every day flock to the city and mingle with the inhabitants. It is from the disciples of such a school that the Latin language received the versions of Aristotle and Plato, so obscure in sense, and in spirit so poor. But the Greeks who have escaped the contagion, are those whom we follow; and they alone are worthy of our imitation. In familiar discourse, they still speak the tongue of Aristophanes and Euripides, of the historians and philosophers of Athens; and the style of their writings is still more elaborate and correct. The persons who, by their birth and offices, are attached to the Byzantine court, are those who maintain, with the least alloy, the ancient standard of elegance and purity; and the native graces of language most conspicuously shine among the noble matrons, who are excluded from all intercourse with foreigners. With foreigners, do I say? They live retired and sequestered from the eyes of their fellow-citizens. Seldom are they seen in the streets; and when they leave their houses, it is in the dusk of evening, on visits to the churches and their nearest kindred. On these occasions, they are on horseback, covered with a veil, and encompassed by their parents, their husbands, or their servants." <sup>82</sup>

Among the Greeks, a numerous and opulent

Some Persæ words may be found in Xenophon, and some Latin ones in Plautus; and such is the inevitable effect of war and commerce, but the form and substance of the language were not affected by this slight alloy.

<sup>79</sup> The life of Francis Philéppus, a sophist, proud, restless, and rapacious, has been recently composed by Lancelotti (Memories of Francis Philéppus, de Fontenay, tom. x. p. 691, 731.) and Dandolo (Storia della Letteratura Italiana, tom. viii. p. 282-293) for the most part from his own letters. His elaborate writings, and those of his

of Greece and the emperors of Constantinople.

<sup>82</sup> Philéppus, absolutely exact, charges the Greek or Oriental jealousy on the narrowness of ancient Rome.

Their return to Constantinople. A.D. 1449, Feb. 1.

Final peace of the church. A.D. 1449.

State of the Greek language at Constantinople. A.D. 1500-1535.

<sup>73</sup> Hæc. A. d. c. armis, et non dictis (S. suppl. p. 297.)

<sup>74</sup> In the autumn, the Greeks arrived at Bologna with the ambassadors of England, and after some questions and answers, these unhappy strangers laughed at the pretended union of Florence (Synop. p. 507.)

<sup>75</sup> No nations, or rather so feeble, are those remnants of the Nestorians, Jacobites, &c. that I have turned over, without success, the Bibliotheca Orientalis of Assemanus, a faithful slave of the Vatican.

<sup>76</sup> Ripaille is situated near Thonon in Savoy, on the southern side of the lake of Geneva. It is now a garden and vine; and Mr. Addison (Travels into Italy, vol. i. p. 117, 118, of 1685) visited it, and his works have celebrated the pleasure of the founder. Jeanes Sylvius, and the fathers of Basil, applauded the austere life of the dual hermit, but the French and Italian prelates most unkindly attest the popular opinion of his luxury.

<sup>77</sup> In this account of the councils of Br. th. Ferrara, and Florence, I have consulted the original act, which fill the sixth and seventh tomes of the edition of Venice, and are closed by the periphrasis, though partly, by a copy of Augustin Patricius, an Italian of the xvth century. They are degraded and corrupted by Papirius Montephaque (Ecles. tom. x.) and the continuator of Henry tom. xvi. and the respect of the Gallican church for the adverse parties confirms their members to an awkward mediocrity.

<sup>78</sup> In the first attempt, Meursius collected 7700 Greek and Latin words, to which, in a second attempt, he added 1800 more, yet what pentades elegantes, dædala, &c. to Fortius, Du Rieu, Fœtius, the Ballandats, &c. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. tom. x. p. 101, &c.)

clergy was dedicated to the service of religion—their monks and bishops have ever been distinguished by the gravity and austerity of their manners; nor were they diverted, like the Latin priests, by the pursuits and pleasures of a secular, and even military, life. After a large deduction for the time and talents that were lost in the devotion, the laziness, and the discord, of the church and cloister, the more inquisitive and ambitious minds would explore the sacred and profane erudition of their native language. The ecclesiastics presided over the education of youth; the schools of philosophy and eloquence were perpetuated till the fall of the empire; and it may be affirmed, that more books and more knowledge were included within the walls of Constantinople, than could be dispersed over the extensive countries of the West.<sup>51</sup>

Comparison of the Greeks and Latins.

Comparison of the Greeks and Latins. But an important distinction has been already noticed: the Greeks were stationary or retrograde, while the Latins were advancing with a rapid and progressive motion. The nations were excited by the spirit of independence and emulation; and even the little world of the Italian states contained more people and industry than the decreasing circle of the Byzantine empire. In Europe, the lower ranks of society were relieved from the yoke of feudal servitude; and freedom is the first step to curiosity and knowledge. The use, however rude and corrupt, of the Latin tongue had been preserved by superstition; the universities, from Bologna to Oxford,<sup>54</sup> were peopled with thousands of scholars; and their misguided ardour might be directed to more liberal and manly studies. In the resurrection of science, Italy was the first that cast away her shroud; and the eloquent Petrarch, by his lessons and his example, may justly be applauded as the first habinger of day. A purer style of composition, a more generous and rational strain of sentiment, flowed from the study and imitation of the writers of ancient Rome; and the disciples of Cicero and Virgil approached, with reverence and love, the sanctuary of their Grecian masters. In the sack of Constantinople, the French, and even the Venetians, had despised and destroyed the works of Lysippus and Homer: the monuments of art may be annihilated by a single blow; but the immortal mind is renewed and multiplied by the copies of the pen; and such copies it was the ambition of Petrarch and his friends to possess and understand. The arms of the Turks undoubtedly pressed the flight of the Muses; yet we may tremble at the thought, that Greece might have been overwhelmed, with her schools and libraries, before Europe had emerged from the deluge of barbarism, that the seeds of science might have been scattered by the winds, before

87. See the state of learning in this article and elsewhere, in the learned and judicious Modern Theatrical Hist. vol. 3, p. 171-174, 409-414.

148. At the end of the 19th century, there existed in Europe a utility university, and of these, the most famous was the University of Leipzig. There were 1000 in proportion to their scientific, biological, natural and technical faculties, and the same was the case in the year 1877, the number at OMS had increased from 200 to 600 students. Henry's history of Great Britain, vol. 5, p. 1750. Yet even this decrease is much superior to the present list of the members of the university.

53 Of these writers, who professedly treat of the restoration of the Greek learning in Italy, the two principal are Thomas, Dr. Hagen, and Hody (de Graecis Illustribus, Linguae Graecae Literarum, historia et incrementum in auro rebus, London, 1742, in three volumes), and Lascaris (historia della Letteratura Italiana, tom. v. p. 264-277, tom. vi. p. 112-115). The Oxford professor is a laborious scholar, but the

the Italian soil was prepared for their cultivation.

The most learned Italians of the fifteenth century have confessed and applauded the restoration of Greek literature, after a long oblivion of many hundred years.<sup>55</sup> Yet in that country, and beyond the Alps, some names are quoted; some profound scholars, who in the darkest ages were honourably distinguished by their knowledge of the Greek tongue; and national vanity has been loud in the praise of such rare examples of erudition.

Without scrutinising the merit of individuals, truth must observe, that their science is without a cause, and with out an effect; that it was easy for them to satisfy themselves, and their more ignorant contemporaries; and that the idiom, which they had so marvellously acquired, was transcribed in few manuscripts, and was not taught in any university of the West. In a corner of Italy, it faintly existed as the popular, or at least as the ecclesiastical, dialect.<sup>85</sup> The first impression of the Doric and Ionic colonies has never been completely erased. The Calabrian churches were long attached to the throne of Constantinople; and the monks of St. Basil pursued their studies in Mount Athos and the schools of the East. Calabria was the native country of Barlaam, who has already appeared as a sectary and an ambassador; and Barlaam was the first who revived, beyond the Alps, the memory, or at least the writings, of Homer.<sup>87</sup> He is described, by Petrarch and Boccaccio,<sup>88</sup> as a man of a diminutive stature, though truly great in the measure of learning and genius; of a piercing discernment, though of a slow and painful elocution. For many ages (as they affirm) Greece had not produced his equal in the knowledge of history, grammar, and philosophy; and his merit was celebrated in the attestations of the princes and doctors of Constantinople. One of these attestations is still extant; and the emperor Cantacuzene, the protector of his adversaries, is forced to allow, that Euclid, Aristotle, and Plato, were familiar to that profound and subtle logician.<sup>89</sup> In the court of Avignon, he formed an intimate connection with Petrarch,<sup>90</sup> the first of the Latin scholars; and the desire of mutual instruction was the principle of their literary commerce. The Tuscan applied himself with eager curiosity and assiduous diligence to the study of the Greek Language; and in a labourous struggle with the dryness and difficulty of the first rudiments, he began to reach the sense, and to feel the spirit, of poets and philosophers, whose minds were congenial to his own. But he was soon deprived

LESSONS of Barlaam.
D. 1359.

... vision of the future, the superiority of a modern and national

87 In earlier years, between the French and Germans, the men of all creeds and nations have not only met, but, in that respect, the two bodies and non-adjacent regions, respectively, the  $\alpha$ -subsequence was  $149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155$ . Since there is a set of B values, the  $\beta$ -subsequence is  $150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951,$ of Venice and the elegance of Florence. His Italian friends were deaf to his importunity ; he depended on their curiosity and indulgence, and embarked on a second voyage ; but on his entrance into the Adriatic, the ship was assailed by a tempest, and the unfortunate teacher, who like Ulysses had fastened himself to the mast, was struck dead by a flash of lightning. The humane Petrarch dropped a tear on his disaster ; but he was most anxious to learn whether some copy of Euripides or Sophocles might not be saved from the hands of the mariners.<sup>45</sup>

[illegible]

Foundation of the law gauge in Italy
by Manuel Chrysoloras.
A. D. 1390-1415.

But the faint rudiments of Greek learning, which Pefarch had encouraged and Boccace had planted, soon withered and expired. The succeeding generation was content for a while with the improvement of Latin eloquence ; nor was it before the end of the fourteenth century, that a new and perpetual flame was rekindled in Italy.<sup>66</sup> Previous to his own journey, the emperor Manuel de-patched his envoys and orators to implore the compassion of the Western princes. Of these envoys, the most conspicuous, or the most learned, was Manuel Chrysoloras,<sup>67</sup> of noble birth, and whose Roman ancestors are supposed to have migrated with the great Constantine. After visiting the courts of France and England, where he obtained some contributions and more promises, the envoy was invited to assume the office of a professor ; and Florence had again the honour of this second invitation. By his knowledge, not only of the Greek, but of the Latin tongue, Chrysoloras deserved the stipend, and surpassed the expectation, of the republic. His school was frequented by a crowd of disciples of every rank and age ; and one of these, in a general history, has described his motives and his success. “ At “ that time,” says Iliovard Aretin,<sup>68</sup> “ I was “ a student of the civil law ; but my soul was “ inflamed with the love of letters ; and I be- “ stowed some application on the sciences of “ logic and rhetoric. On the arrival of Manuel, “ I hesitated whether I should desert my legal “ studies, or relinquish this golden opportunity ; “ and thus, in the ardour of youth, I com- “ muned with my own mind— Wilt thou be “ wanting to thyself and thy fortune? Wilt “ thou refuse to be introduced to a familiar “ converse with Homer, Plato, and Demos- “ thenes? with those poets, philosophers, and “ orators, of whom such wonders are related, and “ who are celebrated by every age as the great “ masters of human science? Of professors and “ scholars in civil law, a sufficient supply will gree, the use of their native tongue.

95 Leontius, or Leo Pilatus, is sufficiently made known by Hedy (p. 2—11.) and the Abbé de Bado (Vie de l'Etranger, tom. iii. p. 625—631. 670—673) who has very happily caught the lively and dramatic manner of his original.

of Theodoras, was a linguist, an orator, and an historian, the secretary of four successive popes, and the chancellor of the Republic of Florence, where he died A. D. 1444, at the age of seventy-five, from the Bubonic Plague. See, ibid., p. 130, &c. Turabochi, ibid., p. 73-74.

"always be found in our universities; but a "teacher, and such a teacher, of the Greek lan"guage, if he once be suffered to escape, may "never afterwards be retrieved. Convinced by "these reasons, I gave myself to Chrysoloras,
"and so strong was my passion, that the lessons
"which I had imbibed in the day were the con"stant subject of my nightly dreams."<sup>99</sup> At the same time and place, the Latin classics were explained by John of Ravenna, the domestic pupil of Petrarch:<sup>100</sup> the Italians, who illustrated their age and country, were formed in this double school; and Florence became the fruitful seminary of Greek and Roman erudition.<sup>101</sup> The presence of the emperor recalled Chrysoloras from the college to the court; but he afterwards taught at Pavia and Rome with equal industry and applause. The remainder of his life, about fifteen years, was divided between Italy and Constantinople, between embassies and lessons.
In the noble office of enlightening a foreign nation, the grammarian was not unmindful of a more sacred duty to his prince and country; and Emanuel Chrysoloras died at Constance on a public mission from the emperor to the council.

After his example, the restoration of the Greek letters in Italy was prosecuted by a series of emigrants, who were destitute of fortune, and endowed with learning, or at least with language. From the terror or oppression of the Turkish arms, the natives of Thessalonica and Constantinople escaped to a land of freedom, curiosity, and wealth. The synod introduced into Florence the lights of the Greek church and the oracles of the Platonic philosophy: and the fugitives who adhered to the union, had the double merit of renouncing their country, not only for the Christian, but for the Catholic, cause. A patriot, who sacrifices his party and conscience to the allurement of favour, may be possessed however of the private and social virtues: he no longer hears the reproachful epithets of slave and apostate; and the consideration which he acquires among his new associates, will restore in his own eyes the dignity of his character. The prudent conformity of Besarion was rewarded with the Roman Cardinal Besarion, &c. purple: he fixed his residence in Italy, and the Greek cardinal, the titular patriarch of Constantinople, was respected as the chief and protector of his nation: his abilities were exercised in the legations of Bologna, Venice, Germany, and France; and his election to the chair of St. Peter floated for a moment on the uncertain breath of a conclave.<sup>103</sup> His ecclesi-

<sup>69</sup> See the passage in Archæ. Commentario Rerum suo Tempore in Italia gestarum, apud Hoenem, p. 28, 70.

100) In this domestic discipline, Petrarch, who loved the youth often compuncts of the eager curiosity, restless temper, and proud feelings, who announce the genius and glory of a rarer age (Memorias sur Petrarque, tom. iii. p. 700-701).

[illegible]

work. See likewise further on, in the list of the parts of the edition.

<sup>10</sup> The cost of the ...

powerful St. Ignace continued to reign the master of the church and school.

They have taken up arms and the leaders of the movement are the Greeks. Yet it is not because of the soil that they were so successful, supported by the aid of the Persians. They were divided into many independent states, and at that time, it was the custom of princes and republics to vie with each other in the encouragement and reward of literature. The time of Nicholas the Fifth<sup>11</sup> has not been adequate to his merits. From a plenary on-

He justified himself by his virtue and learning, the character of the man prevailed over the mistakes of the paper, and he disposed the members who were so prejudiced against the Republic, to the Hon. Assembly, in favour of the Republic.

The authors thank Dr. J. A. Pople for his interest in this work. This research was supported by the National Science Foundation under Grant No. CHE-7809691.

The authors thank N. S. Kiselev for his help. The work was carried out under the program "Study of the interaction of ionospheric waves with the Earth's surface," supported by the Russian Science Foundation.

[illegible]

the example of the Remyaopothi was preceded or imiand without a title. Cincinnatus of Medullus was the father of a line of princes, whose name and name are almost extinct, with the restoration of mining, his credit was enrolled into fame; his powers were devoted to the service of mankind; he corresponded at once with Camp and Commerce, and a car of Indian spices and Chinese goods was soon reported in the same manner. The general education of his grand-

[illegible][illegible][illegible]

Italy was not only a patron, but an active participant in the literary race. Her patronage was extended to relief, and her poets and scholars were delightfully spent in the Italian sanctuary. He encouraged the great poet Demetrius Chalcocondyles and Angelo Poliziano, and his active secretary Janus Liliensis returned from the East with a treasure of two hundred manuscripts, four one of which were as yet unknown in the libraries of Europe.<sup>12</sup> The rest of Italy was not only a land of refuge and the progress of

1. The first is the exclusive property of their own literature, and the examples of Greece were not copied, but studied and improving themselves, which they have retained. After a short residence in foreign teachers, the tide of civilization subsided, but the language of Constantinople, Vienna, Italy and the Alps; and the slaves of France, Germany, and England, transported to their country the sacred fire which they had kindled in the schools of Florence and Rome. In the productions of the mind, as in those of the soul, the gifts of nature are excelled by industry and skill. The Greek authors, forgotten on the banks of the Bessus, have been illustrated on those of the Elbe and the Thames; and Bosphorus or Gazi might have given the more or less of the laborious; the luxury of Rome, the taste of Persians, the refinement of Sages, the education of Sages, the spirit of the noble school of Bent-

By the same process, it is known that this world art has been copied by Aidos, and his numerous successors, to perpetuate and multiply the works of antiquity.<sup>10</sup> A single manuscript imported from Greece is revised in ten thousand copies; and each copy is fairer than the original. In this form, Homer and Plato would peruse with more satisfaction their own writings; and their scholars must resign the prize to the labours of our Western editors.

Before the revival of classic literature, the barbarians in Europe were immersed in ignorance; and their vulgar tongues were marked with the

[illegible][illegible]

On 11/11/1963, the following information was obtained from the Bureau of the Census, Washington, D.C.:

Journal of Management Education 30(6)p. 789-804
© The Author(s) 2006. Reprints and permissions:
<http://www.sagepub.com/journalsPermissions.nav>

1. The first group of variables includes the variables that are used in the first stage of the analysis. These variables are the variables that are used to explain the dependent variable in the first stage of the analysis.

rudeness and poverty of their manners. The students of the more perfect idioms of Rome and Greece were introduced to a new world of light and science; to the society of the free and polished nations of antiquity; and to a familiar converse with those immortal men who spoke the sublime language of eloquence and reason. Such an intercourse must tend to refine the taste, and to elevate the genius of the moderns; and yet, from the first experiment, it might appear that the study of the ancients had given fetters, rather than wings, to the human mind. However laudable, the spirit of imitation is of a servile cast; and the first disciples of the Greeks and Romans were a colony of strangers in the midst of their age and country. The minute and laborious diligence which explored the antiquities of remote times, might have improved or adorned the present state of society: the critic and metaphysician were the slaves of Aristotle; the poets, historians, and orators, were proud to repeat the thoughts and words of the Augustan age; the works of nature were observed with the eyes of Pliny and Theophrastus; and some Pagan votaries professed a secret devotion to the gods of Homer and Plato.<sup>117</sup> The Italians were oppressed by the strength and number of their ancient auxiliaries: the century after the deaths of Petrarch and Boccaccio was filled with a crowd of Latin imitators, who decently repose on our shelves; but in that æra of learning, it will not be easy to discern a real discovery of science, a work of invention or eloquence, in the popular language of the country.<sup>118</sup> But as soon as it had been deeply saturated with the celestial dew, the soil was quickened into vegetation and life; the modern idioms were refined; the classics of Athens and Rome inspired a pure taste and a generous emulation; and in Italy, as afterwards in France and England, the pleasing reign of poetry and fiction was succeeded by the light of speculative and experimental philosophy. Genius may anticipate the season of maturity; but in the education of a people, as in that of an individual, memory must be exercised, before the powers of reason and fancy can be expanded. nor may the artist hope to equal or surpass, till he has learned to imitate, the works of his predecessors.

CHAP. LXVII.

Schism of the Greeks and Latins. — Reign and Character of Amurath the Second. — Crusade of Ladislaus King of Hungary. — His Defeat and Death. — John Huniades. — Scanderbeg.

117 I will select three singular examples of this excessive enthusiasm. 1. At the synod of Florence, p. 10, 16. [1] The said, in familiar conversation to George of Trebizond, that if a sect of time mankind would unanimously renounce the Gospel, and the forum for a religion similar to that of the Gauls (Jean Albert, apud Fabricium, tom. x. p. 751.). 2. Paul II. renewed the doubt as a dilemma, which had been founded by Pontanus Latus; and the principal members were accused of heresy, impiety, and Paganism (Tiraboschi, tom. vi. part. i. n. 81.). 3. In the same manner, the emperor and his courtiers.

in the sportive play of 118 The scholar Boccaccio died in the year 1375; and we cannot place before 1490 the composition of the Morgante Maggioro of Pulci, — Constantine Palæologus, last Emperor of the East.

The respective merits of Rome and Constantinople are compared <sup>Comparison of Rome and Constantinople.</sup> and celebrated by an eloquent Greek, the father of the Italian schools.<sup>1</sup> The view of the ancient capital, the seat of his ancestors, surpassed the most sanguine expectations of Emanuel Chrysoloras; and he no longer blained the exclamation of an old sophist, that Rome was the habitation, not of men, but of gods! Those gods, and those men, had long since vanished; but to the eye of liberal enthusiasm, the majesty of ruin restored the image of her ancient prosperity. The monuments of the consuls and Cæsars, of the martyrs and apostles, engaged on all sides the curiosity of the philosopher and the Christian; and he confessed, that in every age the arms and the religion of Rome were destined to reign over the earth. While Chrysoloras admired the venerable beauties of the mother, he was not forgetful of his native country, her fairest daughter, her Imperial colony; and the Byzantine patriot expatiates with zeal and truth on the eternal advantages of nature, and the more transitory glories of art and dominion, which adorned, or had adorned, the city of Constantine. Yet the perfection of the copy still redounds (as he modestly observes) to the honour of the original, and parents are delighted to be renewed, and even excelled, by the superior merit of their children. “Constantinople,” says the orator, “is situate on a commanding point, between Europe and Asia, between the Archipelago and the Euxine. By her interposition, the two seas, and the two continents, are united for the common benefit of nations; and the gates of commerce may be shut or opened at her command. The harbour, encompassed on all sides by the sea and the continent, is the most secure and capacious in the world. The walls and gates of Constantinople may be compared with those of Babylon: the towers are many; each tower is a solid and lofty structure; and the second wall, the outer fortification, would be sufficient for the defence and dignity of an ordinary capital. A broad and rapid stream may be introduced into the ditches; and the artificial island may be encompassed, like Athens,<sup>2</sup> by land or water.” Two strong and natural causes are alleged for the perfection of the model of new Rome. The royal founder reigned over the most illustrious nations of the globe; and in the accomplishment of his designs, the power of the Romans was combined with the art and science of the Greeks. Other cities have been reared to maturity by accident and time; their

and the Orlando Innamorato of Boyardo (Tiraboschi, tom. vi. part. ii. p. 174–177.).

1 The epistle of Manuel Chrysoloras to the emperor John Palæologus will not offend the eye or ear of a classical student (videlicet Grotius de Antiquitate C. P. p. 167–126.). The superscription appears a chronological remark, that John Palæologus II. was associated in the empire before the year 1411, the date of Chrysoloras's death. A still earlier date, at least 1408, is deduced from the age of his youngest sons, Theodorus and Thomas, who were both Porphyrogeniti (Bucurgen, tom. v. p. 214–217.).

2 Somebody observed that the city of Athens might be circumnavigated (ὡς ἐνταῦθα πάλιν ὡς Ἀθήνας διὰ τῆς θαλάσσης καὶ παραπλάγιος πειρώμεθα). But what may be true in a rhetorical sense of Constantinople, cannot be applied to the situation of Athens, five miles from the sea, and not intersected or surrounded by any navigable streams.

beauties are mingled with disorder and deformity; and the inhabitants, unwilling to remove from their natal spot, are incapable of correcting the errors of their ancestors, and the original vices of situation or climate. But the free idea of Constantinople was formed and executed by a single mind; and the primitive model was improved by the obedient zeal of the subject's and successors of the first monarch. The adjacent isles were stored with an inexhaustible supply of marble; but the various materials were transported from the most remote shores of Europe and Asia; and the public and private buildings, the palaces, churches, aqueducts, cisterns, porticoes, columns, baths, and hippodromes, were adapted to the greatness of the capital of the East. The superfluity of wealth was spread along the shores of Europe and Asia; and the Byzantine territory, as far as the Euxine, the Hellespont, and the long wall, might be considered as a populous suburb and a perpetual garden. In this flattering picture, the past and the present, the times of prosperity and decay, are artfully confounded; but a sigh and a confession escape from the orator, that his wretched country was the shadow and sepulchre of its former self. The works of ancient sculpture had been defaced by Christian zeal or barbaric violence; the fairest structures were demolished; and the marbles of Paros or Numidia were burnt for lime, or applied to the meanest uses. Of many a statue, the place was marked by an empty pedestal; of many a column, the size was determined by a broken capital; the tombs of the emperors were scattered on the ground; the stroke of time was accelerated by storms and earthquakes; and the vacant space was adorned, by vulgar tradition, with fabulous monuments of gold and silver. From these wonders, which lived only in memory or belief, he distinguishes, however, the porphyry pillar, the column and colossus of Justinian,<sup>3</sup> and the church, more especially the dome, of St. Sophia; the best conclusion, since it could not be described according to its merits, and after it no other object could deserve to be mentioned. But he forgets, that a century before, the trembling fabrics of the colossus and the church had been saved and supported by the timely care of Andronicus the Elder. Thirty years after the emperor had fortified St. Sophia with two new buttresses or pyramids, the eastern hemisphere suddenly gave way; and the images, the altars, and the sanctuary, were crushed by the falling ruin. The mischief indeed was speedily repaired; the rubbish was cleared by the incessant labour of every rank and age; and the poor remains of riches and industry were consecrated by the Greeks to the most stately and venerable temple of the East.<sup>4</sup>

The last hope of the falling city and empire

<sup>3</sup> Nicephorus Gregoras has described the Colossus of Justinian (l. vii. 12.), but his measures are false and inconsistent. The editor Bower consulted his friend Girardon; and the sculptor gave him the following description of the statue. That of Justinian was still prepped by Andronicus in 1311. The Greeks, in their pompous rhetoric, exalt the beauty and holiness of the church, an earthly heaven, the abode of angels, and of God himself, &c.

was placed in the harmony of the mother and daughter, in the maternal tenderness of Rome, and the filial obedience of Constantinople. In the synod of Florence, the Greeks and Latins had embraced, and subscribed, and promised; but these signs of friendship were purdious or fruitless;<sup>5</sup> and the baseless fabric of the union vanished like a dream.<sup>6</sup> The emperor and his prelates returned home in the Venetian galleys; but as they touched at the Morea and the isles of Corfu and Lesbos, the subjects of the Latins complained that the pretended union would be an instrument of oppression. No sooner did they land on the Byzantine shore, than they were saluted, or rather assailed, with a general murmur of zeal and discontent. During their absence, above two years, the capital had been deprived of its civil and ecclesiastical rulers: fanaticism fermented in anarchy; the most furious monks reigned over the conscience of women and bigots; and the hatred of the Latin name was the first principle of nature and religion. Before his departure for Italy, the emperor had flattered the city with the assurance of a prompt relief and a powerful succour; and the clergy, confident in their orthodoxy and science, had promised themselves and their flocks an easy victory over the blind shepherds of the West. The double disappointment exasperated the Greeks; the conscience of the subscribing prelates was awakened; the hour of temptation was past; and they had more to dread from the public resentment, than they could hope from the favour of the emperor or the pope. Instead of justifying their conduct, they deplored their weakness, professed their contrition, and cast themselves on the mercy of God and of their brethren. To the reproachful question, What had been the event or the use of their Italian synod? they answered with sighs and tears, "Alas! we have made a new faith; we have exchanged piety for impiety; we have betrayed the immaculate sacrifice; and we are become Azymites." (The Azymites were those who celebrated the communion with unleavened bread; and I must retract or qualify the praise which I have bestowed on the growing philosophy of the times.) "Alas! we have been seduced by distress, by fraud, and by the hopes and fears of a transitory life. The hand that has signed the union should be cut off; and the tongue that has pronounced the Latin creed deserves to be torn from the root." The best proof of their repentance was an increase of zeal for the most trivial rites and the most incomprehensible doctrines; and an absolute separation from all, without excepting their prince, who preserved some regard for honour and consistency. After the decease of the patriarch Joseph, the archbishops of Herato the last of whom writes with truth and freedom. Among the moderns we may distinguish the container of Fleury (tom. xxi. p. 538, sec. 401. 421, &c.) and Spandanus (A.D. 1340-50). The sense of the latter is drowned in pregnant and passion, as soon as Rome and religion are concerned.

The Greek schism after the council of Florence. A.D. 1110-1148.

engaged in war till he was justified by a previous and adequate provocation; the victorious sultan was disarmed by submission; and in the observance of treaties, his word was inviolate and sacred.<sup>12</sup> The Hungarians were commonly the aggressors; he was provoked by the revolt of Scanderbeg; and the perfidious Caramanian was twice vanquished, and twice pardoned, by the Ottoman monarch. Before he invaded the Morea, Thebes had been surprised by the despot: in the conquest of Thessalonica, the grandson of Bajazet might dispute the recent purchase of the Venetians; and after the first siege of Constantinople, the sultan was never tempted, by the distress, the absence, or the injuries of Palæologus, to extinguish the dying light of the Byzantine empire.

But the most striking feature in the life and character of Amurat, is the double abdication of the Turkish throne; and, were his motives debased by an alloy of superstition, we must praise the royal philosopher,<sup>13</sup> who at the age of forty could discern the vanity of human greatness. Resigning the sceptre to his son, he retired to the pleasant residence of Magnesia; but he retired to the society of saints and hermits. It was not till the fourth century of the Hegira, that the religion of Mahomet had been corrupted by an institution so adverse to his genius; but in the age of the crusaders, the various orders of dervishes were multiplied by the example of the Christian, and even the Latin, monks.<sup>14</sup> The lord of nations submitted to fast, and pray, and turn round in endless rotation with the fanatics, who mistook the giddiness of the head for the illumination of the spirit.<sup>15</sup> But he was soon awakened from this dream of enthusiasm by the Hungarian invasion; and his obedient son was the foremost to urge the public danger and the wishes of the people. Under the banner of their veteran leader, the Janizaries fought and conquered; but he withdrew from the field of Varna, again to pray, to fast, and to turn round with his Magnesian brethren. These pious occupations were again interrupted by the danger of the state. A victorious army disdained the inexperience of their youthful ruler; the city of Adrianople was abandoned to rapine and slaughter; and the unanimous divan implored his presence to appease the tumult, and prevent the rebellion, of the Janizaries. At the well-known voice of their master, they trembled and obeyed; and the reluctant sultan was compelled to support his splendid servitude, till, at the end of four years, he was relieved by the angel of death. Age or disease, misfortune or caprice, have tempted several princes to descend from the throne ; and they have had leisure to repent of their irretrievable step. But Amurath alone, in the full liberty of choice, after the trial of empire and solitude, has repeated his preference of a private life.

After the departure of his Greek brethren, Eugenius had not been unmindful of their temporal interest; and his tender regard for the Byzantine empire was animated by a just apprehension of the Turks, who approached, and might soon invade, the borders of Italy. But the spirit of the crusades had expired; and the coldness of the Franks was not less unreasonable than their headlong passion. In the eleventh century, a fanatic monk could precipitate Europe on Asia for the recovery of the holy sepulchre; but in the fifteenth, the most pressing motives of religion and policy were insufficient to unite the Latins in the defence of Christendom. Germany was an inexhaustible storehouse of men and arms;<sup>16</sup> but that complex and languid body required the impulse of a vigorous hand; and Frederic the Third was alike impotent in his personal character and his Imperial dignity. A long war had impaired the strength, without satiating the animosity, of France and England;<sup>17</sup> but Philip, duke of Burgundy, was a vain and magnificent prince; and he enjoyed, without danger or expense, the adventurous piety of his subjects, who sailed, in a gallant fleet, from the coast of Flanders to the Hellespont. The maritime republics of Venice and Genoa were less remote from the scene of action; and their hostile fleets were associated under the standard of St. Peter. The kingdoms of Hungary and Poland, which covered as it were the interior pole of the Latin church, were the most nearly concerned to oppose the progress of the Turks. Arms were the patrimony of the Scythians and Sarmatians, and these nations might appear equal to the contest, could they point, against the common foe, those swords that were so wantonly drawn in bloody and domestic quarrels. But the same spirit was adverse to concord and obedience: a poor country and a limited monarch are incapable of maintaining a standing force; and the loose bodies of Polish and Hungarian horse were not armed with the sentiments and weapons which, on some occasions, have given irresistible weight to the French chivalry. Yet, on this side, the designs of the Roman pontiff, and the eloquence of cardinal Julian, his legate, were promoted by the circumstances of the times;<sup>18</sup> by the union of the two crowns on the head of Ladislaus,<sup>19</sup> a young and Eugenius forms a league against the Turks.

A. D. 1445.

<sup>12</sup> See Chalmers (I vii, p. 186-198), Davis (p. 75), and Martin Barberis on V. T. S. Underhill, p. 114. Underhill's death, which took place in the Garrison of St. Ignace, he was a lesson and example to his son Melvin, etc.

15 Voltaire (Essai sur l'Histoire Générale, c. 80, p. 283, 284) admires le Paganisme Romain which has preserved the same principle as a Christian prince for returning to a monastery.<sup>2</sup> In this way, Voltaire was a little far from the point about 14 See the articles, Dorsch, Fisher, Mason, Rhoten, in D.H. Fischer's Bibliography Annual. Yet the subject is so periodically treated from the Persian and Arabic writers. It is among the Turkist at these centers have principally flourished.

[illegible]

So the first two conditions are satisfied. For the third condition, let  $\mathbf{v} = (v_1, \dots, v_n) \in \mathbb{R}^n$  be a vector. Then  $\mathbf{v} \in \mathcal{V}$  if and only if  $\mathbf{v} \in \mathcal{V}_1$  and  $\mathbf{v} \in \mathcal{V}_2$ . Since  $\mathcal{V}_1$  and  $\mathcal{V}_2$  are subspaces,  $\mathcal{V}$  is a subspace of  $\mathbb{R}^n$ . Therefore,  $\mathcal{V}$  is a subspace of  $\mathbb{R}^n$ .

tom (p. 518). At the siege of Nizya, on the Rhine, in 1474, the pikes, musketeers, and cross-bowmen, sent their respective quarrels, and the pikes their bolts, in great numbers, to the king of France. Monsieur d'Almeida sent his pikes plus grande munition, 1400 horses, moutons, and men, with 1200 wagons. The united armies, on the king of England, and the duke of Burgundy, were only equalled one-third of this formidable host. Monsieur de Plessy de Gramont, 1476 (p. 21). At the siege of Prague, above 600000 footmen are mentioned in l'histoire de la guerre, and admirable discipline, by the powers

12. It was not till the year 1414 that France and England could agree to settle their mutual claims (see Rymer's Fœdera, and the chronicles of the reigns of Henry V. and Charles VI. of France, and Henry V. of England).

[illegible]

$\frac{1}{2} \left( \frac{1}{2} \right) = \frac{1}{4}$

ambitious soldier; by the valour of an hero, whose name, the name of John Huniades, was already popular among the Christians, and formidable to the Turks. An endless treasure of pardons and indulgences was scattered by the legate; many private warriors of France and Germany enlisted under the holy banner; and the crusade derived some strength, or at least some reputation, from the new allies both of Europe and Asia. A fugitive despot of Servia exaggerated the distress and ardour of the Christians beyond the Danube, who would unanimously rise to vindicate their religion and liberty. The Greek emperor,<sup>20</sup> with a spirit unknown to his fathers, engaged to guard the Bosphorus, and to sally from Constantinople at the head of his national and mercenary troops. The sultan of Caramania<sup>21</sup> announced the retreat of Amurath, and a powerful division in the heart of Anatolia; and if the fleets of the West could occupy at the same moment the Straits of the Hellespont, the Ottoman monarchy would be dismembered and destroyed. Heaven and earth must rejoice in the perdition of the miscreants; and the legate, with prudent ambiguity, instilled the opinion of the invisible, perhaps the visible, aid of the Son of God, and his divine mother.

Ladislaus king of Poland and Hungary marches against them.

Of the Polish and Hungarian diets, a religious war was the unanimous cry; and Ladislaus, after passing the Danube, led an army of his confederate subjects as far as Sophia, the capital of the Bulgarian kingdom. In this expedition they obtained two signal victories, which were justly ascribed to the valour and conduct of Huniades. In the first, with a vanguard of ten thousand men, he surprised the Turkish camp; in the second, he vanquished and made prisoner the most renowned of their generals, who possessed the double advantage of ground and numbers.

The approach of winter, and the natural and artificial obstacles of Mount Hæmus, arrested the progress of the hero, who measured a narrow interval of six days' march from the foot of the mountains to the hostile towers of Adrianople, and the friendly capital of the Greek empire. The retreat was undisturbed; and the entrance into Buda was at once a military and religious triumph. An ecclesiastical procession was followed by the king and his warriors on foot. he nicely balanced the merits and rewards of the two nations: and the pride of conquest was blended with the humble temper of Christianity. Thirteen bashaws, nine standards, and four thousand captives, were unquestionable trophies: and as all were willing to believe, and none were present to contradict, the crusaders multiplied, with unblushing confidence, the myriads of Turks whom they had left on the field of battle.<sup>22</sup> or to distinguish him from his rival the infant Ladislaus of Austria. Their competition for the crown of Hungary is described by Calimachus l. i. p. 447-1360, Boninus (Decad. in. l. ix.), Spondanus, and Gentius.

<sup>20</sup> The Greek historians, Phranza, Chalcondyles, and Ducis, do not ascribe to their prince a very active part in this crusade, which he is false. But the situation and correspondence of the knights of Rhodes must connect them with the sultan of Caramania.

<sup>22</sup> In their letters to the emperor Frederic III. the Hungarians say 30,000 Turks in one battle, but the modest Julian red

The most solid proof, and the most salutary consequence, of victory, was a deputation from the divan to solicit peace, to restore Servia, to ransom the prisoners, and to evacuate the Hungarian frontier. By this treaty, the rational objects of the war were obtained: the king, the despot, and Huniades himself, in the diet of Segedin, were satisfied with public and private emolument; a truce of ten years was concluded; and the followers of Jesus and Mahomet, who swore on the Gospel and the Koran, attested the word of God as the guardian of truth and the avenger of perfidy. In the place of the Gospel, the Turkish ministers had proposed to substitute the Eucharist, the real presence of the Catholic deity; but the Christians refused to profane their holy mysteries; and a superstitious conscience is less forcibly bound by the spiritual energy, than by the outward and visible symbols, of an oath.<sup>23</sup>

During the whole transaction, the cardinal legate had observed a sul-
Violation of the peace. A. D. 1444.
 len silence, unwilling to approve, and unable to oppose, the consent of the king and people. But the diet was not dissolved before Julian was fortified by the welcome intelligence, that Anatolia was invaded by the Caramanian, and Thrace by the Greek emperor; that the fleets of Genoa, Venice, and Burgundy, were masters of the Hellespont; and that the allies, informed of the victory, and ignorant of the treaty, of Ladislaus, impatiently waited for the return of his victorious army. "And is it thus," exclaimed the cardinal,<sup>24</sup> "that you will desert their expectations and your own fortune? It is to them, to your God, and your fellow-Christians, that you have pledged your faith; and that prior obligation annuls a rash and sacrilegious oath to the enemies of Christ. His vicar on earth is the Roman pontiff; without whose sanction you can neither promise nor perform. In his name I absolve your perjury and sanctify your arms: follow my footsteps in the paths of glory and salvation; and if still ye have scruples, devote on my head the punishment and the sin." This mischievous casuistry was seconded by his respectable character, and the levity of popular assemblies: war was resolved on the same spot where peace had so lately been sworn; and, in the execution of the treaty, the Turks were assaulted by the Christians; to whom, with some reason, they might apply the epithet of Infidels. The falsehood of Ladislaus to his word and oath was palliated by the religion of the times: the most perfect, or at least the most popular, excuse would have been the success of his arms and the deliverance of the Eastern church. But the same treaty which should have bound his con-slaughter to 6000 or even 2000 infidels (Æneas Sylvius, in Europ. c. 5. and epist. 44. 81. apud Spondanum).

<sup>25</sup> See the origin of the Turkish war, and the first expedition of Ladislaus, in the 9th and 10th books of the mid Decad of Bonnius, who, in his division and style, copies Livy with tolerable success. But they all of the age. But they all science, had diminished his strength. On the proclamation of the peace, the French and German volunteers departed with indignant murmurs; the Poles were exhausted by distant warfare, and perhaps disgusted with foreign command; and their palatines accepted the first licence, and hastily retired to their provinces and castles. Even Hungary was divided by faction, or restrained by a laudable scruple; and the relics of the crusade that marched in the second expedition were reduced to an inadequate force of twenty thousand men. A Walachian chief, who joined the royal standard with his vassals, presumed to remark that their numbers did not exceed the hunting retinue that sometimes attended the sultan; and the gift of two horses of matchless speed might admonish Ladislaus of his secret foresight of the event. But the despot of Servia, after the restoration of his country and children, was tempted by the promise of new realms; and the inexperience of the king, the enthusiasm of the legate, and the martial presumption of Huniades himself, were persuaded that every obstacle must yield to the invincible virtue of the sword and the cross. After the passage of the Danube, two roads might lead to Constantinople and the Hellespont; the one direct, abrupt, and difficult, through the mountains of Hæmus; the other more tedious and secure, over a level country, and along the shores of the Euxine; in which their flanks, according to the Scythian discipline, might always be covered by a moveable fortification of wagons. The latter was judiciously preferred: the Catholics marched through the plains of Bulgaria, burning, with wanton cruelty, the churches and villages of the Christian natives; and their last station was at Warnæ, near the sea-shore; on which the defeat and death of Ladislaus have bestowed a memorable name.<sup>25</sup>

It was on this fatal spot, that, instead of finding a confederate fleet to second their operations, they were alarmed by the approach of Amurath himself, who had issued from his Magnesian solitude, and transported the forces of Asia to the defence of Europe. According to some writers, the Greek emperor had been awed, or seduced, to grant the passage of the Bosphorus, and an indelible stain of corruption is fixed on the Genoese, or the pope's nephew, the Catholic admiral, whose mercenary connivance betrayed the guard of the Hellespont. From Adrianople, the sultan advanced by hasty marches at the head of sixty thousand men; and when the cardinal, and Huniades, had taken a nearer survey of the numbers and order of the Turks, these ardent warriors proposed the tardy and impracticable measure of a retreat. The king alone was resolved to conquer or die; and his resolution had almost been crowned with a glorious and salutary victory. The princes were opposite to each other in the centre; and the Beglikbegs, or generals of Anatolia and Romania, commanded on the right and left, against the adverse divisions of the despot and Huniades. The Turkish wings were broken on the first onset; but the advantage was fatal; and the rash victors, in the heat of the pursuit, were carried away far from the annoyance of the enemy, or the support of their friends. When Amurath beheld the flight of his squadrons, he despaired of his fortune and that of the empire: a veteran Janizary seized his horse's bridle; and he had the magnanimity to pardon and reward the soldier who dared to perceive the terror, and arrest the flight, of his sovereign. A copy of the treaty, the monument of Christian perfidy, had been displayed in the front of battle; and it is said, that the sultan in his distress, lifting his eyes and his hands to heaven, implored the protection of the God of truth; and called on the prophet Jesus himself to avenge the impious mockery of his name and religion.<sup>26</sup> With inferior numbers and disordered ranks, the king of Hungary rushed forwards in the confidence of victory, till his career was stopped by the impenetrable phalanx of the Janizaries. If we may credit the Ottoman annals, his horse was pierced by the javelin of Amurath;<sup>27</sup> he fell among the Death of Ladislaus.

spears of the infantry; and a Turkish soldier proclaimed with a loud voice, "Hungarians, behold the head of your king!" The death of Ladislaus was the signal of their defeat. On his return from an intemperate pursuit, Huniades deplored his error and the public loss: he strove to rescue the royal body, till he was overwhelmed by the tumultuous crowd of the victors and vanquished; and the last efforts of his courage and conduct were exerted to save the remnant of his Walachian cavalry. Ten thousand Christians were slain in the disastrous battle of Warnæ: the loss of the Turks, more considerable in numbers, bore a smaller proportion to their total strength; yet the philosophic sultan was not ashamed to confess, that his ruin must be the consequence of a second and similar victory. At his command a column was erected on the spot where Ladislaus had fallen; but the modest inscription, instead of accusing the rashness, recorded the valour, and bewailed the misfortune, of the Hungarian youth.<sup>28</sup>

Before I lose sight of the field of
The cardinal
Julian.
Warnæ, I am tempted to pause on the character and story of two principal actors, the cardinal Julian and John Huniades. Julian<sup>29</sup> Casarini was born of a noble family of Rome: his studies had embraced both the Latin probably affirms, superententibus Janizariis, telorum multitudine,

<sup>25</sup> Warnæ, under the Grecian name of Odesous, was a colony of the Milesians, which they denominated from the hero Ixos Cælarus, tom. i. p. 374. D'Anville, tom. i. p. 312. According to Arrian's Perplus of the Euxine (p. 24, 25) in the 1st volume of Hudson's Geography, it was crossed by the sea in the 1st of June from the city of the or p. 20. host (suppose, with more simplicity, an appeal to food and his prophet Jesus, which is likewise insinuated by Callimachus (l. i. p. 516) Spandan. A. D. 1444, No. 8.) <sup>27</sup> A critic will here distrust these epithets of a warrior as general, so difficult for a man to obtain, so easy for a poet to bestow (Cæsar, p. 90) 516. Callimachus, l. i. p. 317. more simply and the first is a small tract of Felix Petrus, character of Segura de... (Cæsar, p. 710-722) represents the... the... authority.

<sup>29</sup> M. de la Harpe describes the origin (Hist. de France de Bâle,

A. D. 1101
— 1115, &c.

both entitled to our notice, since they occupied of the Ottoman arms delayed the rum of the Greek empire. John Castriot, the father of Scanderbeg,<sup>6</sup> was the hereditary prince of a small district of Epirus or Albania, between the mountains and the Adriatic Sea. Unable to contend with the sultan's power, Castriot submitted to the hard conditions of peace and tribute: he delivered his four sons as the pledges of his fidelity; and the Christian youths, after receiving the mark of circumcision, were instructed in the Mahometan religion, and trained in the arms and arts of Turkish policy.<sup>7</sup> The three elder brothers were confounded in the crowd of slaves; and the poison to which their deaths are ascribed, cannot be verified or disproved by any positive evidence. Yet the suspicion is in a great measure removed by the kind and paternal treatment of George Castriot, the fourth brother, who, from his tender youth, displayed the strength and spirit of a soldier. The successive overthrow of a Tartar and two Persians, who carried a proud defiance to the Turkish court, recommended him to the favour of Amurath, and his Turkish appellation of Scanderbeg (Iskender beg), or the lord Alexander, is an indelible memorial of his glory and servitude. His father's principality was reduced into a province; but the loss was compensated by the rank and title of Sanjak, a command of five thousand horse, and the prospect of the first dignities of the empire. He served with honour in the wars of Europe and Asia; and we may smile at the art or credulity of the historian, who supposes, that in every encounter he spared the Christians, while he fell with a thundering arm on his Musulman foes. The glory of Humiades is without reproach; he fought in the defence of his religion and country; but the enemies who applaud the patriot, have branded his rival with the name of traitor and apostate. In the eyes of the Christians, the rebellion of Scanderbeg is justified by his father's wrongs, the ambiguous death of his three brothers, his own degradation, and the slavery of his country; and they adore the generous, though tardy, zeal, with which he asserted the faith and independence of his ancestors. But he had inhaled from his ninth year the doctrines of the Koran; he was ignorant of the Gospel; the religion of a soldier is determined by authority and habit; nor is it easy to conceive what new illumination at the age of forty<sup>8</sup> could be poured into his soul. His motives would be less exposed to the suspicion of interest or revenge, had he broken his chain from the moment that he was sensible of its weight, but a long oblivion had surely impaired his original right; and every year of obedience and reward had cemented the mutual bond of the sultan and his subject. If Scanderbeg had long harboured the belief of Christianity and the intention of revolt, a worthy mind must condemn the base dissimulation, that could serve only to betray, that could promise only to be forsworn, that could actively join in the temporal and spiritual perdition of so many thousands of his unhappy brethren. Shall we praise a secret correspondence with Huniades, while he commanded the vanguard of the Turkish army? shall we excuse the desertion of his standard, a treacherous desertion, which abandoned the victory to the enemies of his benefactor? In the confusion of a defeat, the eye of Scanderbeg was fixed on the Reis Effendi or principal secretary: with the dagger at his breast, he extorted a firman or patent for the government of Albania; and the murder of the guiltless scribe and his train prevented the consequences of an immediate discovery. With some bold companions, to whom he had revealed his design, he escaped in the night, by rapid marches, from the field of battle to his paternal mountains.

 The gates of Croya were opened to the royal mandate; and no sooner did he command the fortress, than George Castriot dropped the mask of dissimulation; aljured the prophet and the sultaa, and proclaimed himself the avenger of his family and country. The names of religion and liberty provoked a general revolt: the Albanians, a martial race, were unanimous to live and die with their hereditary prince; and the Ottoman garrisons were indulged in the choice of martyrdom or baptism. In the assembly of the states of Epirus, Scanderbeg was elected general of the Turkish war; and each of the allies engaged to furnish his respective proportion of men and money. From these contributions, from his patrimonial estate, and from the valuable salt-pits of Selina, he drew an annual revenue of two hundred thousand ducats; and the entire sum, exempt from the demands of luxury, was strictly appropriated to the public use. His manners were popular; but his discipline was severe; and every superfluous vice was banished from his camp: his example strengthened his command; and under his conduct, the Albanians were invincible in their own opinion and that of their enemies.

The bravest adventurers of France and Germany were allured by his fame and retained in his service: his standing militia consisted of eight thousand horse and seven thousand foot; the horses were small, the men were active: but he viewed with a discerning eye the difficulties and resources of the mountains; and, at the blaze of the beacons, the whole nation was distributed in the strongest posts. With such unequal arms Scanderbeg resisted twenty-three years the powers of the Ottoman empire; and two conquerors, Amurath the Second, and his greater son, were repeatedly baffled by a rebel, whom they pursued with seeming contempt and implacable resentment. At the head

H. s. revolt of the Turks.
 A. D. 1445,
 Nov. 28.

His valour;

who have deserved, without wearing, a royal crown. Belshazzar, Napoleonists of a crown. William first prince of Orange. Alexander duke of Parma, John Humilis, and George Gastrol, of Saxony.

[illegible]

of sixty thousand horse and forty thousand Janizaries, Amurath entered Albania; he might ravage the open country, occupy the defenceless towns, convert the churches into moschis, circumcise the Christian youths, and punish with death his adult and obstinate captives; but the conquests of the sultan were confined to the petty fortress of Sfetigrade; and the garrison, invincible to his arms, was oppressed by a paltry artifice and a superstitious scruple.<sup>40</sup> Amurath retired with shame and loss from the walls of Croya, the castle and residence of the Castriots; the march, the siege, the retreat, were harassed by a vexatious, and almost invisible, adversary;<sup>41</sup> and the disappointment might tend to embitter, perhaps to shorten, the last days of the sultan.<sup>42</sup> In the fulness of conquest, Mahomet the Second still felt at his bosom this domestic thorn: his lieutenants were permitted to negotiate a truce; and the Albanian prince may justly be praised as a firm and able champion of his national independence. The enthusiasm of chivalry and religion has ranked him with the names of Alexander and Pyrrhus; nor would they blush to acknowledge their intrepid countryman: but his narrow dominion, and slender powers, must leave him at an humble distance below the heroes of antiquity, who triumphed over the East and the Roman legions. His splendid achievements, the bashaws whom he encountered, the armies that he discomfited, and the three thousand Turks who were slain by his single hand, must be weighed in the scales of suspicious criticism. Against an illiterate enemy, and in the dark solitude of Epirus, his partial biographers may safely indulge the latitude of romance; but their fictions are exposed by the light of Italian history; and they afford a strong presumption against their own truth, by a fabulous tale of his exploits, when he passed the Adriatic with eight hundred horse to the succour of the king of Naples.<sup>43</sup> Without disparagement to his fame, they might have owned, that he was finally oppressed by the Ottoman powers: in his extreme danger he applied to pope Pius the Second for a refuge in the ecclesiastical state; and his resources were almost exhausted, since Scanderbeg died a fugitive at Lissus, on the Venetian territory.<sup>44</sup> His sepulchre was soon violated by the Turkish conquerors: but the Janizaries, who wore his bones enchased in a bracelet, declared by this superstitious amulet their involuntary reverence for his valour. The instant ruin of his country may redound to the hero's glory; yet, had he balanced the consequences of submission and resistance, a patriot perhaps would have declined the unequal contest which must depend on the life and genius of one man. Scanderbeg might indeed be supported by the rational, though fallacious, hope, that the pope, the king of Naples, and the Venetian republic, would join in the defence of a free and Christian people, who guarded the sea-coast of the Adriatic, and the narrow passage from Greece to Italy. His infant son was saved from the national shipwreck; the Castriots<sup>45</sup> were invested with a Neapolitan dukedom, and their blood continues to flow in the noblest families of the realm. A colony of Albanian fugitives obtained a settlement in Calabria, and they preserve at this day the language and manners of their ancestors.<sup>46</sup>

In the long career of the decline and fall of the Roman empire, I have reached at length the last reign of the princes of Constantinople, who so feebly sustained the name and majesty of the Cæsars. On the decease of John Palæologus, who survived about four years the Hungarian crusade,<sup>47</sup> the royal family, by the death of Andronicus and the monastic profession of Isidore, was reduced to three princes, Constantine, Demetrius, and Thomas, the surviving sons of the emperor Manuel. Of these the first and the last were far distant in the Morea; but Demetrius, who possessed the domain of Selybria, was in the suburbs, at the head of a party: his ambition was not chilled by the public distress; and his conspiracy with the Turks and the schismatics had already disturbed the peace of his country. The funeral of the late emperor was accelerated with singular and even suspicious haste: the claim of Demetrius to the vacant throne was justified by a trite and flimsy sophism, that he was born in the purple, the eldest son of his father's reign. But the empress-mother, the senate and soldiers, the clergy and people, were unanimous in the cause of the lawful successor; and the despot Thomas, who, ignorant of the change, accidentally returned to the capital, asserted with becoming zeal the interest of his absent brother. An ambassador, the historian Phranza, was immediately despatched to the court of Adrianople. Amurath received him with honour and dismissed him with gifts; but the gracious approbation of the Turkish sultan announced his supremacy, and the approaching downfall of the Eastern empire. By the hands of two illustrious deputies, the Imperial crown was placed at Sparta on the head of Constantine. In the spring he sailed from the Morea, escaped the encounter of a Turkish squadron, enjoyed the acclamations of his subjects, celebrated the festival of a new reign, and exhausted by his donatives the trea-

Constantine
the last of the Roman or Greek emperors.
A. D. 1448,
Nov. 13.
A. D. 1453,
May 29.

and death.
A. D. 1477,
Jan. 17.

<sup>40</sup> There were two Dibras, the upper and lower, the Bulgarian and Albanian: the former, 70 miles from Croya (l. i. p. 17), was contiguous to the fortress of Sfetigrade, whose inhabitants refused to drink from a well into which a dead dog had traitorously been cast (l. v. p. 159, 160.). We want a good map of Epirus.

<sup>41</sup> Compare the Turkish narrative of Cantemir (p. 92) with the pompous and prolix declamation in the 18th, 19th and 20th books of the Albanian priest, who has been copied by the tribe of strangers and moderns.

<sup>42</sup> In honour of his hero, Barletius (l. vi. p. 188–192.) kills the sultan, by disease indeed, under the walls of Croya. But this audacious fiction is disproved by the Greeks and Turks, who agree in the time and manner of Amurath's death at Adrianople.

<sup>43</sup> See the marvels of his Calabria expedition in the 18th and 19th books of Marinus Barletius, which may be refuted by the testimony or silence of Muratori (Annali d'Italia tom. xiii. p. 591.), and his original authors (Joh. Simonetti de Rebus Francisci scortia, in Muratori, 3. script. Rerum Ital. tom. xxi. p. 725. et alios). The Albanian emperor, under the name of Stradiots, soon became famous in the wars of Italy (Mémoires de Comines, l. viii. c. 5.).

<sup>44</sup> Spandanus, from the best evidence, and the most rational criticism, declares from a spurious epistle of Eugenius IV. to the king of Ethiopia.

Swinnburne (Travels
rhentic; but instead
A. D. 1419, No. 7)
of for assigns seven or eight years to the reign of the last Constantine, which he derives from a spurious epistle of Eugenius IV. to the king of Ethiopia.

sure, or rather the indigence, of the state. The emperor immediately resigned to his brothers the possession of the Morea; and the brittle friendship of the two princes, Demetrius and Thomas, was confirmed in their mother's presence by the frail security of oaths and embraces. His next occupation was the choice of a consort. A daughter of the doge of Venice had been proposed; but the Byzantine nobles objected the distance between an hereditary monarch and an elective magistrate; and in their subsequent distress, the chief of that powerful republic was not unmindful of the affront. Constantine afterwards hesitated between the royal families of Trebizond and Georgia; and the embassy of Phranza represents in his public and private life the last days of the Byzantine empire.<sup>48</sup>

The protovestiare, or great chamberlain, Phranza sailed from Constantinople as the minister of a bridegroom; and the relics of wealth and luxury were applied to his pompous appearance. His numerous retinue consisted of nobles and guards, of physicians and monks: he was attended by a band of music; and the term of his costly embassy was protracted above two years. On his arrival in Georgia or Iberia, the natives from the towns and villages flocked around the strangers; and such was their simplicity, that they were delighted with the effects, without understanding the cause, of musical harmony. Among the crowd, was an old man, above a hundred years of age, who had formerly been carried away a captive by the barbarians,<sup>49</sup> and who amused his hearers with a tale of the wonders of India,<sup>50</sup> from whence he had returned to Portugal by an unknown sea.<sup>51</sup> From this hospitable land, Phranza proceeded to the court of Trebizond, where he was informed by the Greek prince of the recent decease of Amurath. Instead of rejoicing in the deliverance, the experienced statesman expressed his apprehension, that an ambitious youth would not long adhere to the sage and pacific system of his father. After the sultan's decease, his Christian wife, Maria,<sup>52</sup> the daughter of the Servian despot, had been honourably restored to her parents; on the fame of her beauty and merit, she was recommended by the ambassador as the most worthy object of the royal choice; and Phranza recapitulates and refutes the specious objections that might be raised against the proposal. The majesty of the purple would ennoble an unequal alliance; the bar of affinity might be removed by liberal alms and the dispensation of the church; the disgrace of Turkish nuptials had been repeatedly overlooked; and, though the fair Maria was near fifty years of age, she might yet hope to give an heir to the empire. Constantine listened to the advice, which was transmitted in the first ship that sailed from Trebizond; but the factions of the court opposed his marriage; and it was finally prevented by the pious vow of the sultana, who ended her days in the monastic profession. Reduced to the first alternative, the choice of Phranza was decided in favour of a Georgian princess; and the vanity of her father was dazzled by the glorious alliance. Instead of demanding, according to the primitive and national custom, a price for his daughter, he offered a portion of fifty-six thousand, with an annual pension of five thousand, ducats; and the services of the ambassador were repaid by an assurance, that, as his son had been adopted in baptism by the emperor, the establishment of his daughter should be the peculiar care of the empress of Constantinople. On the return of Phranza, the treaty was ratified by the Greek monarch, who with his own hand impressed three vermilion crosses on the golden bull, and assured the Georgian envoy, that in the spring his galleys should conduct the bride to her Imperial palace. But Constantine embraced his faithful servant, not with the cold approbation of a sovereign, but with the warm confidence of a friend, who, after a long absence, is impatient to pour his secrets into the bosom of his friend. "Since the death of my mother and of <sup>State of the Byzantine court.</sup> Cantacuzene, who alone advised me without interest or passion,<sup>54</sup> I am sur- rounded," said the emperor, "by men whom I can neither love, nor trust, nor esteem. You are not a stranger to Lucas Notaras, the great admiral; obstinately attached to his own sentiments, he declares, both in private and public, that his sentiments are the absolute measure of my thoughts and actions. The rest of the courtiers are swayed by their personal or factious views: and how can I consult the monks on questions of policy and marriage? I have yet much employment for your diligence and fidelity. In the spring you shall engage one of my brothers to solicit the succour of the Western powers; from the Morea you shall sail to Cyprus on a particular mission; and from thence proceed to Georgia to receive and conduct the future empress." "Your commands," replied Phranza, "are irresistible; but deem, great sir," he added, with a serious smile, "to consider, that if I am thus perpetually absent from my family, my wife may be tempted either to seek another husband, or to throw herself into a monastery." After laughing at his apprehensions, the emperor more gravely consoled him by the pleasing assurance that this should be his last service abroad, and that he destined for his son

<sup>48</sup> Phranza, p. 11. <sup>49</sup> The happy and pious Indians lived an hundred and fifty years, and some of them were above two hundred years of age. <sup>50</sup> The happy and pious Indians lived an hundred and fifty years, and some of them were above two hundred years of age. <sup>51</sup> The happy and pious Indians lived an hundred and fifty years, and some of them were above two hundred years of age. <sup>52</sup> Maria's first husband was the Tatar monarch's first son, who was killed by the Tartars.

<sup>53</sup> The happy and pious Indians lived an hundred and fifty years, and some of them were above two hundred years of age. <sup>54</sup> The happy and pious Indians lived an hundred and fifty years, and some of them were above two hundred years of age.

<sup>55</sup> The happy and pious Indians lived an hundred and fifty years, and some of them were above two hundred years of age. <sup>56</sup> The happy and pious Indians lived an hundred and fifty years, and some of them were above two hundred years of age.

<sup>57</sup> The happy and pious Indians lived an hundred and fifty years, and some of them were above two hundred years of age. <sup>58</sup> The happy and pious Indians lived an hundred and fifty years, and some of them were above two hundred years of age.

the old and incompatible error which places the source of the Nile in India.

<sup>52</sup> Cantemir (p. 83.), who styles her the daughter of Lazarus Orla, and the Helen of the servants, places her marriage with Amurath in the year 1424. It will not easily be believed, that in six and twenty years' cohabitation, the sultan corpus evis non detigit. After the taking of Constantinople, she fled to Mahomet II. (Phranza, l. iii. c. 24.).

<sup>53</sup> The classical reader will recollect the offers of Agamemnon (Iliad, l. v. 141.), and the general practice of augury.

<sup>54</sup> Cantacuzene (I am ignorant of his relation to the emperor of the name) was a great domestic, a firm adherent of the Greek error, and a brother of the present of Servia, whom he visited with the character of ambassador (Simplicius, p. 27, 28. 12.).

Hope, is spurious or wonderful. But this new geography is sullied by

In the reign of Amurath, he twice tasted of royalty, and twice descended from the throne: his tender age was incapable of opposing his father's restoration, but never could he forgive the vizirs who had recommended that salutary measure. His nuptials were celebrated with the daughter of a Turkman emir: and, after a festival of two months, he departed from Adrianople with his bride, to reside in the government of Magnesia. Before the end of six weeks he was recalled by a sudden message from the divan, which announced the decease of Amurath, and the mutinous spirit of the Janizaries. His speed and vigour commanded their obedience: he passed the Hellespont with a chosen guard; and at the distance of a mile from Adrianople, the vizirs and emirs, the imams and eadlis, the soldiers and the people, fell prostrate before the new sultan. They affected to weep, they affected to rejoice; he ascended the throne at the age of twenty-one years, and removed the cause of sedition by the death, the inevitable death, of his infant brothers.<sup>9</sup> The ambassadors of Europe and Asia soon appeared to congratulate his accession and solicit his friendship; and to all he spoke the language of moderation and peace. The confidence of the Greek emperor was revived by the solemn oaths and fair assurances with which he sealed the ratification of the treaty: and a rich domain on the banks of the Strymon was assigned for the annual payment of three hundred thousand aspers, the pension of an Ottoman prince, who was detained at his request in the Byzantine court. Yet the neighbours of Mahomet might tremble at the severity with which a youthful monarch reformed the pomp of his father's household: the expenses of luxury were applied to those of ambition, and an useless train of seven thousand filioners was either dismissed from his service, or enlisted in his troops. In the first summer of his reign, he visited with an army the Asiatic provinces; but after humbling the pride, Mahomet accepted the submission, of the Caramanian, that he might not be diverted by the smallest obstacle from the execution of his great design.<sup>10</sup>

The Mahometan, and more especially the Turkish casuists, have pronounced that no promise can bind the faithful against the interest and duty of their religion; and that the sultan may abrogate his own treaties and those of his predecessors. The justice and magnanimity of Amurath had scorned this immoral privilege; but his son, though the proudest of men, could stoop from ambition to the basest arts of dissimulation and deceit. Peace was on his lips, while war was in his heart: he incessantly sighed for the possession of Constantinople; and the Greeks, by their own indiscretion, afforded the first pretence of the fatal rupture.<sup>11</sup> Instead of labouring to be forgotten, their ambassadors pursued his camp, to demand the payment, and even the increase, of their annual stipend: the divan was importuned by their complaints, and the vizir, a secret friend of the Christians, was constrained to deliver the sense of his brethren. "Ye foolish and miserable Romans," said Calil, "we know your devices, and ye are ignorant of your own danger! the scrupulous Amurath is no more; his throne is occupied by a young conqueror, whom no laws can bind, and no obstacles can resist: and if you escape from his hands, give praise to the divine clemency, which yet delays the chastisement of your sins. Why do ye seek to affright us by vain and indirect menaces? Release the fugitive Orchan, crown him sultan of Romania; call the Hungarians from beyond the Danube; arm against us the nations of the West; and be assured, that you will only provoke and precipitate your ruin." But if the fears of the ambassadors were alarmed by the stern language of the vizir, they were soothed by the courteous audience and friendly speeches of the Ottoman prince; and Mahomet assured them that on his return to Adrianople, he would redress the grievances, and consult the true interests, of the Greeks. No sooner had he repassed the Hellespont, than he issued a mandate to suppress their pension, and to expel their officers from the banks of the Strymon: in this measure he betrayed an hostile mind; and the second order announced, and in some degree commenced, the siege of Constantinople. In the narrow pass of the Bosphorus, an Asiatic fortress had formerly been raised by his grandfather: in the opposite situation, on the European side he resolved to erect a more formidable castle; and a thousand masons were commanded to assemble in the spring on a spot named Asomaton, about five miles from the Greek metropolis.<sup>12</sup> Persuasion is the resource of the feeble; and the feeble can seldom persuade: the ambassadors of the emperor attempted, without success, to divert Mahomet from the execution of his design. They represented, that his grandfather had solicited the permission of Manuel to build a castle on his own territories; but that this double fortification, which would command the strait, could only tend to violate the alliance of the nations; to intercept the Latins who traded in the Black Sea, and perhaps to annihilate the subsistence of the city. "I form no enterprise," replied the perfidious

<sup>9</sup> Calapin, one of these royal infants, was saved from his cruel brother, and baptized at Rome, under the name of Callistus, or Callistus. The emperor Frederick III. was no Christian with an estate in Austria, where he ended his life, and Cusiman, who in his youth conversed with the aged prince at Vienna, applauds his piety and wisdom (de Cesaribus, p. 62, 63).

<sup>10</sup> See the accession of Mahomet II. in Ducas (c. 53), Florinus (l. i. c. 35, l. iii. c. 2), Chalcocondyles (l. vi. p. 129), and Canten (l. vi. p. 26).

<sup>11</sup> Before I enter on the siege of Constantinople, I shall observe, that except the short history of Canten and Ippolitus, I have not been able to obtain any Turkish account of this conquest: such an account as we possess of the siege of Rhodes by Soliman II. (Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xvi. p. 723, 724). I must therefore depend on the Greeks, whose prejudices, in some degree, are softened by their distress. Our standard texts are those of Ducas (c. 34-42), Florinus (l. iii. c. 7-20), Chalcocondyles (l. vi. p. 201-214), and Leonardus Chalcas (Historia C. P. a Turco ex-nate, Norimbergae, 1541, in 4to. 20 leaves). The last of these writers is the earliest in date, since it was composed in the year of the siege, the 1st of August 1453, only seventy-nine days after the loss of the city, and in the first confusion of grief and mourning. Some give (1) to ad. 74 (157).

though critically reviewed by Spaldman (A. D. 1155, No. 1-2). The hearsay notions of Montreuil and the distant Latins, I shall take leave to disregard.

<sup>12</sup> The situation of the fortress, and the topography of the Bosphorus, are best learned from Peter (Collas) de Bosphoro Thracico, l. iii. c. 15, 16, Laonicus (l. i. c. 15, 16), and a constant Voyage dans le Levant, tom. ii. lettre xv. p. 415, 416; but I must repeat the remark, that the Turkish account of the Turkish conquest of the city is not to be trusted. The reader may turn back to ch. vi.

sultan, "against the city; but the empire of Constantinople is measured by her walls. "Have you forgot the distress to which my father was reduced, when you formed a league with the Hungarians; when they invaded our country by land, and the Hellespont was occupied by the French galleys? Amurath was compelled to force the passage of the Bosphorus; and your strength was not equal to your malevolence. I was then a child at Adrianople; the Moslems trembled; and for a while the Gabours<sup>13</sup> insulted our disgrace. "But when my father had triumphed in the field of Warn, he vowed to erect a fort on the western shore, and that vow it is my duty to accomplish. Have ye the right, have ye the power, to control my actions on my own ground? For that ground is my own: as far as the shores of the Bosphorus, Asia is inhabited by the Turks, and Europe is deserted by the Romans. Return, and inform your king, that the present Ottoman is far different from his predecessors; that his resolutions more pass their wishes; and that he performs more than they could resolve. Return in safety—but the next who delivers a similar message may expect to be flayed alive." After this declaration, Constantine, the first of the Greeks in spirit as in rank,<sup>14</sup> had determined to unsheath the sword, and to resist the approach and establishment of the Turks on the Bosphorus. He was disarmed by the advice of his civil and ecclesiastical ministers, who recommended a system less generous, and even less prudent, than his own, to approve their patience and long-suffering, to brand the Ottoman with the name and guilt of an aggressor, and to depend on chance and time for their own safety, and the destruction of a fort which could not long be maintained in the neighbourhood of a great and populous city. Amidst hope and fear, the fears of the wise, and the hopes of the credulous, the winter rolled away; the proper business of each man, and each hour, was postponed; and the Greeks shut their eyes against the impending danger, till the arrival of the spring and the sultan decided the assurance of their ruin.

He builds a fortress on the Bosphorus.
A. D. 1522,
March.

Of a master who never forgives, the orders are seldom disobeyed. On the twenty-sixth of March, the appointed spot of Asomaton was covered with an active swarm of Turkish artificers; and the materials by sea and land were diligently transported from Europe and Asia.<sup>15</sup> The lime had been burnt in Cataplurygia; the timber was cut down in the woods of Heraclea and Nicomedia; and the stones were dug from the Anatolian quarries. Each of the thousand masons was assisted by two workmen; and a measure of two cubits was marked for their daily task. The fortress<sup>16</sup> was built in a triangular form; each angle was flanked by a strong and massy tower; one on the declivity of the hill, two along the sea-shore: a thickness of twenty-two feet was assigned for the walls, thirty for the towers; and the whole building was covered with a solid platform of lead. Mahomet himself pressed and directed the work with indefatigable ardour: his three vizirs claimed the honour of finishing their respective towers; the zeal of the cadhis emulated that of the Janizaries; the meanest labour was ennobled by the service of God and the sultan; and the diligence of the multitude was quickened by the eye of a despot, whose smile was the hope of fortune, and whose frown was the messenger of death. The Greek emperor beheld with terror the irresistible progress of the work; and vainly strove, by flattery and gifts, to assuage an implacable foe, who sought, and secretly fomented, the slightest occasion of a quarrel. Such occasions must soon and inevitably be found. The ruins of stately churches, and even the marble columns which had been consecrated to St. Michael the archangel, were employed without scruple by the profane and rapacious Moslems; and some Christians, who presumed to oppose the removal, received from their hands the crown of martyrdom. Constantine had solicited a Turkish guard to protect the fields and harvests of his subjects: the guard was fixed; but their first order was to allow free pasture to the mules and horses of the camp, and to defend their brethren if they should be molested by the natives. The retinue of an Ottoman chief had left their horses to pass the night among the ripe corn: the damage was felt; the insult was resented; and several of both nations were slain in a tumultuous conflict. Mahomet listened with joy to the complaint; and a detachment was commanded to exterminate the guilty village: the guilty had fled; but forty innocent and unsuspecting reapers were massacred by the soldiers. Till this provocation, Constantinople had been open to the visits of commerce and curiosity: on the first alarm the gates were shut; but the emperor, still anxious for peace, released on the third day his Turkish captives;<sup>17</sup> and expressed, in a last message, the firm resignation of a Christian and a soldier. "Since neither oaths, nor treaty, nor submission, can secure peace, pursue," said he to Mahomet, "your impious warfare. My trust is in God alone: if it should please him to mollify your heart, I shall rejoice in the happy change; if he delivers the city into your hands, I submit without a murmur to his holy will. But until the Judge of the earth shall pronounce between us, it is my duty to live and die in the defence of my people." The sultan's answer was hostile and dewar, June.

The Turkish

Sept. 1;

<sup>13</sup> The opprobrious name which the Turks bestow on the infidels is expressed Kafoors by Ducas, and Gouurs by Feencavius and the moderns. The former term is derived by Ducange (Gloss. Græc.) from καφός = filthy.

the Greek historians.

<sup>16</sup> In the dimensions of this fortress, the old castle of Europe, as described by the ancients, was not less than 1000 feet long, and 500 feet high, unless they could return before sunset.

ous of his
the city

cisive: his fortifications were completed; and before his departure for Adrianople, he stationed a vigilant Aga and four hundred Janizaries, to levy a tribute of the ships of every nation that should pass within the reach of their cannon. A Venetian vessel, refusing obedience to the new lords of the Bosphorus, was sunk with a single bullet. The master and thirty sailors escaped in the boat; but they were dragged in chains to the Porte: the chief was impaled; his companions were beheaded, and the historian Ducas<sup>18</sup> beheld, at Demotica, their bodies exposed to the wild beasts. The siege of Constantinople was deferred till the ensuing spring; but an Ottoman army marched into the Morea to divert the force of the brothers of Constantine. At this era of calamity, one of these princeps, the despot Thomas, was blessed or afflicted with the birth of a son; "the last heir," says the plaintive Phranza, "of the last spark of the Roman empire."<sup>19</sup>

Preparations for the siege of Constantinople.
A. D. 1132,
September.
A. D. 1133,
April.

The Greeks and the Turks passed an anxious and sleepless winter: the former were kept awake by their fears, the latter by their hopes: both by the preparations of defence and attack; and the two emperors, who had the most to lose or to gain, were the most deeply affected by the national sentiment. In Mahomet, that sentiment was inflamed by the ardour of his youth and temper: he amused his leisure with building at Adrianople<sup>20</sup> the lofty palace of Jehan Numa (the watch-tower of the world); but his serious thoughts were irrevocably bent on the conquest of the city of Cæsar. At the dead of night, about the second watch, he started from his bed, and commanded the instant attendance of his prime vizir. The message, the hour, the prince, and his own situation, alarmed the guilty conscience of Calil Baslia; who had possessed the confidence, and advised the restoration, of Amurath. On the accession of the son, the vizir was confirmed in his office and the appearances of favour; but the veteran statesman was not insensible that he trod on a thin and slippery ice, which might break under his footsteps, and plunge him in the abyss. His friendship for the Christians, which might be innocent under the late reign, had stigmatised him with the name of Gabour Ortachi, or foster-brother of the infidels;<sup>21</sup> and his avarice entertained a venal and treasonable correspondence, which was detected and punished after the conclusion of the war. On receiving the royal mandate, he embraced, perhaps for the last time, his wife and children; filled a eup with pieces of gold, hastened to the palace, adored the sultan, and offered, according to the Oriental custom, the slight tribute of his duty and gratitude.<sup>22</sup> "It is not my wish," said Mahomet, "to resume my gifts, but rather to heap and multiply them on thy head. In my turn I ask a present far more valuable and important;—Constantinople." As soon as the vizir had recovered from his surprise, "The same God," said he, "who has already given thee so large a portion of the Roman empire, will not deny the remnant, and the capital. His providence, and thy power, assure thy success; and myself, with the rest of thy faithful slaves, will sacrifice our lives and fortunes." "Lala,"<sup>23</sup> (or preceptor,) continued the sultan, "do you see this pillow? all the night, in my agitation, I have pulled it on one side and the other; I have risen from my bed, again have I lain down; yet sleep has not visited these weary eyes. Beware of the gold and silver of the Romans: in arms we are superior; and with the aid of God, and the prayers of the prophet, we shall speedily become masters of Constantinople." To sound the disposition of his soldiers, he often wandered through the streets alone, and in disguise; and it was fatal to discover the sultan, when he wished to escape from the vulgar eye. His hours were spent in delineating the plan of the hostile city; in debating with his generals and engineers, on what spot he should erect his batteries; on which side he should assault the walls; where he should spring his mines; to what place he should apply his scaling-ladders; and the exercises of the day repeated and proved the lucubrations of the night.

Among the implements of destruction, he studied with peculiar care the recent and tremendous discovery of the Latins; and his artillery surpassed whatever had yet appeared in the world. A founder of cannon, a Dane or Hungarian, who had been almost starved in the Greek service, deserted to the Moslems, and was liberally entertained by the Turkish sultan. Mahomet was satisfied with the answer to his first question, which he eagerly pressed on the artist. "Am I able to cast a cannon capable of throwing a ball or stone of sufficient size to batter the walls of Constantinople? I am not ignorant of their strength, but were they more solid than those of Babylon, I could oppose an engine of superior power: the position and management of that engine must be left to your engineers." On this assurance, a foundry was established at Adrianople: the metal was prepared; and at the end of three months, Urban produced a piece of brass ordnance of stupendous, and almost incredible, magnitude; a measure of twelve palms is assigned to the bore; and the stone bullet weighed above six hundred pounds.<sup>24</sup> A vacant

The great cannon of Mahomet.

<sup>18</sup> Ducas, c. 55. Phranza (l. iii. c. 7), who had sailed in his vessel, commemorates the Venetian pilot as a martyr.

<sup>19</sup> Augustus est Palæologorum genus, et Imperii successore, parvæque Romanorum scintille heres, natus, Andreas, &c. (Phranza, l. i. c. 7.)

<sup>20</sup> The strong expression was inspired by his feelings.

<sup>21</sup> Cantemur, p. 97, 98. The sultan was either doubtful of his conquest, or ignorant of the superior merits of Constantinople. A city or a kingdom may sometimes be ruined by the Imperial force of their sovereign.

<sup>22</sup> 20000000, by the president Cousin, is translated pre-nourricier, most correctly indeed from the Latin version, but in his haste he has overlooked the note by which Imael Boaillet (ad Ducan, c. 55.) acknowledges and renounces his own error.

<sup>23</sup> The Oriental custom of never appearing without gifts before a sovereign or a superior, is of high antiquity, and seems analogous with the examination of the children. and it may be observed, that all such primitive words, which denote their parents, are the simple repetition of one syllable, composed of a labial or dental consonant and an open vowel. (Cesari.)

corruptus out among weight of one hundred, or one hundred and a twenty-five pounds (the weight of a cannon ball) is denoted by the Latin name of the stone of the sea of Lapidem, qui pennis urbe un ex meis ambulat in gyro.

place before the new palace was chosen for the first experiment; but, to prevent the sudden and mischievous effects of astonishment and fear, a proclamation was issued, that the cannon would be discharged the ensuing day. The explosion was felt or heard in a circuit of a hundred furlongs: the ball, by the force of gunpowder, was driven above a mile; and on the spot where it fell, it buried itself a fathom deep in the ground. For the conveyance of this destructive engine, a frame or carriage of thirty wagons was linked together and drawn along by a team of sixty oxen: two hundred men on both sides were stationed to poise and support the rolling weight; two hundred and fifty workmen marched before to smooth the way and repair the bridges; and near two months were employed in a laborious journey of one hundred and fifty miles. A lively philosopher<sup>25</sup> derides on this occasion the credulity of the Greeks, and observes, with much reason, that we should always distrust the exaggerations of a vanquished people. He calculates, that a ball, even of two hundred pounds, would require a charge of one hundred and fifty pounds of powder: and that the stroke would be feeble and impotent, since not a fifteenth part of the mass could be inflamed at the same moment. A stranger as I am to the art of destruction, I can discern that the modern improvements of artillery prefer the number of pieces to the weight of metal; the quickness of the fire to the sound, or even the consequence, of a single explosion. Yet I dare not reject the positive and unanimous evidence of contemporary writers; nor can it seem improbable, that the first artists, in their rude and ambitious efforts, should have transgressed the standard of moderation. A Turkish cannon, more enormous than that of Mahomet, still guards the entrance of the Dardanelles; and if the use be inconvenient, it has been found on a late trial that the effect was far from contemptible. A stone bullet of eleven hundred pounds weight was once discharged with three hundred and thirty pounds of powder; at the distance of six hundred yards it shivered into three rocky fragments, traversed the strait, and, leaving the waters in a foam, again rose and bounded against the opposite hill.<sup>26</sup>

Mahomet II. forms the siege of Constantinople.
A. D. 1453,
April 6.

While Mahomet threatened the capital of the East, the Greek emperor implored with fervent prayers the assistance of earth and Heaven. But the invisible powers were deaf to his supplications; and Christendom beheld with indifference the fall of Constantinople, while she derived at least some promise of supply from the jealous and temporal policy of the sultan of Egypt. Some states were too weak, and others too remote; by some the danger was considered as imaginary, by others as inevitable: the Western princes were involved in their endless and domestic quarrels; and the Roman pontiff was exasperated by the falsehood or obstinacy of the Greeks. Instead of employing in their favour the arms and treasures of Italy, Nicholas the Fifth had foretold their approaching ruin; and his honour was engaged in the accomplishment of his prophecy. Perhaps he was softened by the last extremity of their distress; but his compassion was tardy; his efforts were faint and unavailing; and Constantinople had fallen, before the squadrons of Genoa and Venice could sail from their harbours.<sup>27</sup> Even the princes of the Morea and of the Greek islands affected a cold neutrality: the Genoese colony of Galata negotiated a private treaty; and the sultan indulged them in the delusive hope, that by his clemency they might survive the ruin of the empire. A plebeian crowd, and some Byzantine nobles, basely withdrew from the danger of their country; and the avarice of the rich denied the emperor, and reserved for the Turks, the secret treasures which might have raised in their defence whole armies of mercenaries.<sup>28</sup> The indigent and solitary prince prepared however to sustain his formidable adversary; but if his courage were equal to the peril, his strength was inadequate to the contest. In the beginning of the spring, the Turkish vanguard swept the towns and villages as far as the gates of Constantinople: submission was spared and protected; whatever presumed to resist was exterminated with fire and sword. The Greek places on the Black Sea, Mesembria, Acheloum, and Bizon, surrendered on the first summons: Selybria alone deserved the honours of a siege or blockade; and the bold inhabitants, while they were invested by land, launched their boats, pillaged the opposite coast of Cyzicus, and sold their captives in the public market. But on the approach of Mahomet himself all was silent and prostrate: he first halted at the distance of five miles; and from thence advancing in battle array, planted before the gate of St. Romanus the Imperial standard; and, on the sixth day of April, formed the memorable siege of Constantinople.

The troops of Asia and Europe <sup>Forces of the Turks;</sup> extended on the right and left from the Propontis to the harbour; the Janizaries in the front were stationed before the sultan's tent; the Ottoman line was covered by a deep intrenchment; and a subordinate army enclosed the suburb of Galata, and watched the doubtful faith of the Genoese. The inquisitive Philolphus, who resided in Greece about thirty years before the siege, is confident, that all the Turkish forces, of any name or value, could not exceed the number of sixty thousand horse and twenty thousand foot; and he upbraids the pusillanimity of the nations, who had tamely yielded to an handful of barbarians. Such, indeed, might be the regular establishment of the Capiculu,<sup>29</sup> the troops <sup>25</sup> See Voltaire (Hist. Générale, c. xci. p. 294, 295.). He was ambitious of universal monarchy; and the poet frequently aspires to the name and style of an astronomer, a chymist, &c.

<sup>26</sup> The Baron de Tott (tom. ii. p. 87-89), who fortified the Dardanelles against the Russians, describes in a letter, and even compares, strain his own prowess, and the con-temnation of the Turks. But that adventurous traveller does not possess the art of gaining our confidence.

<sup>27</sup> See Sponand. A. D. 1453, No. 5.)

<sup>28</sup> Antonin in Froem.—Epist. Cardinal. Isidor. apud Spondanum;

and De Tott in his account of the siege of Constantinople.

before the Casa Nuova of Soliman II. from which, and his own experience, count Marsigli has composed his Military state of the Ottoman empire.

of the Porte, who marched with the prince, and were paid from his royal treasury. But the bashaws, in their respective governments, maintained or levied a provincial militia; many lands were held by a military tenure; many volunteers were attracted by the hope of spoil; and the sound of the holy trumpet invited a swarm of hungry and fearless fanatics, who might contribute at least to multiply the terrors, and in a first attack to blunt the swords, of the Christians. The whole mass of the Turkish powers is magnified by Dueas, Chalcondyles, and Leonard of Chios, to the amount of three or four hundred thousand men; but Phranza was a less remote and more accurate judge, and his precise definition of two hundred and fifty-eight thousand does not exceed the measure of experience and probability.<sup>30</sup> The navy of the besiegers was less formidable: the Propontis was overspread with three hundred and twenty sail; but of these no more than eighteen could be rated as galleys of war; and the far greater part must be degraded to the condition of storeships and transports, which poured into the camp fresh supplies of men, ammunition, and provisions. In her

of the Greeks.

last decay, Constantinople was still peopled with more than an hundred thousand inhabitants; but these numbers are found in the accounts, not of war, but of captivity; and they mostly consisted of mechanics, of priests, of women, and of men devoid of that spirit which even women have sometimes exerted for the common safety. I can suppose, I could almost excuse, the reluctance of subjects to serve on a distant frontier, at the will of a tyrant; but the man who dares not expose his life in the defence of his children and his property, has lost in society the first and most active energies of nature. By the emperor's command, a particular enquiry had been made through the streets and houses, how many of the citizens, or even of the monks, were able and willing to bear arms for their country. The lists were intrusted to Phranza;<sup>31</sup> and, after a diligent addition, he informed his master, with grief and surprise, that the national defence was reduced to four thousand nine hundred and seventy Romans. Between Constantine and his faithful minister, this comfortless secret was preserved; and a sufficient proportion of shields, cross-bows, and muskets, was distributed from the arsenal to the city bands. They derived some accession from a body of two thousand strangers, under the command of John Justiniani, a noble Genoese; a liberal donative was advanced to these auxiliaries; and a princely recompence, the isle of Lemnos, was promised to the valour and victory of their chief. A strong chain was drawn across the mouth of the harbour: it was supported by some Greek and Italian vessels of war and merchandise; and the ships of every Christian nation, that successively arrived from Candia and the Black Sea, were detained for the public service. Against the powers of the Ottoman empire, a city of the extent of thirteen, perhaps of sixteen, miles was defended by a scanty garrison of seven or eight thousand soldiers. Europe and Asia were open to the besiegers; but the strength and provisions of the Greeks must sustain a daily decrease; nor could they indulge the expectation of any foreign succour or supply.

The primitive Romans would have drawn their swords in the resolution of death or conquest. The primitive Christians might have embraced each other, and awaited in patience and charity the stroke of martyrdom. But the Greeks of Constantinople were animated only by the spirit of religion, and that spirit was productive only of animosity and discord. Before his death, the emperor John Palæologus had renounced the unpopular measure of an union with the Latins; nor was the idea revived, till the distress of his brother Constantine imposed a last trial of flattery and dissimulation.<sup>32</sup> With the demand of temporal aid, his ambassadors were instructed to mingle the assurance of spiritual obedience: his neglect of the church was excused by the urgent cares of the state; and his orthodox wishes solicited the presence of a Roman legate. The Vatican had been too often deluded; yet the signs of repentance could not decently be overlooked; a legate was more easily granted than an army; and about six months before the final destruction, the cardinal Isidore of Russia appeared in that character with a retinue of priests and soldiers. The emperor saluted him as a friend and father; respectfully listened to his public and private sermons; and with the most obsequious of the clergy and laymen subscribed the act of union, as it had been ratified in the council of Florence. On the 12th of December, the two nations, in the church of St. Sophia, joined in the communion of sacrifice and prayer; and the names of the two pontiffs were solemnly commemorated; the names of Nicholas the Fifth, the vicar of Christ, and of the patriarch Gregory, who had been driven into exile by a rebellious people.

But the dress and language of the Latin priest who officiated at the altar, were an object of scandal; and it was observed with horror, that he consecrated a cake or wafer of unleavened bread, and poured cold water into the cup of the sacrament. A national historian acknowledges with a blush, that none of his countrymen, not the emperor himself, were sincere in this occasional conformity.<sup>33</sup> Their hasty and unconditional submission was palliated by a promise of future revival; but the best, or the worst, of their excuses was the confession of their own perjury. When they were pressed by the reproaches of False union of the two churches. A. D. 1159, Dec. 12.

Obstinacy and fanaticism of the Greeks.

<sup>30</sup> The observation of Philiphilus is approved by Casparian in the year 1509 de Casaribus, in Epilog. de Militia Turca. p. 37. Marsili proves, that the effective armies of the Turks are much less numerous than they appear. In the army that besieged Constantinople, Leonard Chienus reckons no more than 15,000 Janizaries.

<sup>31</sup> E. zo, polem. (Imp.) tollitis extrinsecum non ab omni dolore mentis, transgrediendo in diuina doctrina minime. Phranza, l. c. 8. With some indulgence for national prejudices, we learn t

deare a more authentic witness, not only of public facts, but of private emotions.

<sup>32</sup> In Spordanus, the narrative of the union is not only partial, but imperfect. The bishop of Sardines died in 1142, and the history of Phranza, which represents these events (l. 29, 37.) with such truth and spirit, was not printed till the year 1749.

<sup>33</sup> Phranza, l. c. 11. The emperor Gregory, a Jew acknowledges that the measure was adopted only to procure temporal aid. He allures with pleasure that these Latins will do nothing but to divide the city of St. Sophia, sacra cu panem et vinum.

their honest brethren, "Have patience," they whispered, "have patience till God shall have delivered the city from the great dragon who seeks to devour us. You shall then perceive whether we are truly reconciled with the Azymites." But patience is not the attribute of zeal; nor can the arts of a court be adapted to the freedom and violence of popular enthusiasm. From the dome of St. Sophia, the inhabitants of either sex, and of every degree, rushed in crowds to the cell of the monk Genadius,<sup>34</sup> to consult the oracle of the church. The holy man was invisible; entranced, as it should seem, in deep meditation, or divine rapture; but he had exposed on the door of his cell a speaking tablet; and they successively withdrew, after reading these tremendous words: "O miserable Romans! why will ye abandon the truth; and why, instead of confiding in God, will ye put your trust in the Italians? In losing your faith, you will lose your city. Have mercy on me, O Lord! I protest in thy presence, that I am innocent of the crime. O miserable Romans! consider, pause, and repent. At the same moment that you renounce the religion of your fathers, by embracing impiety, you submit to a foreign servitude." According to the advice of Genadius, the religious virgins, as pure as angels, and as proud as demons, rejected the act of union, and abjured all communion with the present and future associates of the Latins; and their example was applauded and imitated by the greatest part of the clergy and people. From the monastery, the devout Greeks dispersed themselves in the taverns; drank confusion to the slaves of the pope; emptied their glasses in honour of the image of the holy Virgin; and besought her to defend against Mahomet, the city which she had formerly saved from Chosroes and the Chagan. In the double intoxication of zeal and wine, they valiantly exclaimed, "What occasion have we for succour, or union, or Latins? far from us be the word ship of the Azymites!" During the winter that preceded the Turkish conquest, the nation was distracted by this epidemical frenzy; and the season of Lent, the approach of Easter, instead of breathing charity and love, served only to fortify the obstinacy and influence of the zealots. The confessors scrutinized and alarmed the conscience of their votaries, and a rigorous penance was imposed on those who had received the communion from a priest, who had given an express or tacit consent to the union. His service at the altar propagated the infection to the mute and simple spectators of the ceremony: they forfeited, by the impure spectacle, the virtue of the sacerdotal character; nor was it lawful, even in danger of sudden death, to invoke the assistance of their prayers or absolution. No sooner had the church of St. Sophia been polluted by the Latin sacrifice, than it was deserted as a Jewish synagogue, or an heathen temple, by the clergy and people: and a vast and gloomy silence prevailed in that venerable dome, which had so often smoked with a cloud of incense, blazed with innumerable lights, and resounded with the voice of prayer and thanksgiving. The Latins were the most odious of heretics and infidels; and the first minister of the empire, the great duke, was heard to declare, that he had rather behold in Constantinople the turban of Mahomet, than the pope's tiara or a cardinal's hat.<sup>35</sup> A sentiment so unworthy of Christians and patriots was familiar and fatal to the Greeks: the emperor was deprived of the affection and support of his subjects; and their native cowardice was sanctified by resignation to the divine decree, or the visionary hope of a miraculous deliverance.

Of the triangle which composes the figure of Constantinople, the two sides along the sea were made inaccessible to an enemy; the Propontis by nature, and the harbour by art. Between the two waters, the basis of the triangle, the land side was protected by a double wall, and a deep ditch of the depth of one hundred feet. Against this line of fortification, which Phranza, an eye-witness, prolongs to the measure of six miles,<sup>36</sup> the Ottomans directed their principal attack; and the emperor, after distributing the service and command of the most perilous stations, undertook the defence of the external wall. In the first days of the siege, the Greek soldiers descended into the ditch, or sallied into the field; but they soon discovered, that in the proportion of their numbers, one Christian was of more value than twenty Turks; and, after these bold preludes, they were prudently content to maintain the rampart with their missile weapons. Nor should this prudence be accused of pusillanimity. The nation was indeed pusillanimous and base; but the last Constantine deserves the name of an hero: his noble band of volunteers was inspired with Roman virtue; and the foreign auxiliaries supported the honour of the Western chivalry. The incessant volleys of lances and arrows were accompanied with the smoke, the sound, and the fire, of their musketry and cannon. Their small arms discharged at the same time either five, or even ten, balls of lead, of the size of a walnut; and, according to the closeness of the ranks and the force of the powder, several breast-plates and bodies were transpierced by the same shot. But the Turkish approaches were soon sunk in trenches, or covered with ruins. Each day added to the science of the Christians; but their inadequate stock of gunpowder was wasted in the operations of each day. Their ordnance was not powerful, either in size or number; and if they possessed some heavy cannon, they feared to plant them on the walls, lest the aged structure should be shaken and overthrown by the Siege of Constantinople by Mahomet II. A. D. 1453, April 6—May 29.

<sup>34</sup> His primitive and secular name was George Scholarius, which he changed for that of Genadius, either when he became a monk or a patriarch. His defence, at Florence of the same union which he so furiously attacked at Constantinople, has tempted Leo Allatius (Thesaur. de controversiis, in Flor. Biblot. Græc. tom. A. p. 260) to divide him into two men; but Renoulet (p. 315—357) has restored the identity of his person and the duplicity of his character.

<sup>35</sup> ἡ ἀκαθάρτης, ἐκείνητος, may be fairly translated a cardinal's hat. The difference of the Greek and Latin habits embittered the schism.

<sup>36</sup> ἡ πόλις ἡμετέρα ἐστὶν ὡς τριῶν μιλίων ὁρίων, says the Greek geographer. The Greek empire, to the smallest measure, was three miles long.

explosion.<sup>87</sup> The same destructive secret had been revealed to the Moslems, by whom it was employed with the superior energy of zeal, riches, and despotism. The great cannon of Mahomet has been separately noticed, an important and visible object in the history of the times; but that enormous engine was flanked by two fellows almost of equal magnitude:<sup>88</sup> the long order of the Turkish artillery was pointed against the walls; fourteen batteries thundered at once on the most accessible places; and of one of these it is ambiguously expressed, that it was mounted with one hundred and thirty guns, or that it discharged one hundred and thirty bullets. Yet, in the power and activity of the sultan, we may discern the infancy of the new science. Under a master who counted the moments, the great cannon could be loaded and fired no more than seven times in one day.<sup>89</sup> The heated metal unfortunately burst; several workmen were destroyed; and the skill of an artist was admired who bethought himself of preventing the danger and the accident, by pouring oil, after each explosion, into the mouth of the cannon.

Attack and defence.

The first random shots, were productive of more sound than effect ; and it was by the advice of a Christian, that the engineers were taught to level their aim against the two opposite sides of the salient angles of a bastion. However imperfect, the weight and repetition of the fire made some impression on the walls ; and the Turks, pushing their approaches to the edge of the ditch, attempted to fill the enormous chasm, and to build a road to the assault.<sup>40</sup> Innumerable fascines, and hog-heads, and trunks of trees, were heaped on each other ; and such was the impetuosity of the throng, that the foremost and the weakest were pushed headlong down the precipice, and instantly buried under the accumulated mass. To fill the ditch, was the toil of the besiegers ; to clear away the rubbish, was the safety of the besieged ; and, after a long and bloody conflict, the web that had been woven in the day was still unravelled in the night. The next resource of Mahomet was the practice of mines : but the soil was rocky ; in every attempt he was stopped and undermined by the Christian engineers ; nor had the art been yet invented of replenishing those subterraneous passages with gunpowder, and blowing whole towers and cities into the air.<sup>41</sup> A circumstance that distinguishes the siege of Constantinople, is the reunion of the ancient and modern artillery. The cannon were intermingled with the mechanical engines for casting stones and darts ; the bullet and the battering-ram were directed against the same walls; nor had the discovery of gunpowder superseded the use of the liquid and unextinguishable fire. A wooden turret of the largest size was advanced on rollers; this portable magazine of ammunition and fascines was protected by a three-fold covering of bulls' hides; incessant volleys were securely discharged from the loopholes; in the front, three doors were contrived for the alternate sally and retreat of the soldiers and workmen. They ascended by a staircase to the upper platform; and, as high as the level of that platform, a scaling-ladder could be raised by pulleys to form a bridge, and grapple with the adverse rampart. By these various arts of annoyance, some as new as they were pernicious to the Greeks, the tower of St. Romanus was at length overturned; after a severe struggle, the Turks were repulsed from the breach, and interrupted by darkness; but they trusted, that with the return of light they should renew the attack with fresh vigour and decisive success. Of this pause of action, this interval of hope, each moment was improved by the activity of the emperor and Justiniani, who passed the night on the spot, and urged the labours which involved the safety of the church and city. At the dawn of day, the impatient sultan perceived, with astonishment and grief, that his wooden turret had been reduced to ashes: the ditch was cleared and restored; and the tower of St. Romanus was again strong and entire. He deplored the failure of his design; and uttered a profane exclamation, that the word of the thirty-seven thousand prophets should not have compelled him to believe that such a work, in so short a time, could have been accomplished by the infidels.

The generosity of the Christian princes was cold and tardy; but in the first apprehension of a siege, Constantine had negotiated, in the isles of the Archipelago, the Morea, and Sicily, the most indispensable supplies. As early as the beginning of April, five <sup>42</sup> great ships, equipped for merchandise and war, would have sailed from the harbour of Chios, had not the wind blown obstinately from the north.<sup>43</sup> One of these ships bore the Imperial flag; the remaining four belonged to the Genoese; and they were laden with wheat and barley, with wine, oil, and vegetables, and, above all, with soldiers and mariners, for the service of the capital. After a tedious delay, a gentle breeze, and, on the second day, a strong gale from the south, carried them through the Hellespont and the Propontis: but the city was already invested by sea and land; and the Turkish fleet, at the entrance of the Bosphorus, was stretched from shore to shore, in the mentis, que ta-ta meliora

hostes offende-re magis erant, ne murus concuteretur noster, quiescebant. This passage of Leonardus Chrenais is curious and important.

34. According to Chalcocondyle and Phiranza, the great cannon burst, an accident which, according to Ducas, was prevented by the artist's skill. It is evident that the Leontopodium of the symeon can.

50 Near an hundre
Fretch and English shot in an engagemen

40 I have selected some curious facts, without striving to emulate the bloody and obtrusive eloquence of the Abbe de Vertot, in his prodigious expostions of the cruelties of Rhodes, Malta, &c. But if this agreeable historian had a turn for romance, and as he wrote to please the order, he had adopted the same spirit of enthusiasm and chivalry.

41 The first theory of mines with gunpowder appears in 1480, in a MS. of George of Sienna (Tiraboschi, tom. vi. part. i. p. 324).

the 1990s, the number of people in the United States who are 65 years of age or older is projected to increase from 20 million to 30 million, and the number of people 75 years of age or older is projected to increase from 10 million to 15 million (U.S. Census Bureau, 1997). The number of people 85 years of age or older is projected to increase from 2 million to 4 million (U.S. Census Bureau, 1997). The number of people 90 years of age or older is projected to increase from 500,000 to 1 million (U.S. Census Bureau, 1997). The number of people 95 years of age or older is projected to increase from 100,000 to 200,000 (U.S. Census Bureau, 1997). The number of people 100 years of age or older is projected to increase from 10,000 to 20,000 (U.S. Census Bureau, 1997).

...the fact that the in vitro and in vivo results are in good agreement, and that the in vivo results are in good agreement with the results of the in vitro studies.

45 In bold defiance, set their gross ignorance, of language and geography, the president then details them at Athens with a south, and waits them to be snatched away with a north wind.

form of a crescent, to intercept, or at least to repel, these bold auxiliaries. The reader who has present to his mind the geographical picture of Constantinople, will conceive and admire the greatness of the spectacle. The five Christian ships continued to advance with joyful shouts, and a full press both of sails and oars, against an hostile fleet of three hundred vessels; and the rampart, the camp, the coasts of Europe and Asia, were lined with innumerable spectators, who anxiously awaited the event of this momentous succour. At the first view that event could not appear doubtful; the superiority of the Moslems was beyond all measure or account; and in a calm, their numbers and valour must inevitably have prevailed. But their hasty and imperfect navy had been created, not by the genius of the people, but by the will of the sultan: in the height of their prosperity, the Turks have acknowledged, that if God had given them the earth, he had left the sea to the infidels; <sup>41</sup> and a series of defeats, a rapid progress of decay, has established the truth of their modest confession. Except eighteen galleys of some force, the rest of their fleet consisted of open boats, rudely constructed and awkwardly managed, crowded with troops, and destitute of cannon; and since courage arises in a great measure from the consciousness of strength, the bravest of the Janizaries might tremble on a new element. In the Christian squadron, five stout and lofty ships were guided by skilful pilots, and manned with the veterans of Italy and Greece, long practised in the arts and perils of the sea. Their weight was directed to sink or scatter the weak obstacles that impeded their passage: their artillery swept the waters: their liquid fire was poured on the heads of the adversaries, who, with the design of boarding, presumed to approach them; and the winds and waves are always on the side of the ablest navigators. In this conflict, the Imperial vessel, which had been almost overpowered, was rescued by the Genoese; but the Turks, in a distant and a closer attack, were twice repulsed with considerable loss. Mahomet himself sat on horse-back on the beach, to encourage their valour by his voice and presence, by the promise of reward, and by fear, more potent than the fear of the enemy. The passions of his soul, and even the gestures of his body, <sup>42</sup> seemed to imitate the actions of the combatants; and, as if he had been the lord of nature, he spurred his horse with a fearless and impotent effort into the sea. His loud reproaches, and the clamours of the camp, urged the Ottomans to a third attack, more fatal and bloody than the two former; and I must repeat, though I cannot credit, the evidence of Phranza, who affirms, from their own mouth, that they lost above twelve thousand men in the slaughter of the day. They fled in disorder to the shores of Europe and Asia, while the Christian squadron, triumphant and unhurt, steered along the Bosphorus, and securely anchored within the chain of the harbour. In the confidence of victory, they boasted that the whole Turkish power must have yielded to their arms; but the admiral, or captain bashaw, found some consolation for a painful wound in his eye, by representing that accident as the cause of his defeat. Baltha Oglı was a renegade of the race of the Bulgarian princes: his military character was tainted with the unpopular vice of avarice; and, under the despotism of the prince or people, misfortune is a sufficient evidence of guilt. His rank and services were annihilated by the displeasure of Mahomet. In the royal presence, the captain bashaw was extended on the ground by four slaves, and received one hundred strokes with a golden rod; <sup>43</sup> his death had been pronounced; and he adored the clemency of the sultan, who was satisfied with the milder punishment of confiscation and exile. The introduction of this supply revived the hopes of the Greeks, and accused the supineness of their Western allies. Amidst the deserts of Anatolia and the rocks of Palestine, the millions of the crusades had buried themselves in a voluntary and inevitable grave; but the situation of the Imperial city was strong against her enemies, and accessible to her friends; and a rational and moderate armament of the maritime states might have saved the relics of the Roman name, and maintained a Christian fortress in the heart of the Ottoman empire. Yet this was the sole and feeble attempt for the deliverance of Constantinople: the more distant powers were insensible of its danger; and the ambassador of Hungary, or at least of Huniades, resided in the Turkish camp, to remove the fears, and to direct the operations, of the sultan. <sup>47</sup>

It was difficult for the Greeks to penetrate the secret of the divan; yet the Greeks are persuaded, that a resistance, so obstinate and surprising, had fatigued the perseverance of Mahomet. He began to meditate a retreat; and the siege would have been speedily raised, if the ambition and jealousy of the second vizir had not opposed the perfidious advice of Calil Bashaw, who still maintained a secret correspondence with the Byzantine court. The reduction of the city appeared to be hopeless, unless a double attack could be made from the harbour as well as from the land: but the harbour was inaccessible; an impenetrable chain was now defended by eight large ships, more than twenty of a smaller size, with several galleys and sloops; and, instead of forcing this barrier, the Turks might apprehend a naval sally, and a second encounter in the open sea. In this perplexity, the genius of Mahomet conceived and executed a plan of a bold and marvellous east, of transporting by land his lighter vessels and military stores from the Bosphorus into the higher part of the harbour. The distance is about ten miles; the ground is uneven, and was overspread with thickets; and, as,

Mahomet transports his navy over land.

<sup>41</sup> The perpetual decay and weakness of the Turkish navy may be observed in Rycart (State of the Ottoman Empire, p. 372—378), in Thevenot (Voyages, tom. i. p. 229—232), and Tott (Mémoires, tom. iii.); the last of whom is always solicitous to alarm and amaze his reader.

<sup>42</sup> I must confess, that I have before my eyes, the living picture which Thucydides (lib. ii. c. 14) has given of the prayers and gestures of the Athenians, as they were gathered in the great harbours of the

<sup>46</sup> According to the exaggeration or corrupt text of Ducas (c. 38) this golden bar was of the enormous and incredible weight of 900 lb. or pounds. Boullaud's reading of 300 drachms, or five pounds, is sufficient to excuse the arm of Mahomet, and bruise the back of his admiral.

<sup>47</sup> Ducas, who confesses himself ill-informed of the affairs of Hungary, gives a notion of superstition, a fatal belief that Constantinople would be the term of the Turk's conquests. See Phranza (lib. c. 20) and Spaldeman.

the road must be opened behind the suburb of Galata, their free passage or total destruction must depend on the option of the Genoese. But these selfish merchants were ambitious of the favour of being the last devoured; and the deficiency of art was supplied by the strength of obedient myriads. A level way was covered with a broad platform of strong and solid planks; and to render them more slippery and smooth, they were anointed with the fat of sheep and oxen. Fourscore light galleys and brigantines of fifty and thirty oars, were disembarked on the Bosphorus shore; arranged successively on rollers; and drawn forwards by the power of men and pulleys. Two guides or pilots were stationed at the helm, and the prow, of each vessel; the sails were unfurled to the winds; and the labour was cheered by song and acclamation. In the course of a single night, this Turkish fleet painfully climbed the hill, steered over the plain, and was launched from the declivity into the shallow waters of the harbour, far above the molestation of the deeper vessels of the Greeks. The real importance of this operation was magnified by the consternation and confidence which it inspired; but the notorious, unquestionable, fact was displayed before the eyes, and is recorded by the pens of the two nations.<sup>48</sup> A similar stratagem had been repeatedly practised by the ancients; <sup>49</sup> the Ottoman galleys (I must again repeat) should be considered as large boats; and, if we compare the magnitude and the distance, the obstacles and the means, the boasted miracle <sup>50</sup> has perhaps been equalled by the industry of our own times.<sup>51</sup> As soon as Mahomet had occupied the upper harbour with a fleet and army, he constructed, in the narrowest part, a bridge, or rather mole, of fifty cubits in breadth, and one hundred in length: it was formed of casks and hogsheds, joined with rafters, linked with iron, and covered with a solid floor. On this floating battery, he planted one of his largest cannon, while the fourscore galleys, with troops and scaling-ladders, approached the most accessible side, which had formerly been stormed by the Latin conquerors. The indolence of the Christians has been accused for not destroying these unfinished works; but their fire, by a superior fire, was controlled and silenced; nor were they wanting in a nocturnal attempt to burn the vessels as well as the bridge of the sultan. His vigilance prevented their approach; their foremost galliots were sunk or taken; forty youths, the bravest of Italy and Greece, were inhumanly massacred at his command; nor could the emperor's grief be assuaged by the just though cruel retaliation, of exposing from the walls the heads of two hundred and sixty Musulman captives. After a siege of forty days, the fate of Constantinople could no longer be averted. The diminutive garrison was exhausted by a double attack: the fortifications, which had stood for ages against hostile violence, were dismantled on all sides by the Ottoman cannon: many breaches were opened; and near the gate of St. Romanus, four towers had been levelled with the ground. For the payment of his feeble and mutinous troops, Constantine was compelled to despoil the churches with the promise of a four-fold restitution; and his sacrilege offered a new reproach to the enemies of the union. A spirit of discord impaired the remnant of the Christian strength: the Genoese and Venetian auxiliaries asserted the pre-eminence of their respective service; and Justiniani and the great duke, whose ambition was not extinguished by the common danger, accused each other of treachery and cowardice.

During the siege of Constantinople, the words of peace and capitulation had been sometimes pronounced; and several embassies had passed between the camp and the city.<sup>52</sup> The Greek emperor was humbled by adversity; and would have yielded to any terms compatible with religion and royalty. The Turkish sultan was desirous of sparing the blood of his soldiers; still more desirous of securing for his own use the Byzantine treasures; and he accomplished a sacred duty in presenting to the Gabours, the choice of circumcision, of tribute, or of death. The avarice of Mahomet might have been satisfied with an annual sum of one hundred thousand ducats; but his ambition grasped the capital of the East: to the prince he offered a rich equivalent, to the people a free toleration, or a safe departure; but after some fruitless treaty, he declared his resolution of finding either a throne, or a grave, under the walls of Constantinople. A sense of honour, and the fear of universal reproach, forbade Palaeologus to resign the city into the hands of the Ottomans; and he determined to abide the last extremities of war. Several days were employed by the sultan in the preparations of the assault; and a respite was granted by his favourite science of astrology, which had fixed on the twenty-ninth of May, as the fortunate and fatal hour. On the evening of the twenty-seventh, he issued his final orders; assembled in his presence the military chiefs; and dispersed his heralds through the camp to proclaim the duty, and the motives, of the perilous enterprise. Fear is the first principle of a despotic government; and his menaces were expressed in the Oriental style, that the fugitives and deserters, had they the wings of a bird,<sup>53</sup> should not escape from his inexorable justice.

Distress of the city.

Preparations of the Turks for the general assault. May 26.

<sup>48</sup> The unanimous testimony of the four Greeks is confirmed by Centaur (p. 106) from the Turkish annals; but I could wish to contract the distance of 60 miles, and to prolong the term of the night.

<sup>49</sup> Phinias relates the six miles of the bridge, after the battle of Act in the sixth century.

<sup>50</sup> Hannibal is said to have introduced his vessels into the harbour of Tarentum (Polybius, l. viii. p. 124. edit. Gronov.)

<sup>51</sup> A wreck of Candia, who had served the Venetians in a similar undertaking (see p. 1125, No. 37.), might possibly be the discoverer and agent of Mahomet.

<sup>52</sup> I particularly allude to our own embarkation on the 14th of October in the years 1776 and 1777, in great numbers, with little loss in the event.

<sup>53</sup> Claudius, l. ii. c. 2. Hannibal offers in the 10th and 11th chapters of the of the present day, and which was neither glorious nor salutary, the fact is, that the Turkish army was not only victorious, but also, in the end, the city was saved.

<sup>52</sup> The Greek emperor, Constantine, was not only a man of great abilities, but also a man of great courage.

<sup>53</sup> Above seven and seven.

Should he rise North, upon his frozen wings,

He can alight above the wondering clouds,

And set him in the floods of golden chariot.

There should my fire drive him down to torture.

Below the earth, I see the first, I must observe, 1. That the operation of the words must be confined to the lower regions of the of the Turkish army, and not to the city of Constantinople.

of the Turkish army, and not to the city of Constantinople.

The greatest part of his bashaws and Janizaries were the off-spring of Christian parents: but the glories of the Turkish name were perpetuated by successive adoption; and in the gradual change of individuals, the spirit of a legion, a regiment, or an oda, is kept alive by imitation and discipline. In this holy warfare, the Moslems were exhorted to purify their minds with prayer, their bodies with seven ablutions; and to abstain from food till the close of the ensuing day. A crowd of dervishes visited the tents, to instil the desire of martyrdom, and the assurance of spending an immortal youth amidst the rivers and gardens of paradise, and in the embraces of the black-eyed virgins. Yet Mahomet principally trusted to the efficacy of temporal and visible rewards. A double pay was promised to the victorious troops; "The city and the buildings," said Mahomet, "are mine; but I resign to your valour the captives and the spoil, the treasures of gold and beauty; be rich and be happy. Many are the provinces of my empire: the intrepid soldier who first ascends the walls of Constantinople, shall be rewarded with the government of the fairest and most wealthy; and my gratitude shall accumulate his honours and fortunes above the measure of his own hopes." Such various and potent motives diffused among the Turks a general ardour, regardless of life and impatient for action: the camp re-echoed with the Moslem shouts of "God is God; there is but one God," and Mahomet is the apostle of God;<sup>54</sup> and the sea and land, from Galata to the seven towers, were illuminated by the blaze of their nocturnal fires.

Far different was the state of the Christians; who, with loud and impotent complaints, deplored the guilt, or the punishment, of their sins. The celestial image of the Virgin had been exposed in solemn procession; but their divine patroness was deaf to their entreaties: they accused the obstinacy of the emperor for refusing a timely surrender; anticipated the horrors of their fate; and sighed for the repose and security of Turkish servitude. The noblest of the Greeks, and the bravest of the allies, were summoned to the palace, to prepare them, on the evening of the twenty-eighth, for the duties and dangers of the general assault. The last speech of Palæologus was the funeral oration of the Roman empire;<sup>55</sup> he promised, he conjured, and he vainly attempted to infuse the hope which was extinguished in his own mind. In this world all was comfortless and gloomy; and neither the Gospel nor the church have proposed any conspicuous recompence to the heroes who fall in the service of their country. But the example of their prince, and the confinement of a siege, had armed these warriors with the courage of despair, and the pathetic scene is described by the feelings of the historian Phranza, who was himself present at this mournful assembly. They wept, they embraced; regardless of their families and fortunes, they devoted their lives; and each commander, departing to his station, maintained all night a vigilant and anxious watch on the rampart. The emperor, and some faithful companions, entered the dome of St. Sophia, which in a few hours was to be converted into a mosch; and devoutly received, with tears and prayers, the sacrament of the holy communion. He reposed some moments in the palace, which resounded with cries and lamentations; solicited the pardon of all whom he might have injured;<sup>56</sup> and mounted on horseback to visit the guards, and explore the motions of the enemy. The distress and fall of the last Constantine are more glorious than the long prosperity of the Byzantine Cæsars.

In the confusion of darkness an assailant may sometimes succeed; but in this great and general attack, the military judgment and astrological knowledge of Mahomet advised him to expect the morning, the memorable twenty-ninth of May, in the fourteen hundred and fifty-third year of the Christian æra. The preceding night had been strenuously employed: the troops, the cannon, and the fascines, were advanced to the edge of the ditch, which in many parts presented a smooth and level passage to the breach; and his fourscore galleys almost touched, with the prows and their scaling-ladders, the less defensible walls of the harbour. Under pain of death, silence was enjoined: but the physical laws of motion and sound are not obedient to discipline or fear; each individual might suppress his voice and measure his footsteps; but the march and labour of thousands must inevitably produce a strange confusion of dissonant clamours, which reached the ears of the watchmen of the towers. At daybreak, without the customary signal of the morning gun, the Turks assaulted the city by sea and land; and the similitude of a twined or twisted thread has been applied to the closeness and continuity of their line of attack.<sup>57</sup> The foremost ranks consisted of the refuse of the host, a voluntary crowd who fought without order or command; of the feebleness of age or childhood, of peasants and vagrants, and of all who had joined the camp in the blind hope of plunder and martyrdom. The common impulse drove them onwards to the wall: the most audacious to climb were instantly precipitated; and not a dart, not a bullet, of the Christians, was idly wasted on the accumulated throng. But their strength and ammunition were exhausted in this laborious defence: the ditch was filled with the bodies of the slain; they supported the footsteps of their companions; and of this devoted vanguard, the death was more serviceable than the life. Under their respective bashaws and sanjaks, the troops of Anatolia and Romania were

The general assault, May 29.

Last farewell of the emperor and the Greeks.

—78. Gehehn. Hist. du Calendrier, p. 731, which Mahomet had studied. 5 The golden chariot does not exist either in science or fiction; but I much fear that Dr. Johnson has confounded the Pleiads with the great bear or wagon, the zodiac with a northern constellation.

Ἄπορος ἦν τοῦ καὶ ἡμεῖς ἐπὶ τὴν πόλιν ἀναβάντες.

54 Phranza quarrels with these Moslem acclamations, not for the name of God, but for that of the prophet: the pious zeal of Voltaire is excessive, and even ridiculous.

55 I am afraid that this discourse was composed by Phranza himself; and it smells so grossly of the sermon and the convent, that I almost doubt whether it was pronounced by Constantine. Leonardus assents him another speech, in which he addresses himself more respectfully to the Latin audience.

56 This abatement, which devotion has sometimes extorted from disingenuousness, is an improvement of the Gospel doctrine of the forgiveness of injuries: it is more easy to forgive 400 times, than once to ask pardon of an offender.

57 Besides the infantry, and the sailors and the marines, Duc numbers in this general assault 200,000 Turks, both horse and foot.

successively led to the charge: their progress was various and doubtful; but, after a conflict of two hours, the Greeks still maintained, and improved, their advantage; and the voice of the emperor was heard, encouraging his soldiers to achieve, by a last effort, the deliverance of their country. In that fatal moment, the Janizaries arose, fresh, vigorous, and invincible. The sultan himself on horseback, with an iron mace in his hand, was the spectator and judge of their valour: he was surrounded by ten thousand of his domestic troops, whom he reserved for the decisive occasions; and the tide of battle was directed and impelled by his voice and eye. His numerous ministers of justice were posted behind the line, to urge, to restrain, and to punish; and if danger was in the front, shame and inevitable death were in the rear, of the fugitives. The cries of fear and of pain were drowned in the martial music of drums, trumpets, and attaballs; and experience has proved, that the mechanical operation of sounds, by quickening the circulation of the blood and spirits, will act on the human machine more forcibly than the eloquence of reason and honour. From the lincs, the galleys, and the bridge, the Ottoman artillery thundered on all sides; and the camp and city, the Greeks and the Turks, were involved in a cloud of smoke, which could only be dispelled by the final deliverance or destruction of the Roman empire. The single combats of the heroes of history or fable, amuse our fancy and engage our affections: the skilful evolutions of war may inform the mind, and improve a necessary, though pernicious, science: but in the uniform and odious pictures of a general assault, all is blood, and horror, and confusion; nor shall I strive, at the distance of three centuries and a thousand miles, to delineate a scene of which there could be no spectators, and of which the actors themselves were incapable of forming any just or adequate idea.

The immediate loss of Constantinople may be ascribed to the bullet, or arrow, which pierced the gauntlet of John Justiniani. The sight of his blood, and the exquisite pain, appalled the courage of the chief, whose arms and counsels were the firmest rampart of the city. As he withdrew from his station in quest of a surgeon, his flight was perceived and stopped by the indefatigable emperor. "Your wound," exclaimed Palæologus, "is slight; the danger is pressing; your presence is necessary; and "whither will you retire?" "I will retire," said the trembling Genoese, "by the same "road which God has opened to the Turks;" and at these words he hastily passed through one of the breaches of the inner wall. By this pusillanimous act, he stained the honours of a military life; and the few days which he sur-

58 In the severe censure of the fault of Justiniani, Phranza expresses his own feelings and those of the public. For some private reasons, he is treated with more lenity and respect by Ducas: but the words of Leonardus Chiensis express his strong and recent indignation, gloriae salutis unique oblitus. In the whole series of their Eastern wars, he has his countrymen, the Genoese, were always suspected, and often guilty.

59 Ducas kills him with two blows of Turkish soldiers: Chalcocondilus wounds him in the shoulder, and then tramples him in the dust. The words of Phranza, crucifurum him among the Christians, denote the precise period of his death; but we may, without flattery, say, that these noble lines of Dryden vived in Galata, or the isle of Chios, were embittered by his own and the public reproach.<sup>58</sup> His example was imitated by the greatest part of the Latin auxiliaries, and the defence began to slacken when the attack was pressed with redoubled vigour. The number of the Ottomans was fifty, perhaps an hundred, times superior to that of the Christians; the double walls were reduced by the cannon to an heap of ruins: in a circuit of several miles, some places must be found more easy of access, or more feebly guarded; and if the besiegers could penetrate in a single point, the whole city was irrecoverably lost. The first who deserved the sultan's reward was Hassan the Janizary, of gigantic stature and strength. With his cimier in one hand and his buckler in the other, he ascended the outward fortification: of the thirty Janizaries, who were emulous of his valour, eighteen perished in the bold adventure. Hassan and his twelve companions had reached the summit; the giant was precipitated from the rampart; he rose on one knee, and was again oppressed by a shower of darts and stones. But his success had proved that the achievement was possible: the walls and towers were instantly covered with a swarm of Turks; and the Greeks, now driven from the vantage ground, were overwhelmed by increasing multitudes. Amidst these multitudes, the emperor,<sup>59</sup> who accomplished all the duties of a general and a soldier, was long seen, and finally lost. The nobles, who fought round his person, sustained, till their last breath, the honourable names of Palæologus and Cantacuzene: his mournful exclamation was heard, "Cannot there be found a Christian to cut off my head?"<sup>60</sup> and his last fear was that of falling alive into the hands of the infidels.<sup>61</sup> The prudent despair of Constantine cast away the purple: amidst the tumult he fell by an unknown hand, and his body was buried under a mountain of the slain. After his death, resistance and order were no more: the Greeks fled towards the city; and many were pressed and stifled in the narrow pass of the gate of St. Romanus. The victorious Turks rushed through the breaches of the inner wall; and as they advanced into the streets, they were soon joined by their brethren, who had forced the gate Phenar on the side of the harbour.<sup>62</sup> In the first heat of the pursuit, about two thousand Christians were put to the sword; but avarice soon prevailed over cruelty; and the victors acknowledged, that they should immediately have given quarter if the valour of the emperor and his chosen bands had not prepared them for a similar opposition in every part of the capital. It was thus, after a siege of fifty-three days, that Constantinople, which had defied the power of Chosroes, the Death of the emperor Constantine Palæologus.

Loss of the city and empire.

As to Sebast an, let them search the field :

[illegible]

Chagan, and the caliphs, was irremediably subdued by the arms of Mahomet the Second. Her empire only had been subverted by the Latins: her religion was trampled in the dust by the Moslem conquerors.<sup>63</sup>

The tidings of misfortune fly with a rapid wing; yet such was the extent of Constantinople, that the more distant quarters might prolong, some moments, the happy ignorance of their ruin.<sup>64</sup> But in the general consternation, in the feelings of selfish or social anxiety, in the tumult and thunder of the assault, a sleepless night and morning must have elapsed: nor can I believe that many Grecian ladies were awakened by the Janizaries from a sound and tranquil slumber. On the assurance of the public calamity, the houses and convents were instantly deserted; and the trembling inhabitants flocked together in the streets, like an herd of timid animals, as if accumulated weakness could be productive of strength, or in the vain hope that amid the crowd each individual might be safe and invisible. From every part of the capital, they flowed into the church of St. Sophia: in the space of an hour, the sanctuary, the choir, the nave, the upper and lower galleries, were filled with the multitudes of fathers and husbands, of women and children, of priests, monks, and religious virgins: the doors were barred on the inside, and they sought protection from the sacred dome, which they had so lately abhorred as a profane and polluted edifice. Their confidence was founded on the prophecy of an enthusiast or impostor, that one day the Turks would enter Constantinople, and pursue the Romans as far as the column of Constantine in the square before St. Sophia, but that this would be the term of their calamities; that an angel would descend from heaven with a sword in his hand, and would deliver the empire, with that celestial weapon, to a poor man seated at the foot of the column. "Take this sword," would he say, "and avenge the people of the Lord." At these animating words, the Turks would instantly fly, and the victorious Romans would drive them from the West, and from all Anatolia, as far as the frontiers of Persia. It is on this occasion, that Ducas, with some fancy and much truth, upbraids the discord and obstinacy of the Greeks. "Had that angel appeared," exclaims the historian, "had he offered to exterminate your foes if you would consent to the union of the church, even then, in that fatal moment, you would have rejected your safety, or have deceived your God."<sup>65</sup>

While they expected the descent of the tardy angel, the doors were broken with axes; and as the Turks encountered no resistance, their bloodless hands were employed in selecting and securing the multitude of their prisoners. Youth, beauty, and the appearance of wealth, attracted their choice; and the right of property was decided among themselves by a prior seizure, by personal strength, and by the authority of command. In the space of an hour, the male captives were bound with cords, the females with their veils and girdles. The senators were linked with their slaves; the prelates with the porters of the church; and young men of a plebeian class with noble maids, whose faces had been invisible to the sun and their nearest kindred. In this common captivity, the ranks of society were confounded; the ties of nature were cut asunder; and the inexorable soldier was careless of the father's groans, the tears of the mother, and the lamentations of the children. The loudest in their wailings were the nuns, who were torn from the altar with naked bosoms, outstretched hands, and dishevelled hair; and we should piously believe that few could be tempted to prefer the vigils of the haram to those of the monastery. Of these unfortunate Greeks, of these domestic animals, whole strings were rudely driven through the streets; and as the conquerors were eager to return for more prey, their trembling pace was quickened with menaces and blows. At the same hour, a similar rapine was exercised in all the churches and monasteries, in all the palaces and habitations of the capital; nor could any place, however sacred or sequestered, protect the persons or the property of the Greeks. Above sixty thousand of this devoted people were transported from the city to the camp and fleet; exchanged or sold, according to the caprice or interest of their masters, and dispersed in remote servitude through the provinces of the Ottoman empire. Among these we may notice some remarkable characters. The historian Phranza, first chamberlain and principal secretary, was involved with his family in the common lot. After suffering four months the hardships of slavery, he recovered his freedom; in the ensuing winter he ventured to Adrianople, and ransomed his wife from the mir bashi, or master of the horse; but his two children, in the flower of youth and beauty, had been seized for the use of Mahomet himself. The daughter of Phranza died in the seraglio, perhaps a virgin; his son, in the fifteenth year of his age, preferred death to infamy, and was stabbed by the hand of the royal lover.<sup>66</sup> A deed thus inhuman, cannot surely be expiated by the taste and liberality with which he released a Grecian matron and her two daughters, on receiving a Latin ode from Philéplus, who had chosen a wife in that noble family.<sup>67</sup> The pride or cruelty of Mahomet would have been most sensibly gratified by the capture of a Roman legate; but the dexterity of cardinal Isidore eluded the search, and he escaped from Galata in a ple-

c. 27.), that island must have been full of the fugitives of Constantinople, who delighted to repeat, perhaps to adorn, the tale of their misery.

<sup>65</sup> See Phranza, l. iii. c. 29, 31. His expressions are positive: America aut manu pugilanti . . . volabat enim eo turpiter et nefarie abutu. Me insuerum et infelicem. Yet he could only learn from report, the blood, or impure scenes that were acted in the dark recesses of the seraglio.

<sup>67</sup> See Turchochi (from vi. part. i. p. 290.) and Lancelotti (Mém. de l'Académie des Inscriptions, t. vi. c. p. 718.). I should be curious to learn how he could praise the public enemy, whom he so often reviles as the most corrupt and ridiculous of tyrants.

total, so vast was the city, and so careless were the inhabitants, that nine hours elapsed before the distant quarters knew that they were captives. Herodotus, l. ii. c. 103, and Thucyd. (Anab. p. 78.), who has quoted from the prophet Jeremiah a passage of similar import.

<sup>66</sup> This lively description is extracted from Ducas (c. 32.), who two years afterwards was sent ambassador from the prince of Lesbos to the sultan (c. 14.). The Lesbos was subdued in 1465; Phranza, l. iii.

beian habit.<sup>68</sup> The chain and entrance of the outward harbour was still occupied by the Italian ships of merchandise and war. They had signalled their valour in the siege; they embraced the moment of retreat, while the Turkish mariners were dissipated in the pillage of the city. When they hoisted sail, the beach was covered with a suppliant and lamentable crowd: but the means of transportation were scanty: the Venetians and Genoese selected their countrymen; and notwithstanding the fairest promises of the sultan, the inhabitants of Galata evacuated their houses, and embarked with their most precious effects.

Amount of the spoil. In the fall and the sack of great cities, an historian is condemned to repeat the tale of uniform calamity: the same effects must be produced by the same passions; and when those passions may be indulged without control, small, alas! is the difference between civilised and savage man. Amidst the vague exclamations of bigotry and hatred, the Turks are not accused of a wanton or immoderate effusion of Christian blood: but according to their maxims (the maxims of antiquity), the lives of the vanquished were forfeited; and the legitimate reward of the conqueror was derived from the service, the sale, or the ransom, of his captives of both sexes.<sup>69</sup> The wealth of Constantinople had been granted by the sultan to his victorious troops; and the rapine of an hour is more productive than the industry of years. But as no regular division was attempted of the spoil, the respective shares were not determined by merit; and the rewards of valour were stolen away by the followers of the camp, who had declined the toil and danger of the battle. The narrative of their depredations could not afford either amusement or instruction: the total amount, in the last poverty of the empire, has been valued at four millions of ducats;<sup>70</sup> and of this sum a small part was the property of the Venetians, the Genoese, the Florentines, and the merchants of Ancona. Of these foreigners, the stock was improved in quick and perpetual circulation; but the riches of the Greeks were displayed in the idle ostentation of palaces and wardrobes, or deeply buried in treasures of ingots and old coin, lest it should be demanded at their hands for the defence of their country. The profanation and plunder of the monasteries and churches excited the most tragic complaints. The dome of St. Sophia itself, the earthly heaven, the second firmament, the vehicle of the cherubim, the throne of the glory of God,<sup>71</sup> was despoiled of the oblations of ages; and the gold and silver, the pearls and jewels, the vases and sacerdotal ornaments, were most wickedly converted to the service of mankind. After the divine images had been stripped of all that could be valuable to a profane eye, the canvas, or the wood, was torn, or broken, or burnt, or trod under foot, or applied, in the stables or the kitchen, to the vilest uses. The example of sacrilege was imitated, however, from the Latin conquerors of Constantinople; and the treatment which Christ, the Virgin, and the saints, had sustained from the guilty Catholic, might be inflicted by the zealous Musulman on the monuments of idolatry. Perhaps, instead of joining the public clamour, a philosopher will observe, that in the decline of the arts, the workmanship could not be more valuable than the work, and that a fresh supply of visions and miracles would speedily be renewed by the craft of the priest and the credulity of the people. He will more seriously deplore the loss of the Byzantine libraries, which were destroyed or scattered in the general confusion: one hundred and twenty thousand manuscripts are said to have disappeared;<sup>72</sup> ten volumes might be purchased for a single ducat; and the same ignominious price, too high perhaps for a shelf of theology, included the whole works of Aristotle and Homer, the noblest productions of the science and literature of ancient Greece. We may reflect with pleasure, that an inestimable portion of our classic treasures was safely deposited in Italy; and that the mechanics of a German town had invented an art which derides the havoc of time and barbarism.

From the first hour<sup>73</sup> of the memorable twenty-ninth of May, disorder and rapine prevailed in Constantinople, till the eighth hour of the same day; when the sultan himself passed in triumph through the gate of St. Romanus. He was attended by his vizirs, bashaws, and guards, each of whom (says a Byzantine historian) was robust as Hercules, dexterous as Apollo, and equal in battle to any ten of the race of ordinary mortals. The conqueror<sup>74</sup> gazed with satisfaction and wonder on the strange though splendid appearance of the domes and palaces, so dissimilar from the style of Oriental architecture. In the hippodrome, or amciden, his eye was attracted by the twisted column of the three serpents: and, as a trial of his strength, he shattered with his iron mace or battle-axe the under jaw of one of these monsters,<sup>75</sup> which in the eyes of the Turks were the idols or talismans of the city. At the principal door of St. Sophia, he alighted from his horse, and entered the dome; and such was his jealous regard for that monument of his glory, that on observing a zealous Musulman in the act of breaking the marble pavement, he admonished him with his cimeter, that, if the spoil and captives were granted to the soldiers, the public and private buildings had been reserved for the prince. By his command the metropolis of the Eastern church was transformed into a mosch: the rich and portable in-that a figure has been dropped. Even with the restitution, the foreign property would scarcely exceed one fourth.

Mahomet II. visits the city, St. Sophia the palace, &c.

<sup>68</sup> See the enthusiastic praises and lamentations of Phranza (l. iii. c. 37).

<sup>69</sup> See Ducas (c. 45) and an epistle, July 15th, 1453, from Laurent Quarrus to pope Nicholas V. (Hody de Græcis, p. 194, from a MS. in the Cotton library).

<sup>70</sup> The Julian calendar, which reckons the days and hours from midnight, was used at Constantinople. But Ducas seems to understand the natural hours from sunrise.

<sup>71</sup> See the Turkish Annals, p. 360 and the Pandects of Leunclæus, l. vi. p. 418.

<sup>72</sup> I have found occasion (art. p. 2) to mention this curious relic of the 15th century.

struments of superstition had been removed; the crosses were thrown down; and the walls, which were covered with images and mosaics, were washed and purified, and restored to a state of naked simplicity. On the same day, or on the ensuing Friday, the muezzin, or crier, ascended the most lofty turret, and proclaimed the ezan, or public invitation in the name of God and his prophet; the imam preached; and Mahomet the Second performed the namaz of prayer and thanksgiving on the great altar, where the Christian mysteries had so lately been celebrated before the last of the Cæsars.<sup>76</sup> From St. Sophia he proceeded to the august, but desolate, mansion of an hundred successors of the great Constantine, but which in a few hours had been stripped of the pomp of royalty. A melancholy reflection on the vicissitudes of human greatness forced itself on his mind; and he repeated an elegant distich of Persian poetry: "The spider has wove his web in the Imperial palace; and the owl hath sung her watch-song on the towers of Afrasiab."<sup>77</sup>

Yet his mind was not satisfied, nor did the victory seem complete, till he was informed of the fate of Constantine; whether he had escaped, or been made prisoner, or had fallen in the battle. Two Janizaries claimed the honour and reward of his death; the body, under an heap of slain, was discovered by the golden eagles embroidered on his shoes; the Greeks acknowledged with tears the head of their late emperor; and, after exposing the bloody trophy,<sup>78</sup> Mahomet bestowed on his rival the honours of a decent funeral. After his decease, Lucas Notaras, great duke,<sup>79</sup> and first minister of the empire, was the most important prisoner. When he offered his person and his treasures at the foot of the throne, "And why," said the indignant sultan, "did you not employ these treasures in the defence of your prince and country?" "They were yours," answered the slave; "God had reserved them for your hands." "If he reserved them for me," replied the despot, "how have you presumed to withhold them so long by a fruitless and fatal resistance?" The great duke alleged the obstinacy of the strangers, and some secret encouragement from the Turkish vizir; and from this perilous interview, he was at length dismissed with the assurance of pardon and protection. Mahomet condescended to visit his wife, a venerable princess oppressed with sickness and grief; and his consolation for her misfortunes was in the most tender strain of humanity and filial reverence. A similar clemency was extended to the principal officers of state, of whom several were ransomed at his expense; and during some days he declared himself the friend and father of the vanquished people. But the scene was soon changed; and before his departure, the hippodrome streamed with the blood of his noblest captives. His perfidious cruelty is execrated by the Christians; they adorn with the colours of heroic martyrdom the execution of the great duke and his two sons; and his death is ascribed to the generous refusal of delivering his children to the tyrant's lust. Yet a Byzantine historian has dropped an unguarded word of conspiracy, deliverance, and Italian succour; such treason may be glorious; but the rebel who bravely ventures, has justly forfeited, his life; nor should we blame a conqueror for destroying the enemies whom he can no longer trust. On the eighteenth of June, the victorious sultan returned to Adrianople; and smiled at the base and hollow embassies of the Christian princes, who viewed their approaching ruin in the fall of the Eastern empire.

Constantinople had been left naked and desolate, without a prince or a people. But she could not be despoiled of the incomparable situation which marks her for the metropolis of a great empire; and the genius of the place will ever triumph over the accidents of time and fortune. Boursa and Adrianople, the ancient seats of the Ottomans, sunk into provincial towns; and Mahomet the Second established his own residence, and that of his successors, on the same commanding spot which had been chosen by Constantine.<sup>80</sup> The fortifications of Galata, which might afford a shelter to the Latins, were prudently destroyed; but the damage of the Turkish cannon was soon repaired; and before the month of August, great quantities of lime had been burnt for the restoration of the walls of the capital. As the entire property of the soil and buildings, whether public or private, or profane or sacred, was now transferred to the conqueror, he first separated a space of eight furlongs from the point of the triangle for the establishment of his seraglio or palace. It is here, in the bosom of luxury, that the Grand Signor (as he has been emphatically named by the Italians) appears to reign over Europe and Asia; but his person on the shores of the Bosphorus may not always be secure from the insults of an hostile navy. In the new character of a mosch, the cathedral of St. Sophia was endowed with an ample revenue, crowned with lofty minarets, and surrounded with groves and fountains, for the devotion and refreshment of the Moslems. The same model was imitated in the jami or royal moschs; and the first of these was built by Mahomet himself, on the ruins of the church of the holy apostles, and the tombs of the Greek emperors. On the third day after the conquest, the grave of Abu Ayub or Job, who had fallen in the first siege of the Arabs, was revealed in a vision; and it is before the sepulchre of the martyr, that the new sultans are girded with the sword of empire.<sup>81</sup> Con-

<sup>76</sup> We are obliged to Cantemir (p. 102) for the Turkish account of the conversion of St. Sophia, so bitterly deplored by Phranza and Ducas. The lights the derives new repeated, the same generous feeling carried the mind of the conqueror to the past or the future.

<sup>78</sup> I cannot believe with Ducas (See Spondanus, A. D. 1453, No. 153), that Mahomet sent round Persia, Arabia, &c. the head of the Greek emperor. he would surely content himself with a trophy less inhuman.

<sup>79</sup> Phranza was the personal enemy of the great duke; nor could time, or death, or his own retreat to a monastery, extort a feeling of sympathy or forgiveness. Ducas is inclined to praise and pity the martyr; Chalcondyles is neuter, but we are indebted to him for the hint of the Greek conspiracy.

<sup>80</sup> For the restitutions, see Cantemir, Tournefort, and the picture of the great Ottoman empire (Abregé de l'Histoire Ottomane, tom. i. p. 16—21). we may learn, that in the year 1536, the Moslems were less numerous in the capital than the Christians, or even the Jews.

<sup>81</sup> The Turb, or sepulchral monument of Abu Ayub, is described

stantinople no longer appertains to the Roman historian: nor shall I enumerate the civil and religious edifices that were profaned or erected by its Turkish masters: the population was speedily renewed; and before the end of September, five thousand families of Anatolia and Romania had obeyed the royal mandate, which enjoined them, under pain of death, to occupy their new habitations in the capital. The throne of Mahomet was guarded by the numbers and fidelity of his Moslem subjects; but his rational policy aspired to collect the remnant of the Greeks; and they returned in crowds, as soon as they were assured of their lives, their liberties, and the free exercise of their religion. In the election and investiture of a patriarch, the ceremonial of the Byzantine court was revived and imitated. With a mixture of satisfaction and horror, they beheld the sultan on his throne; who delivered into the hands of Gennadius the crozier or pastoral staff, the symbol of his ecclesiastical office; who conducted the patriarch to the gate of the seraglio, presented him with an horse richly caparisoned, and directed the vizirs and bashaws to lead him to the palace which had been allotted for his residence.<sup>82</sup> The churches of Constantinople were shared between the two religions: their limits were marked; and till it was infringed by Selim, the grandson of Mahomet, the Greeks<sup>83</sup> enjoyed above sixty years the benefit of this equal partition. Encouraged by the ministers of the divan, who wished to elude the fanaticism of the sultan, the Christian advocates presumed to allege that this division had been an act, not of generosity, but of justice; not a concession, but a compact; and that if one half of the city had been taken by storm, the other moiety had surrendered on the faith of a sacred capitulation. The original grant had indeed been consumed by fire: but the loss was supplied by the testimony of three aged Janizaries who remembered the transaction; and their venal oaths are of more weight in the opinion of Camtemir, than the positive and unanimous consent of the history of the times.<sup>84</sup>

The remaining fragments of the Greek kingdom in Europe and Asia I shall abandon to the Turkish arms; but the final extinction of the two last dynasties<sup>85</sup> which have reigned in Constantinople, should terminate the decline and fall of the Roman Empire in the East. The despots of the Morea, Demetrius and Thomas,<sup>86</sup> the two surviving brothers of the name of PALEOLOGUS, were astonished by the death of the emperor Constantine, and the ruin of the monarchy. Hopeless of defence, they prepared, with the noble Greeks who adhered to their fortune, to seek a refuge in Italy, beyond the reach of the Ottoman thunder. Their first apprehensions were dispelled by the victorious sultan, who contented himself with a tribute of twelve thousand ducats. and while his ambition explored the continent and the islands in search of prey, he indulged the Morea in a respite of seven years. But this respite was a period of grief, discord, and misery. The heremion, the rampart of the Isthmus, so often raised and so often subverted, could not long be defended by three hundred Italian archers: the keys of Corinth were seized by the Turks; they returned from their summer excursions with a train of captives and spoil; and the complaints of the injured Greeks were heard with indifference and disdain. The Albanians, a vagrant tribe of shepherds and robbers, filled the peninsula with rapine and murder: the two despots implored the dangerous and humiliating aid of a neighbouring bashaw; and when he had quelled the revolt, his lessons inculcated the rule of their future conduct. Neither the ties of blood, nor the oaths which they repeatedly pledged in the communion and before the altar, nor the stronger pressure of necessity, could reconcile or suspend their domestic quarrels. They ravaged each other's patrimony with fire and sword: the alms and succours of the West were consumed in civil hostility; and their power was only exerted in savage and arbitrary executions. The distress and revenge of the weaker rival invoked the supreme lord; and, in the season of maturity and revenge, Mahomet declared himself the friend of Demetrius, and marched into the Morea with an irresistible force. When he had taken possession of Sparta, "You are too weak," said the sultan, "to control this turbulent province: I will take your daughter to my bed; and you shall pass the remainder of your life in security and honour." Demetrius sighed and obeyed; surrendered his daughter and his castles; followed to Adrianople his sovereign and son; and received for his own maintenance, and that of his followers, a city in Thrace, and the adjacent isles of Imbros, Lemnos, and Samothrace. He was joined the next year by a companion of misfortune, the last of the COMNENIAN race, who, after the taking of Constantinople by the Latins, had founded a new empire on the coast of the Black Sea.<sup>87</sup> In the progress of his Anatolian conquests, Mahomet invested with a fleet and army the capital of David, who presumed to style himself emperor of Trebizond; and the negotiation was comprised in a short and peremptory question, "Will

Loss of the Morea.
A.D. 1160;

Extinction of the Imperial family of Comnenus and Paleologus.

Asia I shall abandon to the Turkish arms; but the final extinction of the two last dynasties<sup>85</sup> which have reigned in Constantinople, should terminate the decline and fall of the Roman Empire in the East. The despots of the Morea, Demetrius and Thomas,<sup>86</sup>

the two surviving brothers of the name of PA-

LEOLOGUS, were astonished by the death of the emperor Constantine, and the ruin of the monarchy. Hopeless of defence, they prepared, with and engraved in the Talbeau Général de l'Empire Ottoman, Paris, 1787, in large folio, a work of less use, perhaps, than magnificence (tom. i. p. 305, 306.).

<sup>82</sup> Phranza (l. iii. c. 13.) relates the ceremony, which has possibly been adorned in the Greek reports to each other, and to the Latin.

<sup>85</sup> Camtemir (p. 101-102.) insists on the unanimous consent of the Turkish historians, ancient as well as modern, and argues, that they would not have related the truth to diminish their national glory, since it is esteemed more honourable to take a city by force than by composition. But, I doubt this consent, since he quotes no particular historian, and the Turkish Annals of Leunclavius affirm, without exception, that Mahomet took Constantinople per rursu (p. 329.).

<sup>86</sup> In favour of the Greeks of the Morea, this honourable and salutary title is given to the Christians.

<sup>87</sup> The comment of Trebizond, see above p. 1160, the comment.

<sup>87</sup> See the loss or conquest of Trebizond in Chalcondyles (l. ix. p. 267-269.), Ducas (c. 43.), Phranza (l. iii. c. 27.), and Cantemir (p. 102.).

<sup>88</sup> Though Tournefort (tom. ii. lettre xii. p. 171.) speaks of Trebizond as a small people, Pex-sure, the most and most accurate observer, can find 100,000 inhabitants (Commerce de la Mer Noire,

"you secure your life and treasures by resigning your kingdom? or had you rather forfeit your kingdom, your treasures, and your life?" The feeble Comnenus was subdued by his own fears, and the example of a Musulman neighbour, the prince of Sinope,<sup>89</sup> who, on a similar summons, had yielded a fortified city with four hundred cannon and ten or twelve thousand soldiers.

of Trebizond.
A. D. 1461.

The capitulation of Trebizond was faithfully performed; and the emperor, with his family, was transported to a castle in Romania; but on a slight suspicion of corresponding with the Persian king, David, and the whole Comnenian race, were sacrificed to the jealousy or avarice of the conqueror. Nor could the name of father long protect the unfortunate Demetrius from exile and confiscation; his abject submission moved the pity and contempt of the sultan; his followers were transplanted to Constantinople; and his poverty was alleviated by a pension of fifty thousand aspers, till a monastic habit and a tardy death released Palæologus from an earthly master. It is not easy to pronounce whether the servitude of Demetrius, or the exile of his brother Thomas,<sup>90</sup> be the most inglorious. On the conquest of the Morea, the despot escaped to Corfu, and from thence to Italy, with some naked adherents: his name, his sufferings, and the head of the apostle St. Andrew, entitled him to the hospitality of the Vatican; and his misery was prolonged by a pension of six thousand ducats from the pope and cardinals. His two sons, Andrew and Manuel, were educated in Italy; but the eldest, contemptible to his enemies and burdensome to his friends, was degraded by the baseness of his life and marriage. A title was his sole inheritance; and that inheritance he successively sold to the kings of France and Arragon.<sup>91</sup> During his transient prosperity, Charles the Eighth was ambitious of joining the empire of the East with the kingdom of Naples: in a public festival, he assumed the appellation and the purple of Augustus; the Greeks rejoiced, and the Ottoman already trembled, at the approach of the French chivalry.<sup>92</sup> Manuel Palæologus, the second son, was tempted to revisit his native country: his return might be grateful, and could not be dangerous, to the Porte: he was maintained at Constantinople in safety and ease; and an honourable train of Christians and Moslems attended him to the grave. If there be some animals of so generous a nature that they refuse to propagate in a domestic state, the last of the Imperial race must be ascribed to an inferior kind: be accepted from the sultan's liberality two beautiful females; and his surviving son was lost in the habit and religion of a Turkish slave.

tom. ii. p. 72. and for the province, p. 53—591. Its prosperity and trade are perpetually disturbed by the factions quarrel of two orders of Janizaries, in one of which 50,000 Lazi are commonly enrolled (Mémoires de Voft, tom. iii. p. 16, 17).

<sup>89</sup> See Journal &c.

acquainted with their wealth and numbers.
<sup>90</sup> Spodanus (from Gobelin Comment. Pii II. L. v.) relates the arrival and reception of despot Thomas at Rome (A. D. 1461, No. 3).

<sup>91</sup> By an act dated A. D. 1491, Sept. 6. and lately transmitted from the archives of the Capitol to the royal library of Paris, the despot Andrew Palæologus, reserving the Morea and stipulating some private advantages, conveys to Charles VIII. king of France, the empire of Constantinople and Trebizond (Spodanus, A. D. 1493, No. 2. M. de Foncemagne (Mém. de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xvii.

The importance of Constantinople was felt and magnified in its loss: the pontificate of Nicholas the Fifth, however peaceful and prosperous, was dishonoured by the fall of the Eastern empire; and the grief and terror of the Latins revived, or seemed to revive, the old enthusiasm of the crusades. In one of the most distant countries of the West, Philip duke of Burgundy entertained, at Lisle in Flanders, an assembly of his nobles; and the pompous pageants of the feast were skilfully adapted to their fancy and feelings.<sup>93</sup> In the midst of the banquet, a gigantic Saracen entered the hall, leading a fictitious elephant, with a castle on his back: a matron in a mourning robe, the symbol of religion, was seen to issue from the castle; she deplored her oppression, and accused the slowness of her champions: the principal herald of the golden fleece advanced, bearing on his fist a live pheasant, which, according to the rites of chivalry, he presented to the duke. At this extraordinary summons, Philip, a wise and aged prince, engaged his person and powers in the holy war against the Turks: his example was imitated by the barons and knights of the assembly; they swore to God, the Virgin, the ladies, and the pheasant; and their particular vows were not less extravagant than the general sanction of their oath. But the performance was made to depend on some future and foreign contingency; and during twelve years, till the last hour of his life, the duke of Burgundy might be scrupulously, and perhaps sincerely, on the eve of his departure. Had every breast glowed with the same ardour; had the union of the Christians corresponded with their bravery; had every country, from Sweden<sup>94</sup> to Naples, supplied a just proportion of cavalry and infantry, of men and money, it is indeed probable that Constantinople would have been delivered, and that the Turks might have been chased beyond the Hellespont or the Euphrates. But the secretary of the emperor, who composed every epistle, and attended every meeting, Æneas Sylvius,<sup>95</sup> a statesman and orator, describes from his own experience the repugnant state and spirit of Christendom. "It is a body," says he, "without an head; a republic without laws or magistrates. The pope and the emperor may shine as lofty titles, as splendid images; but they are unable to command, and none are willing to obey: every state has a separate prince, and every prince has a separate interest. What eloquence could unite so many discordant and hostile powers under the same standard? Could they be assembled in arms, who would dare to assume the office of general? What order could be maintained?—what

p. 539—578) has bestowed a dissertation on this national title, of

to reckon with pleasure, with mildness of Valonia to Constantinople was saved by the policy of Venice.

<sup>93</sup> See the original feast in Olivier de la Marche (Mémoires, part i. c. 29, 30.), with the abstract and observations M. de St. Pol (Mémoires sur la Chevalerie, tom. ii. part. ii. p. 182—185.). The nd, 107

s, s, the

and of this chapter.

"military discipline? Who would undertake to feed such an enormous multitude? Who would understand their various languages, or direct their stranger and incompatible manners? What mortal could reconcile the English with the French, Genoa with Arragon, the Germans with the natives of Hungary and Bohemia? If a small number enlisted in the holy war, they must be overthrown by the infidels; if many, by their own weight and confusion." Yet the same Æneas, when he was raised to the papal throne, under the name of Pius the Second, devoted his life to the prosecution of the Turkish war. In the council of Mantua he excited some sparks of a false or feeble enthusiasm; but when the pontiff appeared at Ancona, to embark in person with the troops, engagements vanished in excuses; a precise day was adjourned to an indefinite term; and his effective army consisted of some German pilgrims, whom he was obliged to disband with indulgences and alms. Regardless of futurity, his successors and the powers of Italy were involved in the schemes of present and domestic ambition; and the distance or proximity of each object determined, in their eyes, its apparent magnitude. A more enlarged view of their interest would have taught them to maintain a defensive and naval war against the common enemy; and the support of Scanderbeg and his brave Albanians might have prevented the subsequent invasion of the kingdom of Naples. The siege and sack of Otranto by the Turks diffused a general consternation; and pope Sixtus was preparing to fly beyond the Alps, when the storm was instantly dispelled by the death of Mahomet II. A. D. 1481, May 5, or July 2.

Italy; he was possessed of a strong city and a capacious harbour; and the same reign might have been decorated with the trophies of the New and the Ancient Rome.<sup>97</sup>

CHAP. LXIX.

State of Rome from the Twelfth Century.—Temporal Dominion of the Popes.—Seditions of the City.—Political Heresy of Arnold of Brescia.—Restoration of the Republic.—The Senators.—Pride of the Romans.—Their Wars.—They are deprived of the Election and Presence of the Popes, who retire to Avignon.—The Ju-

<sup>96</sup> Besides the two annalists, the reader may consult Giannone Turkish invasion of the conquest of Mahomet II. the de Mouy (in 4to.). In peace and war, the Turks have ever engaged the attention of the republic of Venice. All has been mentioned in the foregoing pages.

<sup>97</sup> The whole Byzantine series (xxvii. volumes in folio) has gradually issued (A. D. 1615, &c.) from the royal press of bible.—Noble Families of Rome.—Feud of the Colonna and Ursini.

In the first ages of the decline and fall of the Roman empire, our eye is invariably fixed on the royal city, which had given laws to the fairest portion of the globe. We contemplate her fortunes, at first with admiration, at length with pity, always with attention; and when that attention is diverted from the capital to the provinces, they are considered as so many branches which have been successively severed from the Imperial trunk. The foundation of a second Rome on the shores of the Bosphorus has compelled the historian to follow the successors of Constantine; and our curiosity has been tempted to visit the most remote countries of Europe and Asia, to explore the causes and the authors of the long decay of the Byzantine monarchy. By the conquest of Justinian, we have been recalled to the banks of the Tyber, to the deliverance of the ancient metropolis; but that deliverance was a change, or perhaps an aggravation, of servitude. Rome had been already stripped of her trophies, her gods, and her Cæsars; nor was the Gothic dominion more inglorious and oppressive than the tyranny of the Greeks. In the eighth century of the Christian æra, a religious quarrel, the worship of images, provoked the Romans to assert their independence: their bishop became the temporal, as well as the spiritual, father of a free people; and of the Western empire, which was restored by Charlemagne, the title and image still decorate the singular constitution of modern Germany. The name of Rome must yet command our involuntary respect: the climate (whatsoever may be its influence) was no longer the same: the purity of blood had been contaminated through a thousand channels; but the venerable aspect of her ruins, and the memory of past greatness, rekindled a spark of the national character. The darkness of the middle ages exhibits some scenes not unworthy of our notice. Nor shall I dismiss the present work till I have reviewed the state and revolutions of the ROMAN CITY, which acquiesced under the absolute dominion of the popes, about the same time that Constantinople was enslaved by the Turkish arms.

In the beginning of the twelfth century,<sup>2</sup> the æra of the first crusade, Rome was revered by the Latins, as the metropolis of the world, as the throne of the pope and the emperor, who, from the eternal city, derived their title, their honours, and the right or exercise of the Louvre, with some collateral aid from Rome and Laisic; but the Venetian edition (A. D. 1729), though cheaper and more copious, is not less inferior in correctness than in magnificence to that of Paris. The merits of the French editors are various, but the value advised him to recollect or review the sixth chapter of this history.

The first and German emperors of Rome. A. D. 800—1100.

Empire.

<sup>1</sup> The Abbé Dubos, who, with less genius than his successor Mem-

temporal dominion. After so long an interruption, it may not be useless to repeat that the successors of Charlemagne and the Otthos were chosen beyond the Rhine in a national diet; but that these princes were content with the humble names of kings of Germany and Italy, till they had passed the Alps and the Apennine, to seek their Imperial crown on the banks of the Tyber.<sup>3</sup> At some distance from the city, their approach was saluted by a long procession of the clergy and people with palms and crosses; and the terrific emblems of wolves and lions, of dragons and eagles, that floated in the military banners, represented the departed legions and cohorts of the republic. The royal oath to maintain the liberties of Rome was thrice reiterated, at the bridge, the gate, and on the stairs of the Vatican; and the distribution of a customary donative feebly imitated the magnificence of the first Cæsars. In the church of St. Peter, the coronation was performed by his successor: the voice of God was confounded with that of the people; and the public consent was declared in the acclamations of, "Long life and victory to our lord the pope! long life and victory to our lord the emperor! long life and victory to the Roman and Teutonic armies!"<sup>4</sup> The names of Cæsar and Augustus, the laws of Constantine and Justinian, the example of Charlemagne and Otho, established the supreme dominion of the emperors; their title and image was engraved on the papal coins;<sup>5</sup> and their jurisdiction was marked by the sword of justice, which they delivered to the præfect of the city. But every Roman prejudice was awakened by the name, the language, and the manners, of a barbarian lord. The Cæsars of Saxony, or Franconia, were the chiefs of a feudal aristocracy; nor could they exercise the discipline of civil and military power, which alone secures the obedience of a distant people, impatient of servitude, though perhaps incapable of freedom. Once, and once only, in his life, each emperor, with an army of Teutonic vassals, descended from the Alps. I have described the peaceful order of his entry and coronation; but that order was commonly disturbed by the clamour and sedition of the Romans, who encountered their sovereign as a foreign invader: his departure was always speedy, and often shameful; and, in the absence of a long reign, his authority was insulted, and his name was forgotten. The progress of independence in Germany and Italy undermined the foundations of the Imperial sovereignty, and the triumph of the popes was the deliverance of Rome.

Of her two sovereigns, the emperor had precariously reigned by the right of conquest; but the authority of the pope was founded on the soft, though more solid, basis of opinion and habit. The removal of a foreign influence restored and endeared the shepherd to his flock. Instead of the arbitrary or venal nomination of a German court, the vicar of <sup>from affection;</sup> Christ was freely chosen by the college of cardinals, most of whom were either natives or inhabitants of the city. The applause of the magistrates and people confirmed his election; and the ecclesiastical power that was obeyed in Sweden and Britain, had been ultimately derived from the suffrage of the Romans. The same suffrage gave a prince, as well as a pontiff, to the capital. It was universally believed, that Constantine had invested the popes with the temporal dominion of Rome; and the boldest civilians, the most profane sceptics, were satisfied with disputing the right of the emperor and the validity of his gift. The truth of the fact, the authenticity of his donation, was deeply rooted in the ignorance and tradition of four centuries; and the fabulous origin was lost in the real and permanent effects. The name of Dominus or Lord was inscribed on the coin of the bishops: their title was acknowledged by acclamations and oaths of allegiance, <sup>right;</sup> and with the free, or reluctant, consent of the German Cæsars, they had long exercised a supreme or subordinate jurisdiction over the city and patrimony of St. Peter. The reign of the popes, which gratified the prejudices, was not incompatible with the liberties, of Rome; and a more critical enquiry would have revealed a still nobler source of their power, the gratitude of a nation, whom they had rescued from the heresy and oppression of the Greek tyrant. In an age of superstition, it should seem that the union of the royal and sacerdotal characters would mutually fortify each other; and that the keys of Paradise would be the surest pledge of earthly obedience. The sanctity of the office might indeed be degraded by the personal vices of the man. But the scandals <sup>virtue;</sup> of the tenth century were obliterated by the austere and more dangerous virtues of Gregory the Seventh and his successors; and in the ambitious contests which they maintained for the rights of the church, their sufferings or their success must equally tend to increase the popular veneration. They sometimes wandered in poverty and exile, the victims of persecution; and the apostolic zeal with which they offered themselves to martyrdom, must engage the favour and sympathy of every Catholic breast. And sometimes, thundering from the Vatican, they created, judged, and deposed the kings of the world; nor could the proudest Roman be disgraced by submitting to a priest, whose feet were kissed, and whose stirrup was held, by the successors of Charlemagne.<sup>6</sup> Even the temporal interest of the city should have protected in peace and honour the residence of the popes; from whence a vain and lazy people derived the greatest part <sup>benefits.</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Authorities of the popes in Rome.

<sup>4</sup> Muratori has given the series of the papal coins (Antiquitat. tom. ii. diss. lxxv. p. 348-354.). He finds only two more early than the year of their subsistence and riches. The fixed revenue of the popes was probably impaired : many of the old patrimonial estates, both in Italy and the provinces, had been invaded by sacrilegious hands ; nor could the loss be compensated by the claim, rather than the possession, of the more ample gifts of Pepin and his descendants. But the Vatican and Capitol were nourished by the incessant and increasing swarms of pilgrims and suppliants : the pale of Christianity was enlarged, and the pope and cardinals were overwhelmed by the judgment of ecclesiastical and secular causes. A new jurisprudence had established in the Latin church the right and practice of appeals ; <sup>7</sup> and from the North and West, the bishops and abbots were invited or summoned to solicit, to complain, to accuse, or to justify, before the threshold of the apostles. A rare prodigy is once recorded, that two horses, belonging to the archbishops of Mentz and Cologne, repassed the Alps, yet laden with gold and silver ; <sup>8</sup> but it was soon understood, that the success, both of the pilgrims and clients, depended much less on the justice of their cause than on the value of their offering. The wealth and piety of these strangers were ostentatiously displayed ; and their expenses, sacred or profane, circulated in various channels for the emolument of the Romans.

<sup>5</sup> 60) fifty are still extant from Leo III. to Leo IX. with addition of the reigning emperor; none remain of Gregory VII. or Urban II.; but in those of Paschal II. he seems to have renounced his right of dependence.

<sup>6</sup> see Barocæ Gloss. medice et infime Latin. tom. vi. p. 364, 365. STAFFA. This homage was paid by kings to archbishops, and by vassals to their lords (Schmidt, tom. iii. p. 262.); and it was the nicest policy of Rome, to confound the marks of filial and of feudal subjection.

Such powerful motives should have firmly attached the voluntary and pious obedience of the Roman people to their spiritual and temporal father. But the operation of prejudice and interest is often disturbed by the sallies of ungovernable passion. The Indian who fells the tree, that he may gather the fruit,<sup>o</sup> and the Arab who plunders the caravans of commerce, are actuated by the same impulse of savage nature, which overlooks the future in the present, and relinquishes for momentary rapine the long and secure possession of the most important blessings. And it was thus, that the shrine of St. Peter was profaned by the thoughtless Romans; who pillaged the offerings, and wounded the pilgrims, without computing the number and value of similar visits, which they prevented by their inhospitable sacrilege. Even the influence of superstition is fluctuating and precarious: and the slave, whose reason is subdued, will often be delivered by his avarice or pride. A credulous devotion for the fables and oracles of the priesthood, most powerfully acts on the mind of a barbarian; yet such a mind is the least capable of preferring imagination to sense, of sacrificing to a distant motive, to an invisible, perhaps an ideal, object, the appetites and interests of the present world. In the vigour of health and youth, his practice will perpetually contradict his belief; till the pressure of age, or sickness, or calamity, awakens his terrors, and compels him to satisfy the double debt of piety and remorse. I have already observed, that the modern times of religious indifference are the most favourable to the peace and security of the clergy. Under the reign of superstition, they had much to hope from the ignorance, and much to fear from the violence, of mankind. The wealth, whose constant increase must have rendered them the sole proprietors of the earth, was alternately bestowed by the repentant father and plundered by the rapacious son: their persons were adored or violated; and the same idol, by the hands of the same votaries, was placed on the altar, or trampled in the dust. In the feudal system of Europe, arms were the title of distinction and the measure of allegiance; and amidst their tumult, the still voice of law and reason was seldom heard or obeyed. The turbulent Romans disclaimed the yoke, and insulted the impotence, of their bishop;<sup>10</sup> nor would his education or character allow him to exercise, with decency or effect, the power of the sword. The motives of his election and the frailties of his life were exposed to their familiar observation; and proximity must diminish the reverence, which his name and his decrees impressed on a barbarous world. This difference has not escaped the notice of our philosophic historian: "Though the name "and authority of the court of Rome were so "terrible in the remote countries of Europe, "which were sunk in profound ignorance, and "were entirely unacquainted with its character "and conduct, the pope was so little revered at "home, that his inveterate enemies surrounded "the gates of Rome itself, and even controlled "his government in that city; and the ambassadors, who, from a distant extremity of Europe, carried to him the humble, or rather "abject, submissions of the greatest potentate "of the age, found the utmost difficulty to "make their way to him, and to throw themselves at his feet."<sup>11</sup>

Since the primitive times, the wealth of the popes was exposed to envy, their power to opposition, and their persons to violence. But the long hostility of the mitre and the crown increased the numbers, and inflamed the passions, of their enemies. The deadly factions of the Guelphs and Ghibelines, so fatal to Italy, could never be embraced with truth or constancy by the Romans, the subjects and adversaries both of the bishop and emperor; but their support was solicited by both parties; and they alternately

Successors of Gregory VII
A.D. 1086-1505.

denunt spolia, ac si thesauros Cressi student reparare Sed recte cum eis agit Albinus, quoniam et ipsi alii et saepe missas hominibus dati sunt in direptionem (de Nugis Curialium, l. vi c. 24.

11 Hume's History of England, vol. 2, p. 419. The same writer says in his Essays (p. 263) "the great act of cruelty perpetrated by Henry II. was the murder of Becket." When he was "preacher at Normandy, the chamber of Becket presided, without his consent, in the election of a bishop upon which he 'threw all' at them, with the bishop elect to be elected, and 'saw all their efforts to be frustrated, and the election of a bishop and danger that it should be a source of contention, they had vowed to preserve the chamber of Becket as a treasure."

minus repatriant inviti. Nova res<sup>1</sup> quando ha-tenus arum Roma refudit? Et nunc Romanorum consilio id usurpatum non credimus (Bernart de Consolatione, l. 11. c. 3 p. 157.). The first words of the passage are obscure, and probably corrupt.

9 Quand les sauvages de la Louisiane veulent avoir du fruit, ils coupent l'arbre au pied et cueillent le fruit. Voilà le gouvernement despotique. Esprit des Loix, l. v. c. 15-), and passion and ignorance are always dominant.

10) In a free conversation with his countryman Adrian IV, John of Salisbury accuses the avarice of the pope and clergy. Provinciarum displayed in their banners the keys of St. Peter and the German eagle. Gregory the Seventh, who may be adored or detested as the founder of the papal monarchy, was driven from Rome, and died in exile at Salerno. Six and thirty of his successors,<sup>12</sup> till their retreat to Avignon, maintained an unequal contest with the Romans: their age and dignity were often violated; and the churches, in the solemn rites of religion, were polluted with sedition and murder. A repetition<sup>13</sup> of such capricious brutality, without connection or design, would be tedious and disgusting; and I shall content myself with some events of the twelfth century, which represent the state of the popes and the city.

A.D. 1099–1115. On Holy Thursday, while Paschal officiated before the altar, he was interrupted by the clamours of the multitude, who imperiously demanded the confirmation of a favourite magistrate. His silence exasperated their fury: his pious refusal to mingle the affairs of earth and heaven was encountered with menaces and oaths, that he should be the cause and the witness of the public ruin. During the festival of Easter, while the bishop and the clergy, barefoot and in procession, visited the tombs of the martyrs, they were twice assaulted, at the bridge of St. Angelo, and before the Capitol, with volleys of stones and darts. The houses of his adherents were levelled with the ground: Paschal escaped with difficulty and danger: he levied an army in the patrimony of St. Peter; and his last days were embittered by suffering and inflicting the calamities of civil war. The scenes that followed the election of his successor, Gelasius the Second, were still more scandalous to the church and city. Cencio Frangipani,<sup>14</sup> a potent and factious baron, burst into the assembly furious and in arms: the cardinals were stripped, beaten, and trampled under foot; and he seized, without pity or respect, the vicar of Christ by the throat. Gelasius was dragged by his hair along the ground, buffeted with blows, wounded with spurs, and bound with an iron chain in the house of his brutal tyrant. An insurrection of the people delivered their bishop: the rival families opposed the violence of the Frangipani; and Cencio, who sued for pardon, repented of the failure, rather than of the guilt, of his enterprise. Not many days had elapsed, when the pope was again assaulted at the altar. While his friends and enemies were engaged in a bloody contest, he escaped in his sacerdotal garments. In this unworthy flight, which excited the compassion of the Roman matrons, his attendants were scattered or unhorsed; and, in the fields behind the church of St. Peter, his successor was found alone and half dead with fear and fatigue. Shaking the dust from his feet, the apostle withdrew from a city in which his dignity was insulted and his person was endangered; and the vanity of sacerdotal ambition is revealed in the involuntary confession, that one emperor was more tolerable than twenty.<sup>15</sup> These examples might suffice; but I cannot forget the sufferings of two pontiffs of the same age, the second and third of the name of Lucius. The former, as he ascended in battle array to assault the Capitol, was struck on the temple by a stone, and expired in a few days. The latter was severely wounded in the persons of his servants. In a civil commotion, several of his priests had been made prisoners; and the inhuman Romans, reserving one as a guide for his brethren, put out their eyes, crowned them with ludicrous mitres, mounted them on asses with their faces to the tail, and extorted an oath, that, in this wretched condition, they should offer themselves as a lesson to the head of the church. Hope or fear, lassitude or remorse, the characters of the men, and the circumstances of the times, might sometimes obtain an interval of peace and obedience; and the pope was restored with joyful acclamations to the Lateran or Vatican, from whence he had been driven with threats and violence. But the root of mischief was deep and perennial; and a momentary calm was preceded and followed by such tempests as had almost sunk the bark of St. Peter. Rome continually presented the aspect of war and discord: the churches and palaces were fortified and assaulted by the factions and families; and, after giving peace to Europe, Calistus the Second alone had resolution and power to prohibit the use of private arms in the metropolis. Among the nations who revered the apostolic throne, the tumults of Rome provoked a general indignation; and, in a letter to his disciple Eugenius the Third, St. Bernard, with the sharpness of his wit and zeal, has stigmatised the vices of the rebellious people.<sup>16</sup>

“Who is ignorant,” says the monk of Clairvaux, “of the vanity and arrogance of the Romans? a nation nursed in sedition, cruel, untractable, and seeming to obey, unless they are too feeble to resist. When they promise to serve, they aspire to reign; if they swear allegiance, they watch the opportunity of revolt; yet they vent their discontent in loud clamours if your doors, or your counsels, are shut against them. Dexterous in mischief, they have never learnt the science of doing good. Odious to earth and heaven, impious to God, seditious among themselves, jealous of their neighbours, inhuman to strangers, they love no one, by no one are they beloved; and while they wish to inspire fear, they live in base and continual

12 From Leo IX. and Gregory VII. an authentic and contemporary series of the lives of the popes by the cardinal of Arragon, Pandolphus Pisanus, Bernard Guido, &c. is inserted in the Italian Histories of Muratori (tom. i. part. i. p. 277–685), and has been always before my eye.

13 The dates of the events of the twelfth century are not to be understood as any necessary and excellent demonstration of a matter of fact. I have, however, in my possession, and as that treasure is in my library, I have thought it necessary to state the dates of the events of the twelfth century.

p. 398.

16 Quid tam notum seculis quam protervia et cervicosis Romanorum? gens insana pax, tumultu aequata, gens immitis et intractabilis, sub speciebus, sed sine conscientia, non vult resistere (de Considerat. l. iv. c. 2. p. 141). “The saint takes his breath, and then begins again. III. invidia terre et callo, utrique nocere placuit, &c. (p. 145).”

"apprehension. They will not submit; they know not how to govern; faithless to their superiors, intolerable to their equals, ungrateful to their benefactors, and alike impudent in their demands and their refusals. Lofty in promise, poor in execution; adulation and calumny, perfidy and treason, are the familiar arts of their policy." Surely this dark portrait is not coloured by the pencil of Christian charity; <sup>17</sup> yet the features, however harsh and ugly, express a lively resemblance of the Romans of the twelfth century. <sup>18</sup>

Political heresy of Arnold of Brescia.
A. D. 1110.

The Jews had rejected the Christ when he appeared among them in a plebeian character; and the Romans might plead their ignorance of his vicar when he assumed the pomp and pride of a temporal sovereign. In the busy age of the crusades, some sparks of curiosity and reason were rekindled in the Western world: the heresy of Bulgaria, the Paulician sect, was successfully transplanted into the soil of Italy and France; the Gnostic visions were mingled with the simplicity of the Gospel; and the enemies of the clergy reconciled their passions with their conscience, the desire of freedom with the profession of piety. <sup>19</sup> The trumpet of Roman liberty was first sounded by Arnold of Brescia, <sup>20</sup> whose promotion in the church was confined to the lowest rank, and who wore the monastic habit rather as a garb of poverty than as an uniform of obedience. His adversaries could not deny the wit and eloquence which they severely felt: they confess with reluctance the specious purity of his morals; and his errors were recommended to the public by a mixture of important and beneficial truths. In his theological studies, he had been the disciple of the famous and unfortunate Abelard, <sup>21</sup> who was likewise involved in the suspicion of heresy: but the lover of Eloisa was of a soft and flexible nature; and his ecclesiastic judges were edified and disarmed by the humility of his repentance. From this master, Arnold most probably imbibed some metaphysical definitions of the Trinity, repugnant to the taste of the times: his ideas of baptism and the eucharist are loosely censured; but a political heresy was the source of his fame and misfortunes. He presumed to quote the declaration of Christ, that his kingdom is not of this world: he boldly maintained, that the sword and the sceptre were intrusted to the civil magistrate; that temporal honours and possessions were lawfully vested in secular persons; that the abbots, the bishops, and the pope himself, must renounce either their state or their salvation; and that after the loss of their revenues, the voluntary tithes and oblations of the faithful would suffice, not indeed for luxury and avarice, but for a frugal life in the exercise of spiritual labours. During a short time, the preacher was revered as a patriot; and the discontent, or revolt, of Brescia against her bishop, was the first fruits of his dangerous lessons. But the favour of the people is less permanent than the resentment of the priest; and after the heresy of Arnold had been condemned by Innocent the Second, <sup>22</sup> in the general council of the Lateran, the magistrates themselves were urged by prejudice and fear to execute the sentence of the church. Italy could no longer afford a refuge; and the disciple of Abelard escaped beyond the Alps, till he found a safe and hospitable shelter in Zurich, now the first of the Swiss cantons. From a Roman station, <sup>23</sup> a royal villa, a chapter of noble virgins, Zurich had gradually increased to a free and flourishing city; where the appeals of the Milanese were sometimes tried by the Imperial commissaries. <sup>24</sup> In an age less ripe for reformation, the precursor of Zuinglius was heard with applause: a brave and simple people imbibed, and long retained, the colour of his opinions; and his art, or merit, seduced the bishop of Constance, and even the pope's legate, who forgot, for his sake, the interest of their master and their order. Their tardy zeal was quickened by the fierce exhortations of St. Bernard; <sup>25</sup> and the enemy of the church was driven by persecution to the desperate measure of erecting his standard in Rome itself, in the face of the successor of St. Peter.

Yet the courage of Arnold was not devoid of discretion: he was protected, and had perhaps been invited, by the nobles and people; and in the service of freedom, his eloquence thundered over the seven hills. Blending in the same discourse the texts of Livy and St. Paul, uniting the motives of gospel, and of classic, enthusiasm, he admonished the Romans, how strangely their patience and the vices of the clergy had degenerated from the primitive times of the church and the city. He exhorted them to assert the inalienable rights of men and Christians; to restore the laws and magistrates of the republic; to respect the name of the emperor; but to confine their shepherd to the spiritual government of his flock. <sup>26</sup> Nor could his spiritual government escape the censure and

He exhorts the Romans to restore the Republic.
A. D. 1144
—1154.

<sup>17</sup> As a Roman citizen, Petrarch takes leave to observe, that Bernard, though a saint, was a man; that he might be provoked by resentment.

as the wit, that is sold at the city.

<sup>19</sup> The heresies of the sixth century may be found in Mosheim (Institut. Hist. Eccles. p. 119—127), who entertains a favourable opinion of Arnold of Brescia. In the fifth chapter, I have described the sect of the Paulicians, and followed their migration from Armenia to Thracia and Bulgaria, Italy and France.

<sup>20</sup> The original picture of Arnold of Brescia are drawn by Otto, bishop of Freisingen (it hon. l. viii. c. 51. de Gestis Frederici I. l. i. c. 27. l. ii. c. 21.), and in the mid book of the Ligurinus, a poem of the thirteenth century, who flourished A. D. 1200, in the monastery of Pavia near Milan, who flourished A. D. 1200, in the monastery of Pavia near Milan, who flourished A. D. 1200, in the monastery of Pavia near Milan.

with much

Hersey, in St. Bernard, of heresy and positive divinity is well understood by Mosheim (Institut. Hist. Eccles. p. 112—113).

22

— Damnatu ab illo

Præfale, qui reuerens sextimo centenario nostro

Nomen ab nomen et dicitur laudabile est.

We may applaud the utility and correctness of Ligurinus, who H into a complaint
Hensis has been found at 12 6144, but at and Canon have assumed and Pæcus Ligurinus.
c. 5, p. 106.) re-appraises

Enslaved, Nolite Terram multam, cop. rerum, is repeated with pleasure by the antiquaries of Zurich.

<sup>25</sup> Bernard, Epist. l. xvi. c. xxi. tom. i. p. 187—190. Amidst his control of the reformer; and the inferior clergy were taught by his lessons to resist the cardinals, who had usurped a despotic command over the twenty-eight regions or parishes of Rome.<sup>27</sup> The revolution was not accomplished without rapine and violence, the effusion of blood and the demolition of houses: the victorious faction was enriched with the spoils of the clergy and the adverse nobles. Arnold of Brescia enjoyed, or deplored, the effects of his mission: his reign continued above ten years, while two popes, Innocent the Second and Anastasius the Fourth, either trembled in the Vatican, or wandered as exiles in the adjacent cities. They were succeeded by a more vigorous and fortunate pontiff, Adrian the Fourth,<sup>28</sup> the only Englishman who has ascended the throne of St. Peter; and whose merit emerged from the mean condition of a monk, and almost a beggar, in the monastery of St. Alban's. On the first provocation, of a cardinal killed or wounded in the streets, he cast an interdict on the guilty people; and, from Christmas to Easter, Rome was deprived of the real or imaginary comforts of religious worship. The Romans had despised their temporal prince; they submitted with grief and terror to the censures of their spiritual father: their guilt was expiated by penance, and the banishment of the seditious preacher was the price of their absolution. But the revenge of Adrian was yet unsatisfied, and the approaching coronation of Frederic Barbarossa was fatal to the bold reformer, who had offended, though not in an equal degree, the heads of the church and state. In their interview at Viterbo, the pope represented to the emperor the furious ungovernable spirit of the Romans; the insults, the injuries, the fears, to which his person and his clergy were continually exposed; and the pernicious tendency of the heresy of Arnold, which must subvert the principles of civil, as well as ecclesiastical, subordination. Frederic was convinced by these arguments, or tempted by the desire of the Imperial crown; in the balance of ambition, the innocence or life of an individual is of small account; and their common enemy was sacrificed to a moment of political concord. After his retreat from Rome, Arnold had been protected by the viscounts of Campania, from whom he was extorted by the power of Cesar: the prefect of the city pronounced his sentence; his execution A. D. 1155. the martyr of freedom was burnt alive in the presence of a careless and ungrateful people; and his ashes were cast into the Tyber, lest the heretics should collect and worship the relics of their master.<sup>29</sup> The clergy triumphed in his death: with his ashes, his sect was dispersed; his memory still lived in the minds of the Romans. From his school they had probably derived a new article of faith, that the metropolis of the Catholic church is exempt from the penalties of excommunication and interdict. Their bishops might argue, that the supreme jurisdiction, which they exercised over kings and nations, more especially embraced the city and diocese of the prince of the apostles. But they preached to the winds, and the same principle that weakened the effect, must temper the abuse, of the thunders of the Vatican.

The love of ancient freedom has encouraged a belief, that as early as the tenth century, in their first struggles against the Saxon Otthos, the commonwealth was vindicated and restored by the senate and people of Rome; that two consuls were annually elected among the nobles, and that ten or twelve plebeian magistrates revived the name and office of the tribunes of the commons.<sup>30</sup> But this venerable structure disappears before the light of criticism. In the darkness of the middle ages, the appellations of senators, of consuls, of the sons of consuls, may sometimes be discovered.<sup>31</sup> They were bestowed by the emperors, or assumed by the most powerful citizens, to denote their rank, their honours,<sup>32</sup> and perhaps the claim of a pure and patrician descent; but they float on the surface, without a series or a substance, the titles of men, not the orders of government;<sup>33</sup> and it is only from the year of Christ one thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the establishment of the senate is dated, as a glorious era, in the acts of the city. A new constitution was hastily framed by private ambition or popular enthusiasm; nor could Rome, in the twelfth century, produce an antiquary to explain, or a legislator to restore, the harmony and proportions of the ancient model. The assembly of a free, of an armed, people, will ever speak in loud and weighty acclamations. But the regular distribution of the thirty-five tribes, the nice balance of the wealth and numbers of the centuries, the debates of the adverse orators, and the slow operations of votes and ballots, could not easily be adapted by a blind multitude, ignorant of the arts, and insensible of the benefits, of legal government. It was proposed by Arnold to revive and discriminate the equestrian order; but what could be the motive or measure of such distinction? <sup>34</sup> The pecuniary qualification Restoration of the senate.

A. D. 1144.

His execution
A. D. 1155.

alive in the presence of a careless and ungrateful people; and his ashes were cast into the Tyber, lest the heretics should collect and

Pon-tifici summo, modum un-concedere regi
Sualetit populo. No. 144. 145. 146.

Nor is the poetry of Gunther different from the pro-e of Ottho.

27 See Barrovia (A. D. 1115, No. 38, 39) from the Vatican MSS. He loudly condemns Arnold (A. D. 1114, No. 7, 8) as the father of the political heretic, whose influence is then beginning to spread.

28 The English reader may consult the Historia Britannica, A. D. 1144.

29 But our own writers have added nothing to the fame or merits of their countryman.

30 Besides the historian and poet already quoted, the last seven names of Arnold are related by the biographer of Adrian IV. (Mirator, Script. Roman. It. tom. ii. p. 141, 142 c.)

31 Ducaque (Gloss. Latinis) Melit et Intime. Traces, Dr. Aronowicz, tom. ii. p. 210, gives me a quotation from Boninus (de clero i. 2). Duo consules, et tribuitur quatuordecim, et ad vicesimam consulatum exemplum sumitur reman. prae. et. And in Sigismund, de Regno Italiae, l. vi. Opp. tom. ii. p. 100. I read 4 the consul- and tribunes of the sixth century. Both Boninus, and even Sigismund, too freely copied the classic method of supplying from reason or fancy the deficiency of records.

32 In the panegyric of Benignus (Morit. et. S. R. R. It. tom. ii. p. 108) a Roman is represented as a consular natus in the beginning of the fifth century. Muratori, Script. Roman. It. tom. ii. p. 108.

years 932 and 936, Gratianus in Dei nomine consul et dux, Georgius consul et dux, and in 1013, Romanus, brother of Gregory VII. proudly, yet sagely, styles himself consul et dux et omnium Romanorum senator.

32 As late as the eighth century, the Greek emperors conferred on the dukes of Venice, Naples, Anaphi, &c. the title of senator, or consul (Gibbon, Supplement, passim), and the successors of Charlemagne would not advance any of their prerogative. But in general, the names of consul and senator, which may be found among the French and Germans, signify no more than count and lord (Siegner, Deutsch. Gesch.). The monkish writers are often ambitious of fine classic words.

33 The most constitutional form, is a diploma of Ottho III. (A. D. 995, Consulatus senatus populique Romanus), but the act is probably spurious. At the coronation of Henry I. (A. D. 1013), the historian Eubank (and Muratori, Script. Roman. It. tom. ii. p. 108) describes him a senatorius discedit a palatio, quorum sex rati barba, alii prolixia, mystice incedunt cum baculo. The senate is mentioned in the panegyric of Benignus (p. 400).

34 In the senate and of the emperor, v. Natur. xxxi. 1. 5.

the ship
Hist.
111—

of the knights must have been reduced to the poverty of the times: those times no longer required their civil functions of judges and farmers of the revenue; and their primitive duty, their military service on horseback, was more nobly supplied by feudal tenures and the spirit of chivalry. The jurisprudence of the republic was useless and unknown: the nations and families of Italy who lived under the Roman and barbaric laws were insensibly mingled in a common mass; and some faint tradition, some imperfect fragments, preserved the memory of the Code and Pandects of Justinian. With their liberty the Romans might doubtless have restored the appellation and office of consuls; had they not disdained a title so promiscuously adopted in the Italian cities, that it has finally settled on the humble station of the agents of commerce in a foreign land. But the rights of the tribunes, the formidable word that arrested the public counsel, suppose or must produce a legitimate democracy. The old patricians were the subjects, the modern barons the tyrants, of the state; nor would the enemies of peace and order, who insulted the vicar of Christ, have long respected the unarmed sanctity of a plebeian magistrate.<sup>15</sup>

The Capitol. In the revolution of the twelfth century, which gave a new existence and æra to Rome, we may observe the real and important events that marked or confirmed her political independence. I. The Capitoline hill, one of her seven eminences,<sup>36</sup> is about four hundred yards in length, and two hundred in breadth. A flight of an hundred steps led to the summit of the Tarpeian rock; and far steeper was the ascent before the declivities had been smoothed and the precipices filled by the ruins of fallen edifices. From the earliest ages, the Capitol had been used as a temple in peace, a fortress in war: after the loss of the city, it maintained a siege against the victorious Gauls, and the sanctuary of empire was occupied, assaulted, and burnt, in the civil wars of Vitellius and Vespasian.<sup>37</sup> The temples of Jupiter and his kindred deities had crumbled into dust; their place was supplied by monasteries and houses; and the solid walls, the long and shelving porticoes, were decayed or ruined by the lapse of time. It was the first act of the Romans, an act of freedom, to restore the strength, though not the beauty, of the Capitol; to fortify the seat of their arms and counsels; and as often as they ascended the hill, the coldest minds must have glowed with the remembrance of their ancestors. II. The first Cæsars had been invested with the exclusive coinage of the gold and silver; to the senate they abandoned the baser metal of bronze or copper.<sup>38</sup> The emblems and legends were inscribed on a more ample field by the genius of flattery; and the prince was relieved from the cure of celebrating his own virtues. The successors of Diocletian despised even the flattery of the senate: their royal officers at Rome, and in the provinces, assumed the sole direction of the mint, and the same prerogative was inherited by the Gothic kings of Italy, and the long series of the Greek, the French, and the German dynasties. After an abdication of eight hundred years, the Roman senate asserted this honourable and lucrative privilege, which was tacitly renounced by the popes, from Paschal the Second to the establishment of their residence beyond the Alps. Some of these republican coins of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries are shown in the cabinets of the curious. On one of these, a gold medal, Christ is depicted holding in his left hand a book with this inscription: "THE TOW OF THE ROMAN SENATE" AND PEOPLE. ROME THE CAPITAL OF THE "WORLD;" on the reverse St. Peter delivering a banner to a kneeling senator in his cap and gown, with the name and arms of his family impressed on a shield.<sup>39</sup> III. With the empire, the præfect of the city had declined to a municipal officer; yet he still exercised in the last appeal the civil and criminal jurisdiction; and a drawn sword, which he received from the successors of Otho, was the mode of his investiture and the emblem of his functions.<sup>40</sup> The dignity was confined to the noble families of Rome: the choice of the people was ratified by the pope, but a triple oath of fidelity must have often embarrassed the præfect in the conflict of adverse duties.<sup>41</sup> A servant, in whom they possessed but a third share, was dismissed by the independent Romans: in his place they elected a patrician; but this title, which Charlemagne had not disdained, was too lofty for a citizen or a subject; and, after the first fervour of rebellion, they consented without reluctance to the restoration of the præfect. About fifty years after this event, Innocent the Third, the most ambitious, or at least the most fortunate, of the pontiffs, delivered the Romans and himself from this badge of foreign dominion: he invested the præfect with a banner instead of a sword, and absolved him from all dependence of oaths or service to the German emperors.<sup>42</sup>

<sup>35</sup> The republican plan of Arnold of Brescia is thus stated by Gunther:

Quin etiam titulos urbis renovare vetustos;
Nominis plebeo secernere nomen equestre,
Jura triumphorum, sanctum reparari senatum,
Et semo fessas matasque reponere leges
Lapsa riuosis, et adnue pendente morbis Recllere prima, et cuncta iuris auri or.

But of these reformatations, some were no more than ideas, others no more than words.

76 After many disputes among the antiquaries of Rome, it seems determined, that the summit of the Capitoline hill next the river is strictly the Mons Tarpeius, the ars., and that on the other summit, the church and convent of Anna, the consecrated ruins of St. Francis, occupy the temple of Jupiter (Nardini, Roma Antica, l. v. c. II.—Id.).

58 This partition of the noble and baser metals between the emperor and senate, most however to be rated not as a positive fact, but as the probable opinion of the best antiquaries (see the Science des Médailles of the Libre Académie, torn. ii. p. 208-211, in the improved and latest edition of the Encyclopédie).

39 In his seventh dissertation on the Antiquities of Italy (tom. ii. p. 519-566), Muratori exhibits a series of the senatorian coins, which bear the obscure names of Iphodoti, Iobartoti, Proinat, Pitarini. During this period all the papers, without exception, Boniface VIII. obtained from the right of coining, which is resumed by his successor Benedict XI. and regularly exercised in the court of Avignon.

to a German historian, Ernst von Richthofen in Ballus. McNeill, too, v. p. 64 and Schmidt, Die Ostslaven, tom II, p. 203, „daraus ergibt sich bereits, dass die Russen ein kontinuierliches Element in der russischen Imperie bilden, dass diese, wie wir es heute präzisieren, von slavischen Völkern und nicht von germanischen Völkern abstammen“ and so on. I am not a specialist, but I suspect that such a point of view is not in line with the actual situation.

In the second case, the Russian writer, Boris Nikolaevich Vasiliev, in Die russische Literaturgeschichte tom III, p. 103, writes: „Die russische Literatur ist eine Kette von literarischen und literarisch-literarischen Verbindungen, die sich von der russischen Literatur des Mittelalters bis zur russischen Literatur der Gegenwart hinziehen.“

It is not clear what is meant by „literarisch-literarische Verbindungen“ and „Kette“ in this context. I am not a specialist, but I suspect that such a point of view is not in line with the actual situation.

It is not clear what is meant by „literarisch-literarische Verbindungen“ and „Kette“ in this context. I am not a specialist, but I suspect that such a point of view is not in line with the actual situation.

12 Urbi præfectum ad ligiam salutem recepit, et per mantum cardinal, was named by the pope to the civil government of Rome; but his jurisdiction has been reduced to a narrow compass; and in the days of freedom, the right or exercise was derived from the senate and people.

IV. After the revival of the senate,<sup>43</sup> the conscript fathers (if I may use the expression) were invested with the legislative and executive power; but their views seldom reached beyond the present day; and that day was most frequently disturbed by violence and tumult. In its utmost plenitude, the order or assembly consisted of fifty-six senators,<sup>44</sup> the most eminent of whom were distinguished by the title of counsellors; they were nominated, perhaps annually, by the people; and a previous choice of their electors, ten persons in each region, or parish, might afford a basis for a free and permanent constitution. The pope, who in this tempest submitted rather to bend than to break, confirmed by treaty the establishment and privileges of the senate, and expected from time, peace, and religion, the restoration of their government. The motives of public and private interest might sometimes draw from the Romans an occasional and temporary sacrifice of their claims; and they renewed their oath of allegiance to the successor of St. Peter and Constantine, the lawful head of the church and the republic.<sup>45</sup>

The office of senator. The union and vigour of a public council was dissolved in a lawless city; and the Romans soon adopted a more strong and simple mode of administration. They condensed the name and authority of the senate in a single magistrate, or two colleagues; and as they were changed at the end of a year, or of six months, the greatness of the trust was compensated by the shortness of the term. But in this transient reign, the senators of Rome indulged their avarice and ambition; their justice was perverted by the interest of their family and faction; and as they punished only their enemies, they were obeyed only by their adherents. Anarchy, no longer tempered by the pastoral care of their bishop, admonished the Romans that they were incapable of governing themselves; and they sought abroad those blessings which they were hopeless of finding at home. In the same age, and from the same motives, most of the Italian republics were prompted to embrace a measure, which, however strange it may seem, was adapted to their situation, and productive of the most salutary effects.<sup>46</sup> They chose, in some foreign but friendly city, an impartial magistrate of noble birth and unblemished character, a soldier and a statesman, recommended by the voice of fame and his country, to whom they delegated for a time the supreme administration of peace and war. The compact between the governor and the governed was sealed with oaths and subscriptions; and the duration of his power, the measure of his stipend, the nature of their mutual obligations, were defined with scrupulous precision. They swore to obey him as their lawful superior; he pledged his faith to unite the indifference of a stranger with the zeal of a patriot. At his choice, four or six knights and civilians, his assessors in arms and justice, attended the Podesta,<sup>47</sup> who maintained at his own expense a decent retinue of servants and horses: his wife, his son, his brother, who might bias the affections of the judge, were left behind; during the exercise of his office he was not permitted to purchase land, to contract an alliance, or even to accept an invitation in the house of a citizen; nor could he honourably depart till he had satisfied the complaints that might be urged against his government.

It was thus, about the middle of the thirteenth century, that the Romans called from Bologna the senator Brancalione,<sup>48</sup> whose fame and merit have been rescued from oblivion by the pen of an English historian. A just anxiety for his reputation, a clear foresight of the difficulties of the task, had engaged him to refuse the honour of their choice: the statutes of Rome were suspended, and his office prolonged to the term of three years. By the guilty and licentious he was accused as cruel; by the clergy he was suspected as partial; but the friends of peace and order applauded the firm and upright magistrate by whom those blessings were restored. No criminals were so powerful as to brave, so obscure as to elude, the justice of the senator. By his sentence two nobles of the Annibaldi family were executed on a gibbet; and he inexorably demolished, in the city and neighbourhood, one hundred and forty towers, the strong shelters of rapine and mischief. The bishop, as a simple bishop, was compelled to reside in his diocese; and the standard of Brancalione was displayed in the field with terror and effect. His services were repaid by the ingratitude of a people unworthy of the happiness which they enjoyed. By the public robbers, whom he had provoked for their sake, the Romans were excited to depose and imprison their benefactor; nor would his life have been spared, if Bologna had not possessed a pledge for his safety. Before his departure, the prudent senator had required the exchange of thirty hostages of the noblest families of Rome: on the news of his danger, and at the prayer of his wife, they were more strictly guarded; and Bologna, in the cause of honour, sustained the thunders of a papal interdict. This generous resistance allowed the Ro-

Brancalione.
A. D. 1252.
—1258.

quod illi domit de prefectura cum publice investit, qui usque ad illi tempus paramento fidelitatis imperator fuit obligatus et ab eo preterea tenet honorem (Gesta Innocentii III. in Muratori, tom. li. p. 187.)

<sup>43</sup> See Otto Frising. Chron. vi. 31. de Gest. Frederici I. l. c. 27.

<sup>44</sup> Our countryman, Roger Hoveden, speaks of the single senators, of the Consilium facti, &c. quorum temporibus melius regebatur Roma duxim nunc (A. D. 1194) sed temporibus huius senatorum (Ducange, Gloss. tom. vi. p. 191. Saxatrupe).

<sup>45</sup> Muratori (dissert. xlii. tom. ix. p. 755—758) has published an original treaty (Concordia inter D. nostrum papam Clementem III. et senatores populi Romani super regitratu et eius dignitatis urbis, &c. anno 1198 senatus. The senate speaks, and speaks with authority. Reddimus ad presens . . . habebamus . . . datus presbiteria . . . iurabimus pacem et fidem item, &c. A. D. et illa de Tere. . . m. Tusculani, dated in the 17th year of the same pontificate, and confirmed de rebus ammissis ordinis senatus, &c. &c. A. D. pulchre

Capitolio consistentis. It is there we find the difference of senators consilium and simple senators (Muratori, dissert. xlii. tom. ix. p. 757—759.)

<sup>46</sup> Muratori (dissert. xlv. tom. ix. p. 664—692.) has fully explained this mode of government, and the Occidua Pastorale, which he has given at the end, is a treatise or sermon on the duties of these foreign magistrates.

<sup>47</sup> In the Latin original, as I have observed, the title of Podesta is used.

<sup>48</sup> See the original of the charter, in the Statuta of Bologna, (Juvenal, Sat. c. 90.)

mans to compare the present with the past; and Brancalione was conducted from the prison to the Capitol amidst the acclamations of a repentant people. The remainder of his government was firm and fortunate; and as soon as envy was appeased by death, his head, enclosed in a precious vase, was deposited on a lofty column of marble.<sup>49</sup>

Charles of Anjou.
A. D. 1265
-1278.

Charles of Anjou, 1265-1278.

The impotence of reason and virtue recommended in Italy a more effectual choice: instead of a private citizen, to whom they yielded a voluntary and precarious obedience, the Romans elected for their senator some prince of independent power, who could defend them from their enemies and themselves. Charles of Anjou and Provence, the most ambitious and warlike monarch of the age, accepted at the same time the kingdom of Naples from the pope, and the office of senator from the Roman people.<sup>50</sup> As he passed through the city, in his road to victory, he received their oath of allegiance, lodged in the Lateran palace, and smoothed in a short visit the harsh features of his despotic character. Yet even Charles was exposed to the inconstancy of the people, who saluted with the same acclamations the passage of his rival, the unfortunate Conradin; and a powerful avenger, who reigned in the Capitol, alarmed the fears and jealousy of the popes. The absolute term of his life was superseded by a renewal every third year; and the enmity of Nicholas the Third obliged the Sicilian king to abdicate the government of Rome. In his bull, a perpetual law, the imperious pontiff asserts the truth, validity, and use, of the donation of Constantine, not less essential to the peace of the city than to the independence of the church; establishes the annual election of the senator; and formally disqualifies all emperors, kings, princes, and persons of an eminent and conspicuous rank.<sup>51</sup> This prohibitory

Pope Martin
IV
A. D. 1251.

Pope Martin IV. clause was repealed in his own behalf by Martin the Fourth, who humbly solicited the suffrage of the Romans. In the presence, and by the authority, of the people, two electors conferred, not on the pope, but on the noble and faithful Martin, the dignity of senator, and the supreme administration of the republic,<sup>32</sup> to hold during his natural life, and to exercise at pleasure by himself or his deputies. About fifty years afterwards, the same title was granted to the emperor Lewis of Bavaria: and the liberty of Rome was acknowledged by her two sovereigns, who accepted a municipal office in the government of their own metropolis.

The emperor
Leo of Bavaria.
A. D. 1328.

the emperor Lewis of Bavaria: and the liberty of Rome was acknowledged by her two sovereigns, who accepted a municipal office in the government of their own metropolis.

Addresses of Rome to the emperors.

liate the favour of the empire, and to recommend their merit and services in the cause of Cæsar.
The style of their ambassadors to Conrad III.
Conrad the Third and Frederic the A. D. 1114.

First, is a mixture of flattery and pride, the tradition and the ignorance of their own history.<sup>53</sup> After some complaint of his silence and neglect, they exhort the former of these princes to pass the Alps, and assume from their hands the Imperial crown. "We beseech your majesty, not to disdain the humility of your sons and vassals, not to listen to the accusations of our common enemies; who calumniate the senate as hostile to your throne, who sow the seeds of discord, that they may reap the harvest of destruction. The pope and the Sicilian are united in an impious league to oppose our liberty and your coronation. With the blessing of God, our zeal and courage has hitherto defeated their attempts. Of their powerful and factious adherents, more especially the Frangipani, we have taken by assault the houses and turrets: some of these are occupied by our troops, and some are levelled with the ground. The Milvian bridge, which they had broken, is restored and fortified for your safe passage; and your army may enter the city without being annoyed from the castle of St. Angelo. All that we have done, and all that we design, is for your honour and service, in the loyal hope, that you will speedily appear in person, to vindicate those rights which have been invaded by the clergy, to revive the dignity of the empire, and to surpass the fame and glory of your predecessors. May you fix your residence in Rome, the capital of the world; give laws to Italy and the Teutonic kingdom; and imitate the example of Constantine and Justinian,<sup>54</sup> who, by the vigour of the senate and people, obtained the sceptre of the earth."<sup>55</sup> But these splendid and fallacious wishes were not cherished by Conrad the Franconian, whose eyes were fixed on the Holy Land, and who died without visiting Rome soon after his return from the Holy Land.

His nephew and successor, Frederic Barbarossa, was more ambitious. Frederic I. A. D. 1155.

of the Imperial crown; nor had any of the successors of Otho acquired such absolute sway over the kingdom of Italy. Surrounded by his ecclesiastical and secular princes, he gave audience in his camp at Sutri to the ambassadors of Rome, who thus addressed him in a free and florid oration: "Incline your ear to the queen of cities; approach with a peaceful and friendly mind to the precincts of Rome, which has cast away the yoke of the clergy, and is impatient to crown her legitimate emperor. Under your auspicious influence, may the primitive times be restored."

it must be received by the Catholics, or at least by the Papists, as a *53 These letters and speeches are preserved by Otto bishop of Frisingen, Farrae. Rithor. lat. Med. et infim. tom. i. p. 186, 187; perhaps the author of the Historia, he was son of Teotold margrave of Austria, the emperor's nephew, and daughter of the emperor Henry IV. He was a half-brother and uncle to Conrad III. and Frederic I. He has left, in seven books, a Chronicle of the Times, in two, the gesta Frederici I., the last of which is inserted in the vol. volume of Muratori-Historians.

54 We desire, and the ignorant Romans, to restore the empire in our stature, who have ten years Constantine et Julianus, qui totum orbem vixit et regnavit et postquam Constantinus et Julianus

49 Matthew Paris thus ends his account: Caput vero ipsius Brancarii in tunc pretioso super marmoream columnam collocatum, in summisque domibus suis, cum suis et suisque successoribus, nomen et entum et male- tor et defensor. A biographer of 1,592 draws a less favourable portrait of this Grubline senator.

21) The election of Charles of Anjou to the office of perpetual senator of Rome, is mentioned by the historians in the ninth volume of the collection of Muratori, by Nicholas de Jamsilla (p. 1121), the monk of Padua (p. 721), Sabas Malaspina (l. ii. c. 9. p. 863), and Riccardo Malaspina (p. 127).

...the Decretals,

"Assert the prerogatives of the eternal city, and reduce under her monarchy the insolence of the world. You are not ignorant, that, in former ages, by the wisdom of the senate, by the valour and discipline of the equestrian order, she extended her victorious arms to the East and West, beyond the Alps, and over the islands of the ocean. By our sins, in the absence of our princes, the noble institution of the senate has sunk in oblivion: and with our prudence, our strength has likewise decreased. We have revived the senate, and the equestrian order; the counsels of the one, the arms of the other, will be devoted to your person and the service of the empire. Do you not hear the language of the Roman matron? You were a guest, I have adopted you as a citizen; a Transalpine stranger, I have elected you for my sovereign;<sup>56</sup> and given you myself, and all that is mine. Your first and most sacred duty, is to swear and subscribe, that you will shed your blood for the republic; that you will maintain, in peace and justice, the laws of the city and the charters of your predecessors; and that you will reward with five thousand pounds of silver the faithful senators who shall proclaim your titles in the Capitol. With the name, assume the character, of Augustus." The flowers of Latin rhetoric were not yet exhausted; but Frederic, impatient of their vanity, interrupted the orators in the high tone of royalty and conquest. Famous indeed have been the fortitude and wisdom of the ancient Romans: but your speech is not seasoned with wisdom, and I could wish that fortitude were conspicuous in your actions. Like all sublimary things, Rome has felt the vicissitudes of time and fortune. Your noblest families were translated to the East, to the royal city of Constantine; and the remains of your strength and freedom have long since been exhausted by the Greeks and Franks. Are you desirous of beholding the ancient glory of Rome, the gravity of the senate, the spirit of the knights, the discipline of the camp, the valour of the legions? you will find them in the German republic. It is not empire, naked and alone, the ornaments and virtues of empire have likewise migrated beyond the Alps to a more deserving people:<sup>57</sup> they will be employed in your defence, but they claim your obedience. You pretend that myself or my predecessors have been invited by the Romans: you mistake the word, they were not invited; they were implored. From its foreign and domestic tyrants, the city was rescued by Charlemagne and Otho, whose ashes repose in our country: and their dominion was the price of your deliverance.

"Under that dominion your ancestors lived and died. I claim by the right of inheritance and possession, and who shall dare to extort you from my hands? Is the hand of the Franks<sup>58</sup> and Germans enfeebled by age? Am I vanquished? Am I a captive? Am I not encompassed with the banners of a potent and invincible army? You impose conditions on your master; you require oaths: if the conditions are just, an oath is superfluous; if unjust, it is criminal. Can you doubt my equity? It is extended to the meanest of my subjects. Will not my sword be unsheathed in the defence of the Capitol? By that sword the northern kingdom of Denmark has been restored to the Roman empire. You prescribe the measure and the objects of my bounty, which flows in a copious but a voluntary stream. All will be given to patient merit; all will be denied to rude importunity."<sup>59</sup> Neither the emperor nor the senate could maintain these lofty pretensions of dominion and liberty. United with the pope, and suspicious of the Romans, Frederic continued his march to the Vatican; his coronation was disturbed by a sally from the Capitol; and if the numbers and valour of the Germans prevailed in the bloody conflict, he could not safely encamp in the presence of a city of which he styled himself the sovereign. About twelve years afterwards, he besieged Rome, to seat an antipope in the chair of St. Peter; and twelve Pisan galleys were introduced into the Tyber: but the senate and people were saved by the arts of negotiation and the progress of disease; nor did Frederic or his successors reiterate the hostile attempt. Their laborious reigns were exercised by the popes, the crusades, and the independence of Lombardy and Germany; they courted the alliance of the Romans; and Frederic the Second offered in the Capitol the great standard, the Carroccio of Milan.<sup>60</sup> After the extinction of the house of Swabia, they were banished beyond the Alps; and their last coronations betrayed the impotence and poverty of the Teutonic Cæsars.<sup>61</sup>

Under the reign of Adrian, when the empire extended from the Euphrates to the ocean, from Mount Atlas to the Grampian hills, a fanciful historian<sup>62</sup> amused the Romans with the picture of their infant wars. "There was a time," says Florus, "when Tibur and Præneste, our summer retreats, were the objects of hostile vows in the Capitol, when we dreaded the shades of the Arician groves, when we could triumph without a blush over the nameless villages of the Sabines and Latins, and even Corioli could afford a title not unworthy

Wars of the Romans against the neighbouring cities.

Ne si . . . p. 111)
 Ne si anno 127, una eque deso tiro con in marmo dianzi troto si scopri, nel tanquidolo, presso alla carcere di quel luogo, dove posto V. l'alta di marmo, dove sta esso posto sopra quattro colonne di marmo tiro colla seguita iscrizione, &c. to the same purpose as the old inscription.

61 The decline of the Imperial arms and authority in Italy is related with impartial learning in the Annals of Muratori (tom. x. s. xi. xii.) and the reader may compare his narrative with the Histoire des Allemans (tom. ii. s. v.) by Schmidt, who has deserved the esteem of his countrymen.

62 Tibur nunc suburbanum . . . p. 111) puts in Capitolio vobis petro . . .
 (l. i. c. 11.) may be read with . . .
 of a man of genius (Œuvres de M. de la Harpe, tom. ii. p. 111, quarto edition).

56 Ho po eras, citem feci. Advena fuit ex Trans-alpinis partibus; principem constitui.

57 Non esset natus indum imperium, virtute sua amictum, venit, ornamenta sibi secum traxit. Times posant consules tunc. Xc. Cetero si l'as would not have renounced these images, the eloquence of a barbarian born and educated in the Here, can be seen.

58 Oth of Frisingen, who surly in derogate the language of the court and diet of Germans, speaks of the Franks in the sixth century as the first nation (Proces Fræm, Epitomes Franci, manus Francorum) he adds, however, the epithet of Franks.

59 Of a French de Geste, Frederic l. i. s. c. 92. p. 720-723. These criminal and authentic acts I have translated and abridged with freedom, yet with fidelity.

60 From the histories of Rinaldo and Frances Pipin, Muratori (dissert. xvi. tom. ii. p. 324) has borrowed this curious fact with the dogrel verses that accompanied the gift.

Avo decus oris, ave victus tibi desinor, ave
 Currus ab Augusto Francico Casare iusto.
 Væ Mediolanum! jam sensus spernere valium

"of a victorious general." The pride of his contemporaries was gratified by the contrast of the past and the present: they would have been humbled by the prospect of futurity; by the prediction, that after a thousand years, Rome, despoiled of empire and contracted to her primeval limits, would renew the same hostilities, on the same ground which was then decorated with her villas and gardens. The adjacent territory on either side of the Tyber was always claimed, and sometimes possessed, as the patrimony of St. Peter; but the barons assumed a lawless independence, and the cities too faithfully copied the revolt and discord of the metropolis. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, the Romans incessantly laboured to reduce or destroy the contumacious vassals of the church and senate; and if their headstrong and selfish ambition was moderated by the pope, he often encouraged their zeal by the alliance of his spiritual arms. Their warfare was that of the first consuls and dictators, who were taken from the plough. They assembled in arms at the foot of the Capitol; sallied from the gates, plundered or burnt the harvests of their neighbours, engaged in tumultuary conflict, and returned home after an expedition of fifteen or twenty days. Their sieges were tedious and unskilful: in the use of victory, they indulged the meaner passions of jealousy and revenge; and instead of adopting the valour, they trampled on the misfortunes, of their adversaries. The captives, in their shirts, with a rope round their necks, solicited their pardon: the fortifications, and even the buildings, of the rival cities were demolished, and the inhabitants were scattered in the adjacent villages. It was thus that the seats of the cardinal bishops, Porto, Ostia, Albano, Tusculum, Praeneste, and Tibur or Tivoli, were successively overthrown by the ferocious hostility of the Romans.<sup>63</sup> Of these,<sup>64</sup> Porto and Ostia, the two keys of the Tyber, are still vacant and desolate: the marshy and unwholesome banks are peopled with herds of buffaloes, and the river is lost to every purpose of navigation and trade. The bills, which afford a shady retirement from the autumnal heats, have again smiled with the blessings of peace; Frascati has arisen near the ruins of Tusculum; Tibur or Tivoli has resumed the honours of a city,<sup>65</sup> and the meaner towns of Albano and Palestrina are decorated with the villas of the cardinals and princes of Rome. In the work of destruction, the ambition of the Romans was often checked and repulsed by the neighbouring cities and their allies: in the first siege of Tibur, they were driven from their camp; and the battles of Tusculum<sup>66</sup> and Viterbo<sup>67</sup> might be compared in their relative state to the memorable fields of Thyrsamene and Cannæ. In the first of these petty wars, thirty thousand Romans were overthrown by a thousand German horse, whom Frederic Barbarossa had detached to the relief of Tusculum; and if we number the slain at three, the prisoners at two, thousand, we shall embrace the most authentic and moderate account. Sixty-eight years afterwards they marched against Viterbo in the ecclesiastical state with the whole force of the city; by a rare coalition the Teutonic eagle was blended, in the adverse banners, with the keys of St. Peter; and the pope's auxiliaries were commanded by a count of Toulouse and a bishop of Winchester. The Romans were discomfited with shame and slaughter; but the English prelate must have indulged the vanity of a pilgrim, if he multiplied their numbers to one hundred, and their loss in the field to thirty, thousand men. Had the policy of the senate and the discipline of the legions been restored with the Capitol, the divided condition of Italy would have offered the fairest opportunity of a second conquest. But in arms, the modern Romans were not above, and in arts, they were far below, the common level of the neighbouring republics. Nor was their warlike spirit of any long continuance; after some irregular sallies they subsided in the national apathy, in the neglect of military institutions, and in the disgraceful and dangerous use of foreign mercenaries.

Ambition is a weed of quick and early vegetation in the vineyard of Christ. Under the first Christian princes, the chair of St. Peter was disputed by the votes, the venality, the violence, of a popular election: the sanctuaries of Rome were polluted with blood; and, from the third to the twelfth century, the church was distracted by the mischief of frequent schisms. As long as the final appeal was determined by the civil magistrate, these mischiefs were transient and local: the merits were tried by equity or favour; nor could the unsuccessful competitor long disturb the triumph of his rival. But after the emperors had been divested of their prerogatives, after a maxim had been established, that the vicar of Christ is amenable to no earthly tribunal, each vacancy of the holy see might involve Christendom in controversy and war. The claims of the cardinals and inferior clergy, of the nobles and people, were vague and litigious: the freedom of choice was over-ruled by the tumults of a city that no longer owned or obeyed a superior. On the decease of a pope, two factions proceeded in different churches to a double election: the number and weight of votes, the priority of time, the merit of the candidates, might balance each other: the most respectable of the clergy were divided; and the distant princes, who bowed before the spiritual throne, could not distinguish the spurious, from the legitimate, idol. The emperors were often the authors of the schism, from the political motive of opposing a friendly to an hostile pontiff; and each of the competitors was reduced to suffer the insults of his enemies, who were not awed by conscience; and to purchase the support of his

Battle of Viterbo.
A. D. 1251.

The election of the popes.

Battle of Tusculum.
A. D. 1167.

<sup>63</sup> Ne a feritate Romanorum, sicut fuerant Hostiensis, Portuensis, Tusculanensis, Albanensis, Labianensis, et super Tiurini destructurum (Matthew Paris, p. 757. c. These events are marked in the Annals and Index (the xvth volume) of Morison.

<sup>64</sup> For the state or ruin of these suburban cities, the Banks of the Tyber, &c. see the lively picture of the P. Labii (L'abbé de La Beuzelle) who had long resided in the neighbourhood of Rome, and the more accurate description of which P. Eschard (Rome, 1760, in octavo) has added to the topographical map of the city.

<sup>65</sup> Labat (tom. iii. p. 253) mentions a recent decree of the Roman government, which has severely punished the pride and poverty of Viterbo, in restoring the Tuurini to their ancient condition.

<sup>66</sup> I depart from my usual method, of quoting only by the date, the Annals of Morison in a mention of the critical labours in which he is engaged, and have inserted writers who mention the battle of Tusculum (tom. ix. p. 12-13).

<sup>67</sup> Matthew Paris, p. 747. This bishop of Winchester was Peter de Rupibus, who occupied the see during two years (A. D. 1206-1208) and is described by the English historian, as a soldier and a adherents, who were instigated by avarice or ambition. A peaceful and perpetual succession was ascertained by Alexander the Third,<sup>68</sup> who finally abolished the tumultuary votes of the clergy and people, and defined the right of election in the sole college of cardinals.<sup>69</sup> The three orders of bishops, priests, and deacons, were assimilated to each other by this important privilege; the parochial clergy of Rome obtained the first rank in the hierarchy; they were indifferently chosen among the nations of Christendom; and the possession of the richest benefices, of the most important bishoprics, was not incompatible with their title and office. The senators of the Catholic church, the consultants and legates of the supreme pontiff, were robed in purple, the symbol of martyrdom or royalty; they claimed a proud equality with kings; and their dignity was enhanced by the smallness of their number, which, till the reign of Leo the Tenth, seldom exceeded twenty or twenty-five persons. By this wise regulation, all doubt and scandal were removed, and the root of schism was so effectually destroyed, that in a period of six hundred years a double choice has only once divided the unity of the sacred college. But as the concurrence of two thirds of the votes had been made necessary, the election was often delayed by the private interest and passions of the cardinals; and while they prolonged their independent reign, the Christian world was left destitute of an head. A vacancy of almost three years had preceded the elevation of Gregory the Tenth, who resolved to prevent the future abuse; and his bull, after some opposition, has been consecrated in the code of the canon law.<sup>70</sup> Nine days are allowed for the obsequies of the deceased pope, and the arrival of the absent cardinals: on the tenth, they are imprisoned, each with one domestic, in a common apartment or conclave, without any separation of walls or curtains; a small window is reserved for the introduction of necessities; but the door is locked on both sides, and guarded by the magistrates of the city, to seal them from all correspondence with the world. If the election be not consummated in three days, the luxury of their tables is contracted to a single dish at dinner and supper; and after the eighth day, they are reduced to a scanty allowance of bread, water, and wine. During the vacancy of the holy see, the cardinals are prohibited from touching the revenues, or assuming, unless in some rare emergency, the government of the church; all agreements and promises among the electors are formally annulled; and their integrity is fortified by their solemn oath and the prayers of the Catholics. Some articles of inconvenience or superfluous rigour have been gradually relaxed, but the principle of confinement is vigorous and entire; they are still urged by the personal motives of health and freedom, to accelerate the moment of their deliverance; and the improvement of ballot or secret votes has wrapt the struggles of the conclave<sup>71</sup> in the silky veil of charity and politeness.<sup>72</sup> By these institutions, the Romans were excluded from the election of their prince and bishop; and in the fever of wild and precarious liberty, they seemed insensible of the loss of this inestimable privilege. The emperor Lewis of Bavaria revived the example of the great Otto. After some negotiation with the magistrates, the Roman people was assembled<sup>73</sup> in the square before St. Peter's; the pope of Avignon, John the Twenty-second, was deposed; the choice of his successor was ratified by their consent and applause. They freely voted for a new law, that their bishop should never be absent more than three months in the year, and two days' journey from the city; and that if he neglected to return on the third summons, the public servant should be degraded and dismissed.<sup>74</sup> But Lewis forgot his own debility and the prejudices of the times; beyond the precincts of a German camp, his useless phantom was rejected; the Romans despised their own workmanship; the antipope implored the mercy of his lawful sovereign;<sup>75</sup> and the exclusive right of the cardinals was more firmly established by this unreasonable attack.

Institution of the conclave by Gregory X. A. D. 1274.

Had the election been always held in the Vatican, the rights of the senate and people would not have been violated with impunity. But the Romans forgot, and were forgotten, in the absence of the successors of Gregory the Seventh, who did not keep as a divine precept their ordinary residence in the city and diocese. The care of that diocese was less important than the government of the universal church; nor could the popes delight in a city in which their authority was always opposed, and their person was often endangered. From the persecution of the emperors, and the wars of Italy, they escaped beyond the Alps into the hospitable bosom of France; from the tumults of Rome they prudently withdrew to live and die in the more tranquil stations of Anagni, Perugia, Viterbo, and the adjacent cities. When

Absence of the popes from Rome.

On a venit toujours ensemble avec le même respect, et la même civilité que l'on observe dans le cabinet des rois, avec la même politesse que l'on voit dans le cour de Henri III. avec la même familiarité que l'on voit dans les collèges, avec la même modestie, qui se remarque dans les novices, et avec la même charité, du moins en apparence, qui pourroit être entre des frères, j'ajoutant nous.

<sup>68</sup> See Mosheim, Institut. Hist. Ecclesiast. p. 404, 405. Alexander himself had never been the object of a (voluntary) election, and the doubtful merits of Innocent III. only proposed to ratify the weight of genius and learning which St. Bernard gave to his pontifical name (see his last writings).

<sup>69</sup> The original text, impiorum, non, direct, proferre, &c. of the P. M. is corrected, as it is evidently misquoting a Thomassin (Théophile du 1. 1. c. 1. p. 12. 1274.) but the people's name much faded. The sacred college was reduced to the number of twenty-two, to represent, under his viceroy, the disciples of Christ.

<sup>70</sup> See the bull of Gregory X. Quia nonnulli &c. in the Acta of the Council of Lyons, c. 35. & compare it to the decretals which Pontific VIII. promulgated at Rome in 1275, and addressed to the chief universities of Europe.

<sup>71</sup> The genius of cardinal de Retz had a right to paint a conclave (for 1655), in which he was a spectator, as an actor (Mémoires, tom. iv. p. 115-124) but I am at a loss to imagine the knowledge or authority of an anon nous, Italian, who's history (Contes de Pontius Romanus, in 4to. 1667) has been continued since the reign of Alexander VII. The accidental tomb of this Frenchman's lesson, though not an authority, to ourselves. From a whole sort of intrigues, to emerge to the elevation of the successful candidate, but the next day expires with his funeral.

second order antipope

the flock was offended or impoverished by the absence of the shepherd, they were recalled by a stern admonition, that St. Peter had fixed his chair, not in an obscure village, but in the capital of the world; by a ferocious menace that the Romans would march in arms to destroy the place and people that should dare to afford them a retreat. They returned with timorous obedience; and were saluted with the account of an heavy debt, of all the losses which their desertion had occasioned, the hire of lodgings, the sale of provisions, and the various expenses of servants and strangers who attended the court.<sup>76</sup> After a short interval of peace, and perhaps of authority, they were again banished by new tumults, and again summoned by the imperious or respectful invitation of the senate. In these occasional retreats, the exiles and fugitives of the Vatican were seldom long, or far, distant from the metropolis; but in the beginning of the fourteenth century the apostolic throne was transported, as it might seem for ever, from the Tyher to the Rhone; and the cause of the transmigration may be deduced from the Boniface VIII.

A D 1794 Eighth and the king of France, 77
-1803.

-1503. The spiritual arms of excommunication and interdict were repulsed by the union of the three estates, and the privileges of the Gallican church; but the pope was not prepared against the carnal weapons which Philip the Fair had courage to employ. As the pope resided at Anagni, without the suspicion of danger, his palace and person were assaulted by three hundred horse, who had been secretly levied by William of Nogaret, a French minister, and Sciarra Colonna, of a noble but hostile family of Rome. The cardinals fled; the inhabitants of Anagni were seduced from their allegiance and gratitude; but the dauntless Boniface, unarmed and alone, seated himself in his chair, and awaited, like the conscript fathers of old, the swords of the Gauls. Nogaret, a foreign adversary, was content to execute the orders of his master: by the domestic enmity of Colonna, he was insulted with words and blows; and during a confinement of three days his life was threatened by the hardships which they inflicted on the obstinacy which they provoked. Their strange delay gave time and courage to the adherents of the church, who rescued him from sacrilegious violence; but his imperious soul was wounded in a vital part; and Boniface expired at Rome in a frenzy of rage and revenge. His memory is stained with the glaring vices of avarice and pride; nor has the courage of a martyr promoted this ecclesiastical champion to the honours of a saint; a magnanimous sinner (say the chronicles of the times), who entered like a fox, reigned like a lion, and died like a dog. He was succeeded by Benedict the Eleventh, the mildest of mankind. Yet he excommunicated the impious emissaries of Philip, and devoted the city and people of Anagni by a tremendous curse, whose effects are still visible to the eyes of superstition.<sup>78</sup>

After his decease, the tedious and equal suspense of the conclave was fixed by the dexterity of the Translation of the host see to Avignon.

A. D. 1369.

French faction. A specious offer was made and accepted, that in the term of forty days, they would elect one of the three candidates who should be named by their opponents. The archbishop of Bourdeaux, a furious enemy of his king and country, was the first on the list; but his ambition was known; and his conscience obeyed the calls of fortune and the commands of a benefactor, who had been informed by a swift messenger that the choice of a pope was now in his hands. The terms were regulated in a private interview; and with such speed and secrecy was the business transacted, that the unanimous conclave applauded the elevation of Clement the Fifth.<sup>79</sup> The cardinals of both parties were soon astonished by a summons to attend him beyond the Alps; from whence, as they soon discovered, they must never hope to return. He was engaged, by promise and affection, to prefer the residence of France; and, after dragging his court through Poitou and Gascogny, and devouring, by his expense, the cities and convents on the road, he finally reposed at Avignon,<sup>80</sup> which flourished above seventy years<sup>81</sup> the seat of the Roman pontiff and the metropolis of Christendom. By land, by sea, by the Rhône, the position of Avignon was on all sides accessible; the southern provinces of France do not yield to Italy itself; new palaces arose for the accommodation of the pope and cardinals; and the arts of luxury were soon attracted by the treasures of the church. They were already possessed of the adjacent territory, the Venaissin county,<sup>82</sup> a populous and fertile spot; and the sovereignty of Avignon was afterwards purchased from the youth and distress of Jane, the first queen of Naples and countess of Provence, for the inadequate price of fourscore thousand florins.<sup>83</sup> Under the justifies or excuses the characters of his countrymen. The exile of Aeneas compared to the Italians with Babylonians, and the captivity such furious metaphors, more suitable to the ardour of Petrarch than to the judgement of Muratori, are gravely refuted in Baluze's preface. The Abbe de Sade is distracted between the love of Petrarch and of his country. Yet he modestly pleads, that many of the local inconveniences of vignan are now removed, and many of the nice scruples of the poet dissipated, had he been courted with the Roman court by the strangers of Italy (tom. i. p. 24).

Gregory XI. and Clement VII. are published by Stephen Baluze (Vite Paparum Avenionensium, Paris, 1695, 2 vols. in 4to.) with copious and elaborate notes, and a second volume of acts and documents. With the true zeal of an editor and a patriot, he devoutly justifies or excuses the characters of his countrymen.

92 The comtat Venaisien was ceded to the popes in 1273 by Philip

1. The first step is to identify the problem or question that needs to be answered. This involves understanding the context and the specific requirements of the task.

Cat. bibl. — 195. 613. Longueville. Description de la France, tom. 8.

85 If a possession of four centuries were not itself a title, such objections might annul the bargain, but the purchase here, notwithstanding, was not annulled.

be refunded, for indeed it was paid. Civitatem Avinionensem eomit
- - - per nos redi venditorum pecunia redundantes, &c. (124 Vita

Clement. VI in Beluz. tom. 1 p. 174. Muratori, Script. tom. III.

76. Romani autem non valentes nec volentes ultra suam celare cupiunt questionem, per ejus absentiam in mercenarium, in istis modis innumera-
 77. bilibus. Quod cum audisset papa, precoraliiter pugenit, ut se
 78. comperiens misericordiam, &c. Matt. x. p. 77. For the ordinary
 79. history of the popes, their life and death, their residence and absence,
 80. is enough to refer to the ecclesiastical annalists, Spondanus and Fleury.

77 Besides the general historians of the church of Italy and of France, we possess a valuable treatise composed by a learned friend of Thuanus, which his last and best editors have published in the appendix (Histoire particuliere du grand Differend entre Boniface VIII. et Philippe le Bel, par Pierre du Puis, tom. vii. part. xi. p. 61—82.).

78 It is difficult to know whether Lahat (tom. iv p. 53-57) be in jest or in earnest, when he supposes that Anagnin still feels the weight of the yoke of the Lord.

of this curse, and that the corn-fields, or vineyards, or olive-trees, re in harrassed with some difficulties.

60 The original lives of the eight popes of Avignon, Clement V. John XXII, Benedict XII, Clement VI, Innocent VI, Urban V.

shadow of the French monarchy, amidst an obedient people, the popes enjoyed an honourable and tranquil state, to which they long had been strangers: but Italy deplored their absence; and Rome, in solitude and poverty, might repent of the ungovernable freedom which had driven from the Vatican the successor of St. Peter. Her repentance was tardy and fruitless: after the death of the old members, the sacred college was filled with French cardinals,<sup>84</sup> who beheld Rome and Italy with abhorrence and contempt, and perpetuated a series of national, and even provincial, popes, attached by the most indissoluble ties to their native country.

The progress of industry had produced and enriched the Italian republics: the era of their liberty is the most flourishing period of population and agriculture, of manufactures and commerce; and their mechanic labours were gradually refined into the arts of elegance and genius. But the position of Rome was less favourable, the territory less fruitful; the character of the inhabitants was debased by indolence and elated by pride; and they fondly conceived that the tribute of subjects must for ever nourish the metropolis of the church and empire. This prejudice was encouraged in some degree by the resort of pilgrims to the shrines of the apostles; and the last legacy of the popes, the institution of the HOLY YEAR,<sup>85</sup> was not less beneficial to the people than to the clergy. Since the loss of Palestine, the gift of plenary indulgences, which had been applied to the crusades, remained without an object; and the most valuable treasure of the church was sequestered above eight years from public circulation. A new channel was opened by the diligence of Boniface the Eighth, who reconciled the vices of ambition and avarice; and the pope had sufficient learning to recollect and revive the secular games, which were celebrated in Rome at the conclusion of every century. To sound without danger the depth of popular credulity, a sermon was seasonably pronounced, a report was artfully scattered, some aged witnesses were produced; and on the first of January of the year thirteen hundred, the church of St. Peter was crowded with the faithful, who demanded the customary indulgence of the holy time. The pontiff, who watched and irritated their devout impatience, was soon persuaded by ancient testimony of the justice of their claim; and he proclaimed a plenary absolution to all Catholics who, in the course of that year, and at every similar period, should respectfully visit the apostolic churches of St. Peter and St. Paul. The welcome sound was propagated through Christendom; and at first para. p. 575. The only temptation for June and her second husband was ready money, and without it they could not have returned to the throne of Naples.

<sup>84</sup> Clement V. immediately promoted ten cardinals, nine French and one English (Vitz. l. vi. p. 67, et Itouz. p. 67, No. 1. In 1351 the pope refused two candidates recommended by the king of France, quod ex cardinalibus, de quibus xvi. de regno Francie ordinem transire non solum in memoriam collegii extant. (Thomassin, Discipline de l'Eglise, tom. i. p. 1281.)

<sup>85</sup> The primitive account, from cardinal James Cusanus (Maxima Biblot. Patrum, tom. xxx.) and I am at a loss to determine whether the nephew of Boniface VIII. be a fool or a knave: the uncle is a much clearer character.

<sup>86</sup> See John Vitellius, l. vi. c. 36. in the x. th, and the Chronicon Astense, in the xith volume (p. 140, 141) of Muratori's collection. Pius innumerabilem pecuniam ab eisdem accepit, cum duo clerici, cum a striis, &c.

<sup>87</sup> The two bulls of Boniface VIII. and Clement VI. are inserted from the nearest provinces of Italy, and at length from the remote kingdoms of Hungary and Britain, the highways were thronged with a swarm of pilgrims who sought to expiate their sins in a journey, however costly or laborious, which was exempt from the perils of military service. All exceptions of rank or sex, of age or infirmity, were forgotten in the common transport; and in the streets and churches many persons were trampled to death by the eagerness of devotion. The calculation of their numbers could not be easy nor accurate; and they have probably been magnified by a dexterous clergy, well apprised of the contagion of example: yet we are assured by a judicious historian, who assisted at the ceremony, that Rome was never replenished with less than two hundred thousand strangers; and another spectator has fixed at two millions the total concourse of the year. A trifling oblation from each individual would accumulate a royal treasure; and two priests stood night and day, with rakes in their hands, to collect, without counting, the heaps of gold and silver that were poured on the altar of St. Paul.<sup>86</sup> It was fortunately a season of peace and plenty; and if forage was scarce, if inns and lodgings were extravagantly dear, an inexhaustible supply of bread and wine, of meat and fish, was provided by the policy of Boniface and the venal hospitality of the Romans. From a city without trade or industry, all casual riches will speedily evaporate: but the avarice and envy of the next generation solicited Clement the Sixth<sup>87</sup> to anticipate the distant period of the century. The gracious pontiff complied with their wishes; afforded Rome this poor consolation for his loss; and justified the change by the name and practice of the Mosaic Jubilee.<sup>88</sup> His summons was obeyed; and the number, zeal, and liberality, of the pilgrims did not yield to the primitive festival. But they encountered the triple scourge of war, pestilence, and famine: many wives and virgins were violated in the castles of Italy; and many strangers were pillaged or murdered by the savage Romans, no longer moderated by the presence of their bishop.<sup>89</sup> To the impatience of the popes we may ascribe the successive reduction to fifty, thirty-three, and twenty-five years; although the second of these terms is commensurate with the life of Christ. The profusion of indulgences, the revolt of the protestants, and the decline of superstition, have much diminished the value of the jubilee: yet even the nineteenth and last festival was a year of pleasure and profit to the Romans; and a philosophic smile will not disturb the triumph of the priest or the happiness of the people.<sup>90</sup>

The second jubilee A.D. 1350.

in the Corpus Juris Canonici (Extravagant. Commun. l. v. tit. ix. c. 1, 2.)

<sup>85</sup> The sabbatic years and jubiles of the Mosaic law (Car. Sigon. de Republica Hebraeorum, Opp. tom. iv. l. iii. c. 11, 15. p. 131, 132.) the suspension of all care and labour, the periodical release of lands, debts, servitude, &c. may seem a noble idea, but the execution would be impracticable in a profane republic; and I should be glad to learn that this famous festival was observed by the Jewish people.

<sup>86</sup> See the Chronicle of Matteo Vallart (l. i. c. 56.) in the xvith volume of Muratori, and the Memoires sur la Vie de Petrarque, tom. iii. p. 73-89.

<sup>87</sup> The subject is exhausted by M. Charu, a French minister at the Hague, in his Lettres Historiques, et Politiques sur les Juifs et les Indulgences, &c. (Hague, 1731, 5 vols. in 12.) an elaborate and pleasing work had not the author preferred the character of a polemic to that of a philosopher.

The nobles or barons of Rome. In the beginning of the eleventh century, Italy was exposed to the feudal tyranny, alike oppressive to the sovereign and the people. The rights of human nature were vindicated by her numerous republics, who soon extended their liberty and dominion from the city to the adjacent country. The sword of the nobles was broken; their slaves were enfranchised; their castles were demolished; they assumed the habits of society and obedience; their ambition was confined to municipal honours, and in the proudest aristocracy of Venice or Genoa, each patrician was subject to the laws.<sup>61</sup> But the feeble and disorderly government of Rome was unequal to the task of curbing her rebellious sons, who scorned the authority of the magistrate within and without the walls. It was no longer a civil contention between the nobles and plebeians for the government of the state: the barons asserted in arms their personal independence; their palaces and castles were fortified against a siege; and their private quarrels were maintained by the numbers of their vassals and retainers. In origin and affection, they were aliens to their country.<sup>62</sup> And a genuine Roman, could such have been produced, might have renounced these haughty strangers, who disdained the appellation of citizens, and proudly styled themselves the princes, of Rome.<sup>63</sup> After a dark series of revolutions, all records of pedigree were lost; the distinction of surnames was abolished; the blood of the nations was mingled in a thousand channels; and the Goths and Lombards, the Greeks and Franks, the Germans and Normans, had obtained the fairest possessions by royal bounty, or the prerogative of valour. These examples might be readily presumed: but the elevation of an Hebrew race to the rank of senators and consuls, is an event without a parallel in the long captivity of these miserable exiles.<sup>64</sup> In the time of Leo the Ninth, a wealthy and learned Jew was converted to Christianity; and honoured at his baptism with the name of his godfather, the reigning pope.

The zeal and courage of Peter the son of Leo were signalled in the cause of Gregory the Seventh, who intrusted his faithful adherent with the government of Adrian's mole, the tower of Crescentius, or, as it is now called, the castle of St. Angelo. Both the father and the son were the parents of a numerous progeny: their riches, the fruits of usury, were shared with the noblest families of the city; and so extensive was their alliance, <sup>61</sup> Muratori (Dissert. xlvii) alleges the Annals of Florence, Faderi, Genesio, &c. as the analogy of the text, the evidence of Otto of Freising (de Gest. Fred. I. l. ii. c. 15), and the submission of the marquis of Este.

<sup>62</sup> As early as the year 924, the emperor Lothare I. found it expedient to interrogate the Roman people, to learn from each individual, by what national law he chose to be governed (Muratori, Dissert. xxiii).

<sup>63</sup> Petrarch attacks these foreigners, the tyrants of Rome, in a declamation or epistle, full of bold truths and abundant pedantry, in which he applies the maxims, and even pre-judices, of the old republic to the state of the sixteenth century (Memoirs, tom. iii. p. 157—169).

<sup>64</sup> The origin and adventures of this Jewish family are noticed by Pagi (Crit. eccl. tom. iv. p. 435 A. D. 1124, No. 3, 11), who draws his information from the Chron. graecum, Miramandensis, and Arnulphus, Sagenensis de Schismate in Maritima, script. fol. tom. vi. par. i. p. 425—452). The fact must in some degree be true, yet I could wish that it had been collated, before it was turned into a prose epistle, by the antiquary.

<sup>65</sup> The cardinal of St. George, in his poetical, or rather metrical, surrimest
yet si
prou.

that the grandson of the proselyte was exalted by the weight of his kindred to the throne of St. Peter. A majority of the clergy and people supported his cause: he reigned several years in the Vatican, and it is only the eloquence of St. Bernard, and the final triumph of Innocent the Second, that has branded Anacletus with the epithet of antipope. After his defeat and death, the posterity of Leo is no longer conspicuous; and none will be found of the modern nobles ambitious of descending from a Jewish stock. It is not my design to enumerate the Roman families, which have failed at different periods, or those which are continued in different degrees of splendour to the present time.<sup>65</sup> The old consular line of the Frangipani discover their name in the generous act of breaking or dividing bread in a time of famine; and such benevolence is more truly glorious than to have enclosed, with their allies the Corsi, a spacious quarter of the city in the chains of their fortifications: the Savelli, as it should seem a Sabine race, have maintained their original dignity; the obsolete surname of the Cupracchi is inscribed on the coins of the first senators; the Conti preserve the honour, without the estate, of the counts of Signia; and the Anibaldi must have been very ignorant, or very modest, if they had not descended from the Carthaginian hero.<sup>66</sup>

But among, perhaps above, the peers and princes of the city, I distinguish the rival houses of Colonna and Ursini, whose private story is an essential part of the annals of modern Rome. I. The name and arms of Colonna<sup>67</sup> have been the theme of much doubtful etymology; nor have the orators and antiquarians overlooked either Trajan's pillar, or the columns of Hercules, or the pillar of Christ's flagellation, or the luminous column that guided the Israelites in the desert. Their first historical appearance in the year eleven hundred and four, attests the power and antiquity, while it explains the simple meaning, of the name. By the usurpation of Cavae, the Colonna provoked the arms of Paschal the Second; but they lawfully held in the Campagna of Rome the hereditary fiefs of Zagarola and Colonna; and the latter of these towns was probably adorned with some lofty pillar, the relic of a villa or temple.<sup>68</sup> They likewise possessed one moiety of the neighbouring city of Tusculum; a strong presumption of their descent from the counts of Tusculum, who in the tenth century were the tyrants of the history of the election and coronation of Boniface VIII. (Muratori, Script. Ital. tom. vi. pars i. p. 611.) describes the state and families at Rome at the coronation of Boniface VIII. (A. D. 1295)

The Colonna.

Ita tres tuii sequebantur, cum suis armis
Illa tre que sui Romae, et tre tradentes
Non cum in armis, sed cum suis armis
Iraut ret-see mo, et tre, qui constant Aurata fulgentes, et tre, qui constant
Ex ipsa devota consuetudine, et tre

The ancient statues of Rome (see p. 115, 116) distinguish eleven families of barons, who are said to occur in consular use, before the senator, that the senator might protect any one of them, or himself, as a noble's son.
It is not that the Colonna themselves have not favoured the world with a genealogy and history of their ancient use. I refer to Muratori (Dissert. l. i. c. 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100). The family has still great possessions in the Campagna of Rome, but has been expelled from the Kingdom of Naples by the original act of 1294 (absolutely p. 238, 239).

vacant republic; and the mischiefs of discord were perpetuated by the wretched compromise of electing each year two rival senators. By their private hostilities, the city and country were desolated, and the fluctuating balance inclined with their alternate success. But none of either family had fallen by the sword, till the most renowned champion of the Ursini was surprised and slain by the younger Stephen Colonna.<sup>108</sup> His triumph is stained with the reproach of violating the truce; their defeat was basely avenged by the assassination, before the church door, of an innocent boy and his two servants. Yet the victorious Colonna, with an annual colleague, was declared senator of Rome during the term of five years. And the muse of Petrarch inspired a wish, a hope, a prediction, that the generous youth, the son of his venerable hero, would restore Rome and Italy to their pristine glory; that his justice would extirpate the wolves and lions, the serpents and bears, who laboured to subvert the eternal basis of the marble column.<sup>109</sup>

CHAP. LXX.

Character and Coronation of Petrarch. — Restoration of the Freedom and Government of Rome by the Tribune Rienzi. — His Virtues and Vices, his Expulsion and Death. — Return of the Popes from Avignon. — Great Schism of the West. — Reunion of the Latin Church. — Last Struggles of Roman Liberty. — Statutes of Rome. — Final Settlement of the Ecclesiastical State.

Petrarch, h.
A. D. 1304,
June 19—
July 19—
July 19—

In the apprehension of modern times, Petrarch<sup>1</sup> is the Italian sponger of Laura and love. In the harmony of his Tuscan rhymes, Italy applauds, or rather adores, the father of her lyric poetry: and his verse, or at least his name, is repeated by the enthusiast, or affectionate, of amorous sensibility. Whatever may be the private taste of a stranger.

108 Petrarch (tom. i. p. 222-250) has celebrated this victory according to the Colonna; but two contemporaries, a Florentine (Giovanni Villani, l. x. c. 240.) and a Roman (Ludovico Monaldeschi, p. 533, 534.) are less favourable to their arms.

104 The Abbe de Sade (tom. 1. notes, p. 61-66) has applied the with Canzone of Petrarca, Spirto Gentil, &c. to Stephen Colonna the younger:

Orsi, lupi, lioni, aquile e serpi
Ad una gran marionetta attorno
Fanno nota e s'attite e a se danno.

1 The Mémoires sur la Vie de François Petrarque (Amsterdam, 1761.

his slight and superficial knowledge should humbly acquiesce in the judgment of a learned nation; yet I may hope or presume, that the Italians do not compare the tedious uniformity of sonnets and elegies, with the sublime compositions of their epic muse, the original wildness of Dante, the regular beauties of Tasso, and the boundless variety of the incomparable Ariosto. The merits of the lover, I am still less qualified to appreciate: nor am I deeply interested in a metaphysical passion for a nymph so shadowy, that her existence has been questioned;<sup>2</sup> for a nation so prolific,<sup>3</sup> that she was delivered of eleven legitimate children,<sup>4</sup> while her amorous swain sighed and sung at the fountain of Vaucluse.<sup>5</sup> But in the eyes of Petrarch, and those of his graver contemporaries, his love was a sin, and Italian verse a frivolous amusement. His Latin works of philosophy, poetry, and eloquence, established his serious reputation, which was soon diffused from Avignon over France and Italy: his friends and disciples were multiplied in every city; and if the ponderous volume of his writings,<sup>6</sup> be now abandoned to a long repose, our gratitude must applaud the man, who by precept and example revived the spirit and study of the Augustan age. From his earliest youth, Petrarch aspired to the poetic crown. The academical honours of the three faculties had introduced a royal degree of master or doctor in the art of poetry;<sup>7</sup> and the title of poet laureat, which custom, rather than vanity, perpetuates in the English court,<sup>8</sup> was first invented by the Cæsars of Germany. In the musical games of antiquity, a prize was bestowed on the victor;<sup>9</sup> the belief that Virgil and Horace had been crowned in the Capitol inflamed the emulation of a Latin bard;<sup>10</sup> and the laurel<sup>11</sup> was endeared to the lover by a verbal resemblance with the name of his mistress. The value of either object was enhanced by the difficulties of the pursuit; and if the virtue or prudence of Laura was inexorable,<sup>12</sup> he enjoyed, and might boast of enjoying, the nymph of poetry. His vanity was not of the most delicate kind, since he applauded new edition of Petrarch's Latin works; but I much doubt whether it would redound to the profit of the bookseller, or the amusement of the public.

7 Consult Selden's Titles of Honour, in his works (vol. iii. p. 457—466.). An hundred years before Ierarch, St Francis received the visit of a poet, qui ab imperatore fuerat coronatus et exinde rex versuum dictus.

6 "The emperor has too often been false and or courtiers produce a who in every man, and fit in a measure of praise and will I be less, in the prese of, of the sovereign. I speak the most fact's, as the best time for a will-lung this ridiculous custom, is while the prince is a man of 1729) clumps for his native Athens the glory of first planting at Reviews of a series of a Neurophysiologist, Dion C. Smith, parties, vol. 1.

10 The Capitoline games (certamen capitoliale, musicum, equestre, ... in the year of ...)

and Haverkamp), and Professor has ment, the exclu-

in poets who lived in the
at the found

11 Perranck and the cardinals of Rome were ignorant that the burial was not the Capitoline, but the Deiphon, tower (Plin. Hist. Natur. xv. 71). Hist. Critique de la République des Lettres, tome 1, p. 101-102.

12 The power and voice of Faustus belaboured, and for a short time where  $\alpha$  is the temperature coefficient of the diode,  $\beta$  is the ideality factor,  $k$  is Boltzmann's constant,  $q$  is the electron charge,  $I_s$  is the saturation current, and  $I$  is the current through the diode. The diode current  $I$  is given by honour of haranguing pope Clement the Sixth, and the satisfaction of conversing with Petrarch, a congenial mind; but his aspiring hopes were chilled by disgrace and poverty; and the patriot was reduced to a single garment and the charity of the hospital. From this misery he was relieved by the sense of merit or the smile of favour; and the employment of apostolic notary afforded him a daily stipend of five gold florins; a more honourable and extensive connection; and the right of contrasting, both in words and actions, his own integrity with the vices of the state. The eloquence of Rienzi was prompt and persuasive: the multitude is always prone to envy and censure: he was stimulated by the loss of a brother and the impunity of the assassins; nor was it possible to excuse or exaggerate the public calamities. The blessings of peace and justice, for which civil society has been instituted, were banished from Rome: the jealous citizens, who might have endured every personal or pecuniary injury, were most deeply wounded in the dishonour of their wives and daughters: <sup>22</sup> they were equally oppressed by the arrogance of the nobles and the corruption of the magistrates; and the abuse of arms or of laws was the only circumstance that distinguished the lions, from the dogs and serpents, of the Capitol. These allegorical emblems were variously repeated in the pictures which Rienzi exhibited in the streets and churches; and while the spectators gazed with curious wonder, the bold and ready orator unfolded the meaning, applied the satire, inflamed their passions, and announced a distant hope of comfort and deliverance. The privileges of Rome, her eternal sovereignty over her princes and provinces, was the theme of his public and private discourse; and a monument of servitude became in his hands a title and incentive of liberty. The decree of the senate, which granted the most ample prerogatives to the emperor Vespasian, had been inscribed on a copper-plate still extant in the choir of the church of St. John Lateran. <sup>23</sup> A numerous assembly of nobles and plebeians was invited to this political lecture, and a convenient theatre was erected for their reception. The notary appeared, in a magnificent and mysterious habit, explained the inscription by a version and commentary, <sup>24</sup> and descanted with eloquence and zeal on the ancient glories of the senate and people, from whom all legal authority was derived. The supine ignorance of the nobles was incapable of discerning the serious tendency of such representations: they might sometimes chastise with words and blows the plebeian reformer; but he was often suffered in the Colonna palace to amuse the company with his threats and predictions; and the modern Brutus <sup>25</sup> was concealed under the mask of folly and the character of a buffoon. While they indulged their contempt, the restoration of the good estate, his favourite expression, was entertained among the people as a desirable, a possible, and at length as an approaching, event: and while all had the disposition to applaud, some had the courage to assist, their promised deliverer.

111

A prophecy, or rather a summons, affixed on the church door of St. George, was the first public evidence of his designs; a nocturnal assembly of a hundred citizens on Mount Aventine, the first step to their execution. After an oath of secrecy and aid, he represented to the conspirators the importance and facility of their enterprise; that the nobles, without union or resources, were strong only in the fear of their imaginary strength; that all power, as well as right, was in the hands of the people; that the revenues of the apostolical chamber might relieve the public distress; and that the pope himself would approve their victory over the common enemies of government and freedom. After securing a faithful band to protect his first declaration, he proclaimed through the city, by sound of trumpet, that on the evening of the following day all persons should assemble without arms before the church of St. Angelo, to provide for the re-establishment of the good estate. The whole night was employed in the celebration of thirty masses of the Holy Ghost; and in the morning, Rienzi, barcheaded, but in complete armour, issued from the church, encompassed by the hundred conspirators. The pope's vicar, the simple bishop of Orvieto, who had been persuaded to sustain a part in this singular ceremony, marched on his right hand; and three great standards were borne aloft as the emblems of their design. In the first, the banner of liberty. Rome was seated on two lions, with a palm in one hand and a globe in the other; St. Paul, with a drawn sword, was delineated in the banner of justice; and in the third, St. Peter held the keys of concord and peace. Rienzi was encouraged by the presence and applause of an innumerable crowd, who understood little, and hoped much; and the procession slowly rolled forwards from the castle of St. Angelo to the Capitol. His triumph was disturbed by some secret emotions which he laboured to suppress; he ascended without opposition, and with seeming confidence, the citadel of the republic; harangued the people from the balcony; and received the most flattering confirmation of his acts and laws. The nobles, as if destitute of arms and counsels, beheld in silent consternation this strange revolution; and the moment had been prudently chosen, when the most formidable, Stephen Colonna, was absent from the city. On the first rumour, he returned to his palace, affected to despise this plebeian tumult, and declared to the messengers of Rienzi, that at his leisure he would cast the madman from the windows of the Capitol. The great bell instantly rang an alarm, and so rapid was the tide, so urgent was the danger, that Colonna escaped with precipitation to the suburb of St. Lawrence; from thence

He assumes the government of Rome.
A. D. 1547,
May 20.;

22 Petrarch compares the jealousy of the Romans with the easy

27 The fragments of the Leve Regia may be found in the Index.

tion of Gruter, torn 1, p. 212, and at the end of the 1st. of Frobenius, with some turned notes of the 1st. torn.

The first two stanzas are a beautiful and touching expression of the poet's love for his country.

The law itself empowers legislation to enlarge the Privy Council's jurisdiction familiar to every antiquary. It was not so for the medieval, however.

found only with porcupine, in orchard, translates to Jardine de Porcupine.
 In the end, we could be the last that a person has to find.

... the French had to pay the loss and a ...

$\frac{d}{dt} \int_{\Omega} u^2 dx = -2 \int_{\Omega} u \Delta u dx = 0$ , since  $\Delta u = 0$ . Thus,  $\|u\|_2$  is constant in time.

[illegible]
$$\frac{1}{\Gamma(\alpha)} \int_0^t (t-\tau)^{\alpha-1} f(\tau) d\tau = \frac{1}{\Gamma(\alpha)} \int_0^t (t-\tau)^{\alpha-1} f(\tau) d\tau = \frac{1}{\Gamma(\alpha)} \int_0^t (t-\tau)^{\alpha-1} f(\tau) d\tau = \frac{1}{\Gamma(\alpha)} \int_0^t (t-\tau)^{\alpha-1} f(\tau) d\tau$$

after a moment's refreshment, he continued the same speedy career till he reached in safety his castle of Palestrina; lamenting his own imprudence, which had not trampled the spark of this mighty conflagration. A general and peremptory order was issued from the Capitol to all the nobles, that they should peaceably retire to their estates: they obeyed; and their departure secured the tranquillity of the free and obedient citizens of Rome.

But such voluntary obedience evaporates with the first transports of zeal; and Rienzi felt the importance of justifying his usurpation by a regular form and a legal title. At his own choice, the Roman people would have displayed their attachment and authority, by lavishing on his head the names of senator or consul, of king or emperor: he preferred the ancient and modest appellation of tribune; the protection of the commons was the essence of that sacred office; and they were ignorant, that it had never been invested with any share in the legislative or executive powers of the republic. In this character, and with the consent of the Romans, the tribune enacted the most salutary laws for the restoration and maintenance of the good estate. By the first he fulfils the wish of honesty and inexperience, that no civil suit should be protracted beyond the term of fifteen days. The danger of frequent perjury might justify the pronouncing against a false accuser the same penalty which his evidence would have inflicted: the disorders of the times might compel the legislator to punish every homicide with death, and every injury with equal retaliation. But the execution of justice was hopeless till he had previously abolished the tyranny of the nobles. It was formally provided, that none, except the supreme magistrate, should possess or command the gates, bridges, or towers, of the state: that no private garrisons should be introduced into the towns or castles of the Roman territory; that none should bear arms, or presume to fortify their houses in the city or country; that the barons should be responsible for the safety of the highways, and the free passage of provisions; and that the protection of malefactors and robbers should be expiated by a fine of a thousand marks of silver. But these regulations would have been impotent and nugatory, had not the licentious nobles been awed by the sword of the civil power. A sudden alarm from the bull of the Capitol could still summon to the standard above twenty thousand volunteers: the support of the tribune and the laws required a more regular and permanent force. In each harbour of the coast, a vessel was stationed for the assurance of commerce; a standing militia of three hundred and sixty horse and thirteen hundred foot was levied, clothed, and paid in the thirteen quarters of the city: and the spirit of a commonwealth may be traced in the grateful allowance of one hundred florins, or pounds, to the heirs of every soldier who lost his life in the service of his country. For the maintenance of the public defence, for the establishment of granaries, for the relief of widows, orphans, and indigent convents, Rienzi applied, without fear of sacrilege, the revenues of the apostolic chamber: the three branches of hearth-money, the salt-duty, and the customs, were each of the annual produce of one hundred thousand florins;<sup>26</sup> and scandalous were the abuses, if in four or five months the amount of the salt-duty could be trebled by his judicious economy. After thus restoring the forces and finances of the republic, the tribune recalled the nobles from their solitary independence; required their personal appearance in the Capitol; and imposed an oath, of allegiance to the new government, and of submission to the laws of the good estate. Apprehensive for their safety, but still more apprehensive of the danger of a refusal, the princes and barons returned to their houses at Rome in the garb of simple and peaceful citizens: the Colonna and Ursini, the Savelli and Frangipani, were confounded before the tribunal of a plebeian, of the vile buffoon whom they had so often derided, and their disgrace was aggravated by the indignation which they vainly struggled to disguise. The same oath was successively pronounced by the several orders of society, the clergy and gentlemen, the judges and notaries, the merchants and artisans, and the gradual descent was marked by the increase of sincerity and zeal. They swore to live and die with the republic and the church, whose interest was artfully united by the nominal association of the bishop of Orvieto, the pope's vicar, to the office of tribune. It was the boast of Rienzi, that he had delivered the throne and patrimony of St. Peter from a rebellious aristocracy; and Clement the Sixth, who rejoiced in its fall, affected to believe the professions, to applaud the merits, and to confirm the title, of his trusty servant. The speech, perhaps the mind, of the tribune, was inspired with a lively regard for the purity of the faith; he insinuated his claim to a supernatural mission from the Holy Ghost; enforced by an heavy forfeiture the annual duty of confession and communion; and strictly guarded the spiritual as well as temporal welfare of his faithful people.<sup>27</sup>

Never perhaps has the energy and effect of a single mind been more remarkably felt than in the sudden, though transient, reformation of Rome by the tribune Rienzi. A den of robbers was converted to the discipline of a camp or convent: patient to hear, swift to redress, inexorable to punish, his tribunal was always accessible to the poor and stranger; nor could birth, or dignity, or the immunities of the church, protect the offender or his accomplices. The privileged houses, the private sanctuaries in Rome, on which no officer of justice would presume to trespass, were abolished; and he applied the timber and iron of their barricades in the fortifications of the Capitol. The venerable father of the Colonna was exposed in his own palace to the double shame of being and I much fear, that the former is more consistent with the decay of Rome and her territory.

<sup>26</sup> In one MS. I read (l. 11. s. 4. p. 407) perforato patre &c. in another quarto portus, in import. patre &c. patre the Latin was with ten Roman solidi (Muratori, diSSERT. XXXV.). The former reading would give a population of 2,500, the latter of 2,500 families.

<sup>27</sup> Rossumus, p. 54. apud du Cerceau, Hist. de Rienzi, p. 194. The tribune's christian laws may be found in the Roman historian who wrote the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, p. 194.

desirous, and of being unable, to protect a criminal. A mule, with a jar of oil, had been stolen near Capranica; and the lord, of the Ursini family, was condemned to restore the damage, and to discharge a fine of four hundred florins for his negligence in guarding the highways. Nor were the persons of the barons more inviolate than their lands or houses: and, either from accident or design, the same impartial rigour was exercised against the heads of the adverse factions. Peter Agapet Colonna, who had himself been senator of Rome, was arrested in the street for injury or debt; and justice was appeased by the tardy execution of Martin Ursini, who, among his various acts of violence and rapine, had pillaged a shipwrecked vessel at the mouth of the Tyber.<sup>28</sup> His name, the purple of two cardinals, his uncles, a recent marriage, and a mortal disease, were disregarded by the inflexible tribune, who had chosen his victim. The public officers dragged him from his palace and nuptial bed: his trial was short and satisfactory: the bell of the Capitol convened the people: stript of his mantle, on his knees, with his hands bound behind his back, he heard the sentence of death; and after a brief confession Ursini was led away to the gallows. After such an example, none who were conscious of guilt could hope for impunity, and the flight of the wicked, the licentious, and the idle, soon purified the city and territory of Rome. In this time (says the historian) the woods began to rejoice that they were no longer infested with robbers; the oxen began to plough; the pilgrims visited the sanctuaries; the roads and inns were replenished with travellers; trade, plenty, and good faith, were restored in the markets; and a purse of gold might be exposed without danger in the midst of the highway. As soon as the life and property of the subject are secure, the labours and rewards of industry spontaneously revive: Rome was still the metropolis of the Christian world; and the fame and fortunes of the tribune were diffused in every country by the strangers who had enjoyed the blessings of his government.

The deliverance of his country inspired Rienzi with a vast, and perhaps visionary, idea, of uniting Italy in a great federative republic, of which Rome should be the ancient and lawful head, and the free cities and princes the members and associates. His pen was not less eloquent than his tongue; and his numerous epistles were delivered to swift and trusty messengers. On foot, with a white wand in their hand, they traversed the forests and mountains; enjoyed, in the most hostile states, the sacred security of ambassadors; and reported, in the style of flat-tory or truth, that the highways along their passage were lined with kneeling multitudes, who implored Heaven for the success of their undertaking. Could passion have listened to reason; could private interest have yielded to the public welfare; the supreme tribunal and confederate union of the Italian republic might have healed their intestine discord, and closed the Alps against the barbarians of the North. But the propitious season had elapsed; and if Venice, Florence, Sienna, Perugia, and many inferior cities, offered their lives and fortunes to the good estate, the tyrants of Lombardy and Tuscany must despise, or hate, the plebeian author of a free constitution. From them, however, and from every part of Italy, the tribune received the most friendly and respectful answers: they were followed by the ambassadors of the princes and republics; and in this foreign conflux, on all the occasions of pleasure or business, the low-born notary could assume the familiar or majestic courtesy of a sovereign.<sup>29</sup> The most glorious circumstance of his reign was an appeal to his justice from Lewis king of Hungary, who complained, that his brother, and her husband, had been perfidiously strangled by Jane queen of Naples.<sup>30</sup> her guilt or innocence was pleaded in a solemn trial at Rome; but after hearing the advocates,<sup>31</sup> the tribune adjourned this weighty and invidious cause, which was soon determined by the sword of the Hungarian. Beyond the Alps, more especially at Avignon, the revolution was the theme of curiosity, wonder, and applause. Petrarch had been the private friend, and delighted by Petrarch.

While Petrarch indulged these prophetic visions, the Roman hero <sup>His views and follies.</sup> was fast declining from the meridian of fame and power; and the people, who had gazed with astonishment on the ascending meteor, began to mark the irregularity of its course, and the vicissitudes of light and obscurity. More eloquent than judicious, more enterprising than resolute, the faculties of Rienzi were not balanced by cool and commanding reason: he magnified in a tenfold proportion the objects of hope and fear; and prudence, which could not have erected, did not presume to fortify, his throne. In the blaze of prosperity, his virtues

<sup>28</sup> Fortificata, l. i. c. 11. From the account of this shipwreck, we learn some circumstances of the trade and navigation of the ancients. 1. The ship was built and freighted at Naples for the ports of Mytilene and Aegium. 2. The sailors were of Naples and the island of Sicily, less skilful than those of Sicily and Ionia. 3. The navigation from Mytilene was a coasting voyage to the mouth of the Tiber, where they took shelter in a storm; but, instead of finding the current, unfortunately ran on a shoal. The vessel was stranded, the mariners escaped. 4. The cargo, which was pillaged, consisted of the revenue of Provence for the next treasury, many pieces of silver and cinnamon, and bales of French cloth, to the value of 450,000 sesterces.

<sup>29</sup> It was thus that Oliver Cromwell's old acquaintance, who recommended the success of his enterprise, and who, in the midst of his triumph, were surprised to find the old and the young of the nation, and the three (see Hume's Life of Cromwell) who were the only ones don, Warwick, Whitechapel, Watling, &c.). The consciousness of merit and power will sometimes elevate them to the station.

<sup>30</sup> See the causes, circumstances, and effects of the death of Andrew, in Formone (tom. i. l. xviii. p. 247-249), and the life of Petrarch, Marone, tom. i. p. 115-118, 119-120, 121, 122, 123, 124, notes, p. 21-27. The life of St. Nicholas is also mentioned.

<sup>31</sup> The advocates who pleaded against Jane could not add nothing to the blackening and levelling of her character, which Petrarch, in his introduction, has already done. His introduction is a very curious and interesting piece, and is a very good specimen of the style of the time. It is a very good specimen of the style of the time. It is a very good specimen of the style of the time.

were insensibly tinctured with the adjacent vices; justice with cruelty, liberality with profusion, and the desire of fame with puerile and ostentatious vanity. He might have learned, that the ancient tribunes, so strong and sacred in the public opinion, were not distinguished in style, habit, or appearance, from an ordinary plebeian;<sup>33</sup> and that as often as they visited the city on foot, a single viator, or beadle, attended the exercise of their office. The Gracchi would have frowned or smiled, could they have read the sonorous titles and epithets of their successor, "NICHOLAS, SEVERE AND MERCITLESS; DELIVERER OF ROME; DEFENDER OF ITALY;<sup>34</sup> FRIEND OF MANKIND, AND OF LIBERTY, PEACE, AND JUSTICE; TRIBUTE AUGUST;" his theatrical pageants had prepared the revolution; but Rienzi abused, in luxury and pride, the political maxim of speaking to the eyes, as well as the understanding, of the multitude. From nature he had received the gift of an handsome person,<sup>35</sup> till it was swelled and disfigured by intemperance; and his propensity to laughter was corrected in the magistrate by the affectation of gravity and sternness. He was clothed, at least on public occasions, in a party-coloured robe of velvet or satin, lined with fur, and embroidered with gold: the rod of justice, which he carried in his hand, was a sceptre of polished steel, crowned with a globe and cross of gold, and inclosing a small fragment of the true and holy wood. In his civil and religious processions through the city, he rode on a white steed, the symbol of royalty: the great banner of the republic, a sun with a circle of stars, a dove with an olive branch, was displayed over his head; a shower of gold and silver was scattered among the populace; fifty guards with halberds encompassed his person; a troop of horse preceded his march; and their tymbals and trumpets were of massy silver.

The ambition of the honours of his chivalry<sup>36</sup> betrayed the meanness of his birth, and degraded the importance of his office; and the equestrian tribune was not less odious to the nobles, whom he adopted, than to the plebeians, whom he deserted. All that yet remained of treasure, or luxury, or art, was exhausted on that solemn day. Rienzi led the procession from the Capitol to the Lateran; the tediousness of the way was relieved with decorations and games; the ecclesiastical, civil, and military orders marched under their various banners; the Roman ladies attended his wife; and the ambassadors of Italy might loudly applaud, or secretly deride, the novelty of the pomp. In the evening, when they had reached the church and palace of Constantine, he thanked and dismissed the numerous assembly, with an invitation to the festival of the ensuing day. From the hands of a venerable knight he received the order of the Holy Ghost; the purification of the bath was a previous ceremony: but in no step of his life did Rienzi excite such scandal and censure as by the profane use of the porphyry vase, in which Constantine (a foolish legend) had been healed of his leprosy by pope Sylvester.<sup>37</sup> With equal presumption the tribune watched or reposed within the consecrated precincts of the baptistery; and the failure of his state-bed was interpreted as an omen of his approaching downfall. At the hour of worship, he showed himself to the returning crowds in a majestic attitude, with a robe of purple, his sword, and gilt spurs; but the holy rites were soon interrupted by his levity and insolence. Rising from his throne, and advancing towards the congregation, he proclaimed in a loud voice: "We summon to our tribunal pope Clement; and command him to reside in his diocese of Rome: we also summon the sacred college of cardinals.<sup>38</sup> We again summon the two pretenders, Charles of Bohemia and Lewis of Bavaria, who style themselves emperors: we likewise summon all the electors of Germany, to inform us on what pretence they have usurped the inalienable right of the Roman people, the ancient and lawful sovereigns of the empire."<sup>39</sup> Unsleathing his maiden sword, he thrice brandished it to the three parts of the world, and thrice repeated the extravagant declaration, "And this too is mine!" The pope's vicar, the bishop of Orvieto, attempted to check this career of folly; but his feeble protest was silenced by martial music; and instead of withdrawing from the assembly, he consented to dine with his brother tribune, at a table which had hitherto been reserved for the supreme pontiff. A banquet, such as the Cæsars had given, was prepared for the Romans. The apartments, porticoes, and courts, of the Lateran were spread with innumerable tables for either sex, and every condition; a stream of wine flowed from the nostrils of Constantine's brazen horse; no complaint, except of the scarcity of water, could be heard; and the licentiousness of the multitude was curbed by discipline and fear. A subsequent day was appointed for the coronation of Rienzi;<sup>40</sup> seven crowns of different leaves or metals were successively placed on his head by the most eminent of the Roman was of rose-water, their beds were decked with royal magnificence, and they were served at St. Mark's of Anagni in the Capitol, by the twenty-eight boni homines. They afterwards received from Robert king of Naples the sword of chivalry (Hist. Rom. Lib. 2. p. 250).

<sup>37</sup> All nations believed in the leprosy and bath of Constantine (Pet. trach. Epist. Famil. 2. 2.), and Rienzi justified his own conduct by observing to the court of Avignon, that a vase which had been used by a Pagan could not be profaned by a pious Christian. Yet this error is specified in the bull of excommunication (Hocemus, apud du Cerceau, p. 199, 190).

<sup>38</sup> These verbal summons of pope Clement VI., which rests on the authority of the Roman historians and a Vatican MS., is quoted by the biographer of Petrarch (rom. in. not. p. 761-76) with arguments rather of decency than of weight. The court of Avignon might not choose to agitate this delicate question.

<sup>33</sup> In his Roman Questions, Plutarch (Opuscul. tom. 1. p. 505, 506, edit. Grot. Hen. Steph. states, on the most constitutional principles, the simple greatness of the tribunes, who were not properly magistrates, but a kind of mediocrity. It was their duty and interest to maintain the equality of the people. In the second reign, when he is painted almost as a monster, Rienzi travesa una cattedra (tom. 1. v. 100), a modo de uno Abate Asiano, or Asinario (Ibid. c. 15. p. 525).

<sup>34</sup> In the year 1327, two barons, a Colonna and an Arimino, the usual balance, were created knights by the Roman people: their birth clergy; they represented the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost; and he still professed to imitate the example of the ancient tribunes. These extraordinary spectacles might deceive or flatter the people; and their own vanity was gratified in the vanity of their leader. But in his private life he soon deviated from the strict rule of frugality and abstinence; and the plebeians, who were awed by the splendour of the nobles, were provoked by the luxury of their equal. His wife, his son, his uncle (a barber in name and profession), exposed the contrast of vulgar manners and princely expense. and without acquiring the majesty, Rienzi degenerated into the vices, of a king.

Fear and hatred of the nobles of Rome.

A simple citizen describes with pity, or perhaps with pleasure, the humiliation of the barons of Rome. "Bareheaded, their hands crossed on their breast, they stood with downcast looks in the presence of the tribune; and they trembled, 'good God, how they trembled!'"<sup>41</sup> As long as the yoke of Rienzi was that of justice and their country, their conscience forced them to esteem the man, whom pride and interest provoked them to hate: his extravagant conduct soon fortified their hatred by contempt; and they conceived the hope of subverting a power which was no longer so deeply rooted in the public confidence. The old animosity of the Colonna and Ursini was suspended for a moment by their common disgrace: they associated their wishes, and perhaps their designs; an assassin was seized and tortured; he accused the nobles; and as soon as Rienzi deserved the fate, he adopted the suspicions and maxims, of a tyrant. On the same day, under various pretences, he invited to the Capitol his principal enemies, among whom were five members of the Ursini and three of the Colonna name. But instead of a council or a banquet, they found themselves prisoners under the sword of despotism or justice; and the consciousness of innocence or guilt might inspire them with equal apprehensions of danger. At the sound of the great bell the people assembled; they were arraigned for a conspiracy against the tribune's life; and though some might sympathise in their distress, not a hand, nor a voice, was raised to rescue the first of the nobility from their impending doom. Their apparent boldness was prompted by despair; they passed in separate chambers a sleepless and painful night; and the venerable hero, Stephen Colonna, striking against the door of his prison, repeatedly urged his guards to deliver him, by a speedy death, from such ignominious servitude. In the morning they understood their sentence from the visit of a confessor and the tolling of the bell. The great hall of the Capitol had been decorated for the bloody scene with red and white hangings: the countenance of the tribune was dark and severe; the swords of the executioners were unsheathed; and the barons were interrupted in their dying speeches by the sound of trumpets. But in this decisive moment,

Rienzi was not less anxious or apprehensive than his captives: he decried the splendour of their names, their surviving kinsmen, the inconsistency of the people, the reproaches of the world, and, after rashly offering a mortal injury, he vainly presumed that, if he could forgive, he might himself be forgiven. His elaborate oration was that of a Christian and a suppliant; and, as the humble minister of the commons, he entreated his masters to pardon these noble criminals, for whose repentance and future service he pledged his faith and authority. "If 'you are spared,'" said the tribune, "by the 'mercy of the Romans, will you not promise 'to support the good estate with your lives and 'fortunes?' Astonished by this marvellous clemency, the barons bowed their heads; and while they devoutly repeated the oath of allegiance, might whisper a secret, and more sincere, assurance of revenge. A priest, in the name of the people, pronounced their absolution: they received the communion with the tribune, assisted at the banquet, followed the procession; and, after every spiritual and temporal sign of reconciliation, were dismissed in safety to their respective homes, with the new honours and titles of generals, consuls, and patricians.<sup>42</sup>

During some weeks they were checked by the memory of their danger, rather than of their deliverance, till the most powerful of the Ursini, escaping with the Colonna from the city, erected at Marino the standard of rebellion. The fortifications of the castle were hastily restored; the vassals attended their lord; the outlaws armed against the magistrate; the flocks and herds, the harvests and vineyards, from Marino to the gates of Rome, were swept away or destroyed; and the people arraigned Rienzi as the author of the calamities which his government had taught them to forget. In the camp, Rienzi appeared to less advantage than in the rostrum; and he neglected the progress of the rebel barons till their numbers were strong, and their castles impregnable. From the pages of Livy, he had not imbibed the art, or even the courage, of a general: an army of twenty thousand Romans returned without honour or effect from the attack of Marino: and his vengeance was amused by painting his enemies (their heads downwards, and drowning two dogs (at least they should have been bears) as the representatives of the Ursini. The belief of his incapacity encouraged their operations: they were invited by their secret adherents; and the barons attempted, with four thousand foot and sixteen hundred horse, to enter Rome by force or surprise. The city was prepared for their reception: the alarm-bell rung all night; the gates were strictly guarded, or insolently open; and after some hesitation they sounded a retreat. The two first divisions had passed along the walls, but the prospect of a free entrance tempted the head-strong valour of the nobles in the rear; and after a successful skirmish, they were overthrown and massacred

<sup>41</sup> Paus. describes a scene of similar order, but in a different place, and at a different time. He says that the nobles of Rome were arraigned before the tribune, and that they were executed by the sword. He also mentions the same scene.

<sup>42</sup> Paus. describes a scene of similar order, but in a different place, and at a different time. He says that the nobles of Rome were arraigned before the tribune, and that they were executed by the sword. He also mentions the same scene.

the bell of the Capitol was again tolled, the nobles in arms trembled in the presence of an unarmed multitude; and of the two senators, Colonna escaped from the window of the palace, and Ursini was stoned at the foot of the altar. The dangerous office of tribune was successively occupied by two plebeians, Cerroni and Baroncelli. The mildness of Cerroni was unequal to the times; and after a faint struggle, he retired with a fair reputation and a decent fortune to the comforts of rural life. Devoid of eloquence or genius, Baroncelli was distinguished by a resolute spirit: he spoke the language of a patriot, and trod in the footsteps of tyrants; his suspicion was a sentence of death, and his own death was the reward of his cruelties. Amidst the public misfortunes, the faults of Rienzi were forgotten; and the Romans sighed for the peace and prosperity of the good estate.<sup>50</sup>

Adventures of Rienzi. After an exile of seven years, the first deliverer was again restored to his country. In the disguise of a monk or a pilgrim, he escaped from the castle of St. Angelo, implored the friendship of the king of Hungary at Naples, tempted the ambition of every bold adventurer, mingled at Rome with the pilgrims of the jubilee, lay concealed among the hermits of the Apennine, and wandered through the cities of Italy, Germany, and Bohemia. His person was invisible, his name was yet formidable; and the anxiety of the court of Avignon supposes, and even magnifies, his personal merit. The emperor Charles the Fourth gave audience to a stranger, who frankly revealed himself as the tribune of the republic; and astonished an assembly of ambassadors and princes, by the eloquence of a patriot and the visions of a prophet, the downfall of tyranny and the kingdom of the Holy Ghost.<sup>51</sup> Whatever had been his hopes, Rienzi found himself a captive; but he supported a character of independence and dignity, and obeyed, as his own choice, the irresistible summons of the supreme pontiff. The zeal of Petrarch, which had been cooled by the unworthy conduct, was rekindled by the sufferings and the presence, of his friend; and he boldly complains of the times, in which the saviour of Rome was delivered by her emperor into the hands of her bishop. Rienzi

A prisoner at Avignon.
A. D. 1351.

was transported slowly, but in safe custody, from Prague to Avignon: his entrance into the city was that of a malefactor; in his prison he was chained by the leg; and four cardinals were named to enquire into the crimes of heresy and rebellion. But his trial and condemnation would have involved some questions, which it was more prudent to leave under the veil of mystery: the temporal supremacy of the popes; the duty of residence; the civil and ecclesiastical privileges of the clergy and people of Rome. The reigning pontiff well deserved the appellation of Clement: the strange vicissitudes and magnanimous spirit of the captive excited his pity and esteem; and Petrarch believes that he respected in the hero the name and sacred character of a poet.<sup>52</sup> Rienzi was indulged with an easy confinement and the use of books; and in the assiduous study of Livy and the Bible, he sought the cause and the consolation of his misfortunes.

The succeeding pontificate of Innocent the Sixth opened a new prospect of his deliverance and restoration; and the court of Avignon was persuaded, that the successful rebel could alone appease and reform the anarchy of the metropolis. After a solemn profession of fidelity, the Roman tribune was sent into Italy, with the title of senator; but the death of Baroncelli appeared to supersede the use of his mission; and the legate, cardinal Alborno, a consummate statesman, allowed him with reluctance, and without aid, to undertake the perilous experiment. His first reception was equal to his wishes: the day of his entrance was a public festival; and his eloquence and authority revived the laws of the good estate. But this momentary sunshine was soon clouded by his own vices and those of the people: in the Capitol, he might often regret the prison of Avignon; and after a second administration of four months, Rienzi was massacred in a tumult which had been fomented by the Roman barons. In the society of the Germans and Bohemians, he is said to have contracted the habits of intemperance and cruelty: adversity had chilled his enthusiasm, without fortifying his reason or virtue; and that youthful hope, that lively assurance, which is the pledge of success, was now succeeded by the cold impotence of distrust and despair. The tribune had reigned with absolute dominion, by the choice, and in the hearts, of the Romans: the senator was the servile minister of a foreign court; and while he was suspected by the people, he was abandoned by the prince. The legate Alborno, who seemed desirous of his ruin, inflexibly refused all supplies of men and money; a faithful subject could no longer presume to touch the revenues of the apostolical chamber; and the first idea of a tax was the signal of clamour and sedition. Even his justice was tainted with the guilt or reproach of selfish cruelty: the most virtuous citizen of Rome was sacrificed to his jealousy; and in the execution of a public robber, from whose purse he had been assisted, the magistrate too much forgot, or too much remembered, the obligations of the debtor.<sup>53</sup> A civil war exhausted his treasures, and the patience of the city: the Colonna maintained their hostile station at Palestrina; and his mercenaries soon despised a leader whose ignorance

Rienzi, senator
of Rome.
A. D. 1351.

<sup>50</sup> The troubles of Rome, from the departure to the return of Rienzi, are related by Matteo Villani in l. vi. c. 13. p. 78. and l. vii. c. 1. p. 81.

<sup>51</sup> Petrarch's letter to Charles the Fourth, in which he describes the appearance of Rienzi, is in the original Latin, in the edition of the works of Petrarch, l. vi. c. 1. p. 131. and in the French translation, l. vi. c. 1. p. 131. and in the French translation, l. vi. c. 1. p. 131.

<sup>52</sup> Petrarch's letter to Charles the Fourth, in which he describes the appearance of Rienzi, is in the original Latin, in the edition of the works of Petrarch, l. vi. c. 1. p. 131. and in the French translation, l. vi. c. 1. p. 131. and in the French translation, l. vi. c. 1. p. 131.

and fear were envious of all subordinate merit. In the death as in the life of Rienzi, the hero and the coward were strangely mingled. When the Capitol was invested by a furious multitude, when he was basely deserted by his civil and military servants, the intrepid senator, waving the banner of liberty, presented himself on the balcony, addressed his eloquence to the various passions of the Romans, and laboured to persuade them, that in the same cause himself and the republic must either stand or fall. His oration was interrupted by a volley of imprecations and stones; and after an arrow had transpierced his hand, he sunk into abject despair, and fled weeping to the inner chambers, from whence he was let down by a sheet before the windows of the prison. Destitute of aid or hope, he was besieged till the evening: the doors of the Capitol were destroyed with axes and fire; and while the senator attempted to escape in a plebeian habit, he was discovered and dragged to the platform of the palace, the fatal scene of his judgments and executions. A whole hour, without voice or motion, he stood amidst the multitude half naked and half dead; their rage was hushed into curiosity and wonder: the last feelings of reverence and compassion yet struggled in his favour; and they might have prevailed, if a bold assassin had not plunged a dagger in his breast. He fell senseless with the first stroke; the impatient revenge of his enemies inflicted a thousand wounds; and the senator's body was abandoned to the dogs, to the Jews, and to the flames. Posterity will compare the virtues and failings of this extraordinary man; but in a long period of anarchy and servitude, the name of Rienzi has often been celebrated as the deliverer of his country, and the last of the Roman patriots.<sup>55</sup>

His death.
A. D. 1354,
Sept. 8.

Petrarch invites and implores the emperor to restore a free republic; but after the exile and death of his plebeian hero, he turned his eyes from the tribune, to the king, of the Romans. The Capitol was yet stained with the blood of Rienzi, when Charles the Fourth descended from the Alps to obtain the Italian and Imperial crowns. In his passage through Milan he received the visit, and repaid the flattery, of the poet Laureat; accepted a medal of Augustus; and promised, without a smile, to imitate the founder of the Roman monarchy. A false application of the names and maxims of antiquity was the source of the hopes and disappointments of Petrarch; yet he could not overlook the difference of times and characters; the immeasurable distance between the first Cæsars and a Bohemian prince, who by the favour of the clergy had been elected the titular head of the German aristocracy. Instead of restoring to Rome her glory and her provinces, he had bound himself, by a secret treaty with the pope, to evacuate the city on the day of his coronation; and his shameful retreat was pursued by the reproaches of the patriot bard.<sup>56</sup>

After the loss of liberty and empire, his third and more humble wish, was to reconcile the shepherd with his flock; to recal the Roman bishop to his ancient and peculiar diocese. In the fervour of youth, with the authority of age, Petrarch addressed his exhortations to five successive popes, and his eloquence was always inspired by the enthusiasm of sentiment and the freedom of language.<sup>57</sup> The son of a citizen of Florence invariably preferred the country of his birth to that of his education; and Italy, in his eyes, was the queen and garden of the world. Amidst her domestic factions, she was doubtless superior to France both in art and science, in wealth and politeness; but the difference could scarcely support the epithet of barbarous, which he promiscuously bestows on the countries beyond the Alps. Avignon, the mystic Babylon, the sink of vice and corruption, was the object of his hatred and contempt; but he forgets that her scandalous vices were not the growth of the soil, and that in every residence they would adhere to the power and luxury of the papal court. He confesses, that the successor of St. Peter is the bi-shop of the universal church; yet it was not on the banks of the Rhône, but of the Tyber, that the apostle had fixed his everlasting throne: and while every city in the Christian world was blessed with a bishop, the metropolis alone was desolate and forlorn. Since the removal of the Holy See, the sacred buildings of the Lateran and the Vatican, their altars and their saints, were left in a state of poverty and decay; and Rome was often painted under the image of a disconsolate matron, as if the wandering husband could be reclaimed by the homely portrait of the age and infirmities of his weeping spouse.<sup>58</sup> But the cloud which hung over the seven hills, would be dispelled by the presence of their lawful sovereign: eternal fame, the prosperity of Rome, and the peace of Italy, would be the recompence of the pope who should dare to embrace this generous resolution. Of the five whom Petrarch exhorted, the three first, John the Twenty-second, Benedict the Twelfth, and Clement the Sixth, were imperturbed or amused by the boldness of the orator; but the memorable change which had been attempted by Urban the Fifth, was finally accomplished by Gregory the Eleventh. The execution of their design was opposed by weighty and almost insuperable obstacles. A king of France, who has deserved the epithet of Wise, was unwilling to release them from a local dependence: the cardinals, for the most part his subjects, were attached to the language, manners, and climate, of Avignon; to their stately

He solicits the popes of Avignon to fix their residence at Rome.

<sup>55</sup> The exile, second government, and death of Rienzi, are minutely related by the anon. ignot. Roman, who appears next to his friend nor his enemy, ii. p. 12—15. Petrarch, who loved the triumph, was indifferent to the fate of the triumph.

<sup>56</sup> The hopes and the disappointment of Petrarch are agreeably described in his own words, by the French biographer of Clement, tom. ii. p. 375—385; but the story, though severe, want it, was the coronation of Zuani: the poet lived in the reign of Urban.

<sup>57</sup> See in his accurate and amusing description, the importance of Petrarch and Rome to Benedict XII. in the year 1364 (Mémoires, tome ix. p. 261—262), to Clement VI. in 1312 (tom. x. p. 40—47), and to Urban V. in 1366 (tom. iii. p. 677—691). his praise (p. 711—715) and excuse (p. 711) of the last of these pontiffs. His anxiety, tom. ii. p. 375—385, for the re-erecting merits of France and Italy may be found tom. p. 108—109.

<sup>58</sup> Scarcely a single word, for us, made true could be found, in the history of the French biographer of Clement. The French biographer of Clement VI. in 1312 (tom. x. p. 40—47),

He is not less anxious to see a cause of union. The Apostles to Urban V. in 1366 (tom. iii. p. 677—691) and persuasive (Simulium, i. p. 111—112). The apostle i. p. 111—112.

palaces; above all, to the wines of Burgundy.

In their eyes, Italy was foreign or hostile; and they reluctantly embarked at Marseilles, as if they had been sold or banished into the land of the Saracens. Urban the Fifth resided three years in the Vatican with safety and honour: his sanctity was protected by a guard of two thousand horse; and the king of Cyprus, the queen of Naples, and the emperors of the East and West, devoutly saluted their common father in the chair of St. Peter. But the joy of Petrarch and the Italians was soon turned into grief and indignation. Some reasons of public or private moment, his own impatience or the prayers of the cardinals, recalled Urban to France; and the approaching election was saved from the tyrannic patriotism of the Romans. The powers of Heaven were interested in their cause: Bridget of Sweden, a saint and pilgrim, disapproved the return, and foretold the death, of Urban the Fifth: the migration of Gregory the Eleventh was encouraged by St. Catherine of Sienna, the spouse of Christ and ambassadress of the Florentines; and the popes themselves, the great masters of human credulity, appear to have listened to these visionary females.<sup>59</sup> Yet those celestial admonitions were supported by some arguments of temporal policy. The residence of Avignon had been invaded by hostile violence: at the head of thirty thousand robbers, an hero had extorted ransom and absolution from the vicar of Christ and the sacred college; and the maxim of the French warriors, to spare the people and plunder the church, was a new heresy of the most dangerous import.<sup>60</sup> While the pope was driven from Avignon, he was strenuously invited to Rome. The senate and people acknowledged him as their lawful sovereign, and laid at his feet the keys of the gates, the bridges, and the fortresses; of the quarter at least beyond the Tyber.<sup>61</sup> But this loyal offer was accompanied by a declaration, that they could no longer suffer the scandal and calamity of his absence; and that his obstinacy would finally provoke them to revive and assert the primitive right of election. The abbot of Mount Cassin had been consulted, whether he would accept the triple crown<sup>62</sup> from the clergy and people: "I am a citizen of Rome,"<sup>63</sup> replied that venerable ecclesiastic, "and my list law is the voice of my country."<sup>64</sup>

Final return of Gregory XI. A.D. 1377, Jan. 17.

If superstition will interpret an untimely death;<sup>65</sup> if the merit of counsels be judged from the event; the heavens may seem to frown on a measure of such apparent reason and propriety. Gregory the Eleventh did not survive above fourteen months his return to the Vatican; and his decease was followed by the great schism of the West, which distracted the Latin church above forty years. The sacred college was then composed of twenty-two cardinals: six of these had remained at Avignon; eleven Frenchmen, one Spaniard, and four Italians, entered the conclave in the usual form. Their choice was not yet limited to the purple; and their unanimous votes acquiesced in the archbishop of Bari, a subject of Naples, conspicuous for his zeal and learning, who ascended the throne of St. Peter under the name of Urban the Sixth. The epistle of the sacred college affirms his free, and regular, election; which had been inspired, as usual, by the Holy Ghost: he was adored, invested, and crowned, with the customary rites; his temporal authority was obeyed at Rome and Avignon, and his ecclesiastical supremacy was acknowledged in the Latin world. During several weeks, the cardinals attended their new master with the fairest professions of attachment and loyalty; till the summer heats permitted a decent escape from the city. But as soon as they were united at Anagni and Fondi, in a place of security, they cast aside the mask, accused their own falsehood and hypocrisy, excommunicated the apostate and antichrist of Rome, and proceeded to a new election of Robert of Geneva, Clement the Seventh, whom they announced to the nations as the true and rightful vicar of Christ. Their first choice, an involuntary and illegal act, was annulled by the fear of death and the menaces of the Romans; and their complaint is justified by the strong evidence of probability and fact. The twelve French cardinals, above two thirds of the votes, were masters of the election; and whatever might be their provincial jealousies, it cannot fairly be presumed that they would have sacrificed their right and interest to a foreign candidate, who would never restore them to their native country. In the various, and often inconsistent, narratives,<sup>66</sup> the shades of popular violence are more darkly or faintly coloured; but the licentiousness of the seditious Romans was inflamed by a sense of their privileges, and

His death. A.D. 1378, March 27.

Election of Urban VI. April 9.

Election of Clement VII. Sept. 21.

<sup>59</sup> I have not leisure to expatiate on the legends of St. Bridget or St. Catherine, the list of which might furnish some amusing scenes. Their effect on the mind of Gregory XI. is attested by the list of his words at his last moments. See the original in the Vatican library, fol. 100, v. 100, p. 100.

<sup>60</sup> The three states of the church are represented by the three crowns. It was introduced by John XXII. or Benedict XIII. Measures of Petrarch, tom. p. 288, 289.

<sup>61</sup> See the original in the Vatican library, fol. 100, v. 100, p. 100.

sadors, and the resignation of the abbot of Mount Cassin, qui, ultra offere, respondit se civem Romanum esse, et non velle quod ipse vellet.

<sup>62</sup> The words of the pope from Avignon to Rome, and their reception by the people, are related in the original lives of Urban V. and Gregory XI. in the Vatican library. See the original in the Vatican library, fol. 100, v. 100, p. 100.

<sup>63</sup> See the original in the Vatican library, fol. 100, v. 100, p. 100.

<sup>64</sup> See the original in the Vatican library, fol. 100, v. 100, p. 100.

<sup>65</sup> See the original in the Vatican library, fol. 100, v. 100, p. 100.

<sup>66</sup> See the original in the Vatican library, fol. 100, v. 100, p. 100.

the danger of a second emigration. The conclave was intimidated by the shouts, and encompassed by the arms, of thirty thousand rebels; the bells of the Capitol and St. Peter's rang an alarm; "Death, or an Italian pope!" was the universal cry; the same threat was repeated by the twelve bannerets or chiefs of the quarters, in the form of charitable advice; some preparations were made for burning the obstinate cardinals; and had they chosen a Transalpine subject, it is probable that they would never have departed alive from the Vatican. The same constraint imposed the necessity of dissembling in the eyes of Rome and of the world: the pride and cruelty of Urban presented a more inevitable danger; and they soon discovered the features of the tyrant, who could walk in his garden and recite his breviary, while he heard from an adjacent chamber six cardinals groaning on the rack. His inflexible zeal, which loudly censured their luxury and vice, would have attached them to the stations and duties of their parishes at Rome; and had he not fatally delayed a new promotion, the French cardinals would have been reduced to an helpless minority in the sacred college. For these reasons, and in the hope of repassing the Alps, they rashly violated the peace and unity of the church, and the merits of their double choice are yet agitated in the Catholic schools.<sup>67</sup> The vanity rather than the interest of the nation determined the court and clergy of France.<sup>68</sup> The states of Savoy, Sicily, Cyprus, Arragon, Castile, Navarre, and Scotland, were inclined by their example and authority to the obedience of Clement the Seventh, and, after his decease, of Benedict the Thirteenth. Rome and the principal states of Italy, Germany, Portugal, England,<sup>69</sup> the Low Countries, and the kingdoms of the North, adhered to the prior election of Urban the Sixth, who was succeeded by Boniface the Ninth, Innocent the Seventh, and Gregory the Twelfth.

From the banks of the Tyber and the Rhône, the hostile pontiffs encountered each other with the pen and the sword: the civil and ecclesiastical order of society was disturbed, and the Romans had their full share of the mischief of which they may be arraigned as the primary authors.<sup>70</sup>

They had vainly flattered themselves with the hope of restoring the seat of the ecclesiastical monarchy, and of relieving their poverty with the tributes and offerings of the nations; but the separation of France and Spain diverted the stream of lucrative devotion; nor could the loss be compensated by the two jubilees which were crowded into the space of ten years. By the avocations of the schism, by foreign arms, and popular tumults, Urban the Sixth and his three successors were often compelled to interrupt their residence in the Vatican. The Colonna and Ursini still exercised their deadly feuds: the bannerets of Rome asserted and abused the privileges of a republic. the vicars of Christ, who had levied a military force, chastised their rebellion with the gibbet, the sword, and the dagger; and, in a friendly conference, eleven deputies of the people were perfidiously murdered and cast into the street. Since the invasion of Robert the Norman, the Romans had pursued their domestic quarrels without the dangerous interposition of a stranger. But in the disorders of the schism, an aspiring neighbour, Ladislaus king of Naples, alternately supported and betrayed the pope and the people: by the former he was declared gonfalonier, or general, of the church, while the latter submitted to his choice the nomination of their magistrates. Besieging Rome by land and water, he thrice entered the gates as a barbarian conqueror; profaned the altars, violated the virgins, pillaged the merchants, performed his devotions at St. Peter's, and left a garrison in the castle of St. Angelo. His arms were sometimes unfortunate, and to a delay of three days he was indebted for his life and crown; but Ladislaus triumphed in his turn, and it was only his premature death that could save the metropolis and the ecclesiastical state from the ambitious conqueror who had assumed the title, or at least the powers, of king of Rome.<sup>71</sup>

I have not undertaken the ecclesiastical history of the schism; but Rome, the object of these last chapters, is deeply interested in the disputed succession of her sovereigns. The first counsels for the peace and union of Christendom arose from the university of Paris, from the faculty of the Sorbonne, whose doctors were esteemed, at least in the Gallican church, as the most consummate masters of theological science.<sup>72</sup> Prudently waving all invidious enquiry into the origin and merits of the dispute, they proposed, as an healing measure, that the two pretenders of Rome and Avignon should abdicate at the same time, after qualifying the cardinals of the adverse factions to join in a legitimate election; and that the nations should abstract <sup>73</sup> their obedience, if either of the competitors preferred his own interest to that of the public. At each vacancy, these physicians of the church deprecated the mischief of an hasty choice; but the policy of the conclave and the ambition of its members were deaf to reason and entreaties; and whatsoever promises were made, the pope could never be bound by the oaths of the cardinal. During fifteen years, the pacific designs of the university were eluded by the arts of the Negotiations for peace and union.

A.D. 1392-1407

<sup>67</sup> The external numbers of the popes seem to divide the question between Clement VII. and Benedict XIII. who in 1393 stigmatised as antipope, by the Italians, who the French are content with not recognising and refusing to attend the council of Avignon (the papal in Protestants). It is singular, or rather it is not singular, that with respect to the names of the popes, the French and the Italians are in error.

<sup>68</sup> The pure are the reasons of a moment, &c. &c.

<sup>69</sup> Besides the general historians, the Diaries of Delphinus Gentilis, &c.

Peter Antonius, and Stephen Infessura, in the great Collection of Muratori, represent the state and misfortunes of Rome.

<sup>71</sup> It is supposed by Guarnier (tom. ii. p. 242) that he styled himself Rex Rome, a title unknown to the world since the expulsion of the Romans. But a nearer inspection has justified the reading of Rex Romæ, an obscure kingdom annexed to the crown of Hungary.

<sup>72</sup> The leading and decisive part which France assumed in the schism is stated by Peter du Pless in a separate history, extracted from authentic records, and inserted in the sixth volume of the last and best edition of his friend Thuanus (part. vi. p. 110-154).

<sup>73</sup> In this measure, John a Verulam, stout doctor, was the author or the champion. The proceedings of the university of Paris and the rival pontiffs, the scruples or passions of their adherents, and the vicissitudes of French factions, that ruled the insanity of Charles the Sixth. At length a vigorous resolution was embraced; and a solemn embassy, of the titular patriarch of Alexandria, two archbishops, five bishops, five abbots, three knights, and twenty doctors, was sent to the courts of Avignon and Rome, to require, in the name of the church and king, the abdication of the two pretenders, of Peter de Luna, who styled himself Benedict the Thirteenth, and of Angelo Corrario, who assumed the name of Gregory the Twelfth. For the ancient honour of Rome, and the success of their commission, the ambassadors solicited a conference with the magistrates of the city, whom they gratified by a positive declaration, that the most Christian king did not entertain a wish of transporting the holy see from the Vatican, which he considered as the genuine and proper seat of the successor of St. Peter. In the name of the senate and people, an eloquent Roman asserted their desire to co-operate in the union of the church, explored the temporal and spiritual calamities of the long schism, and requested the protection of France against the arms of the king of Naples. The answers of Benedict and Gregory were alike edifying and alike deceitful; and, in evading the demand of their abdication, the two rivals were animated by a common spirit. They agreed on the necessity of a previous interview; but the time, the place, and the manner, could never be ascertained by mutual consent. "If the one advances," says a servant of Gregory, "the other retreats; the one appears an animal fearful of the land, the other a creature apprehensive of the water. And thus, for a short remnant of life and power, will these aged priests endanger the peace and salvation of the Christian world."<sup>74</sup>

The Christian world was at length provoked by their obstinacy and fraud; they were desisted by their cardinals, who embraced each other as friends and colleagues; and their revolt was supported by a numerous assembly of prelates and ambassadors. With equal justice, the council of Pisa deposed the popes of Rome and Avignon; the conclave was unanimous in the choice of Alexander the Fifth, and his vacant seat was soon filled by a similar election of John the Twenty-third, the most profligate of mankind. But instead of extinguishing the schism, the rashness of the French and Italians had given a third pretender to the chair of St. Peter. Such new claims of the synod and conclave were disputed: three kings, of Germany, Hungary, and Naples, adhered to the cause of Gregory the Twelfth; and Benedict the Thirteenth, himself a Spaniard, was acknowledged by the devotion and patriotism of that powerful nation. The rash proceedings of Pisa were corrected by the council of Constance; the emperor Sigismund acted a conspicuous part as the advocate or protector of the Catholic church; and the number and weight of civil and ecclesiastical members might seem to constitute the states-general of Europe. Of the three popes, John the Twenty-third was the first victim; he fled and was brought back a prisoner: the most scandalous charges were suppressed; the vicar of Christ was only accused of piracy, murder, rape, sodomy, and incest; and after subscribing his own condemnation, he expired in prison the imprudence of trusting his person to a free city beyond the Alps. Gregory the Twelfth, whose obedience was reduced to the narrow precincts of Rimini, descended with more honour from the throne, and his ambassador convened the session, in which he renounced the title and authority of lawful pope. To vanquish the obstinacy of Benedict the Thirteenth or his adherents, the emperor in person undertook a journey from Constance to Perpignan. The kings of Castile, Arragon, Navarre, and Scotland, obtained an equal and honourable treaty: with the concurrence of the Spaniards, Benedict was deposed by the council; but the harmless old man was left in a solitary castle to excommunicate twice each day the rebel kingdoms which had deserted his cause. After thus eradicating the remains of the schism, the synod of Constance proceeded with slow and cautious steps to elect the sovereign of Rome and the head of the church. On this momentous occasion, the college of twenty-three cardinals was fortified with thirty deputies; six of whom were chosen in each of the five great nations of Christendom, the Italian, the German, the French, the Spanish, and the English;<sup>75</sup> the interference of strangers was softened by their generous preference of an Italian and a Roman; and the hereditary, as well as personal, merit of Otho Colonna recommended him to the conclave. Rome accepted with joy and obedience the noblest of her sons; the ecclesiastical state was defended by his powerful family, and the elevation of Martin the Fifth is the æra of the restoration and establishment of the popes in the Vatican.<sup>76</sup>

The royal prerogative of coining money, which had been exercised near three hundred years by the senate, was first resumed by Martin the Fifth,<sup>77</sup> and his image nation, with an equal vote, and every argument of truth or force was introduced to exalt the dignity of their country. Including England, Scotland, Wales, the four kingdoms of Ireland, and the Orkneys, the British islands are decorated with eight royal seats. Lent in his mentioned in four of the legations. En. lib. vi. Welsh, Gual. lib. vi. Sec. 1, 2, 3, 4. The greater island from north to south measures 300 miles, or forty sea points, and England alone contains thirty-two powers of the two primates, without forgetting the testimony of the testimony of Glanville (A. D. 1350), who reckons only four Christian kingdoms, 1. of Rome, 2. of Constantinople, 3. of Ireland, which had been transferred to the English monarchy, and, 4. of Spain. Our countrymen prevailed in the council, but the victories of Henry V.

<sup>74</sup> Leonardus Brunius Arretinus, one of the revivers of classic learning in Italy, who, after serving many years as secretary in the Roman court, retired to the honourable office of chancellor of the republic of Florence (Fabric. Biblioth. Medic. Univ. tom. i. p. 219). Lent in his given the version of this curious epistle (Concile de Pise, tom. i. p. 192—195).

The adverse pleadings were full, and assailed from Henry of England printed in 1542 at more correctly published in 1614 have only seen Letart's edition, 1614, 1617, &c.

<sup>75</sup> The histories of the three successive councils of Constance, Basle, and Trent, have been written with a plenitude of detail, and are, in fact, the same, by a French historian, M. Letart, who re-edited the French edition. The French edition is in two volumes, and a third is in the press. Constance, 1614, 1617, &c. <sup>76</sup> The second of the three successive councils of Constance, and the first of the three successive councils of the See of Rome, the first of the three successive checked by wise and jealous precautions: except the magistrates, none could propose a question; none were permitted to speak, except from an open pulpit or tribunal; all disorderly acclamations were suppressed; the sense of the majority was decided by a secret ballot; and their decrees were promulgated in the venerable name of the Roman senate and people. It would not be easy to assign a period in which this theory of government has been reduced to accurate and constant practice, since the establishment of order has been gradually connected with the decay of liberty. But in the year one thousand five hundred and eighty, the ancient statutes were collected, methodised in three books, and adapted to present use, under the pontificate, and with the approbation, of Gregory the Thirteenth:<sup>83</sup> this civil and criminal code is the modern law of the city; and, if the popular assemblies have been abolished, a foreign senator, with the three conservators, still resides in the palace of the Capitol.<sup>84</sup> The policy of the Cæsars has been repeated by the popes; and the bishop of Rome affected to maintain the form of a republic, while he reigned with the absolute powers of a temporal, as well as spiritual, monarch.

It is an obvious truth, that the times must be suited to extraordinary characters, and that the genius of Cromwell or Retz might now expire in obscurity. The political enthusiasm of Rienzi had exalted him to a throne; the same enthusiasm, in the next century, conducted his imitator to the gallows. The birth of Stephen Porcaro was noble, his reputation spotless; his tongue was armed with eloquence, his mind was enlightened with learning; and he aspired, beyond the aim of vulgar ambition, to free his country and immortalise his name. The dominion of priests is most odious to a liberal spirit: every scruple was removed by the recent knowledge of the fable and forgery of Constantine's donation; Petrarch was now the oracle of the Italians; and as often as Porcaro revolved the ode which describes the patriot and hero of Rome, he applied to himself the visions of the prophetic bard. His first trial of the popular feelings was at the funeral of Eugenius the Fourth: in an elaborate speech he called the Romans to liberty and arms; and they listened with apparent pleasure, till Porcaro was interrupted and answered by a grave advocate, who pleaded for the church and state. By every law the seditious orator was guilty of treason; but the benevolence of the new pontiff, who viewed his character with pity and esteem, attempted by an honourable office to convert the patriot into a friend. The inflexible Roman returned from Anagni with an increase of reputation and zeal; and, on the first opportunity, the games of the Place Navona, he tried to inflame the casual dispute of some boys and mechanics into a general rising of the people. Yet the humane Nicholas was still averse to accept the folk-tit of his life; and the traitor was removed from the scene of temptation to Bologna, with a liberal allowance for his support, and the easy obligation of presenting himself each day before the governor of the city. But Porcario had learned from the younger Brutus, that with tyrants no faith or gratitude should be observed: the exile declaimed against the arbitrary sentence; a party and a conspiracy were gradually formed; his nephew, a daring youth, assembled a band of volunteers; and on the appointed evening a feast was prepared at his house for the friends of the republic. Their leader, who had escaped from Bologna, appeared among them in a robe of purple and gold: his voice, his countenance, his gestures, bespoke the man who had devoted his life or death to the glorious cause. In a studied oration, he expatiated on the motives and the means of their enterprise: the name and liberties of Rome; the sloth and pride of their ecclesiastical tyrants; the active or passive consent of their fellow-citizens; three hundred soldiers, and four hundred exiles, long exercised in arms or in wrongs; the licence of revenge to edge their swords, and a million of ducats to reward their victory. It would be easy (he said), on the next day, the festival of the Epiphany, to seize the pope and his cardinals, before the doors, or at the altar, of St. Peter's; to lead them in chains under the walls of St. Angelo; to extort by the threat of their instant death a surrender of the castle; to ascend the vacant Capitol; to ring the alarm-bell; and to restore in a popular assembly the ancient republic of Rome. While he triumphed, he was already betrayed. The senator, with a strong guard, invested the house: the nephew of Porcario cut his way through the crowd; but the unfortunate Stephen was drawn from a chest, lamenting that his enemies had anticipated by three hours the execution of his design. After such manifest and repeated guilt, even the mercy of Nicholas was silent. Porcario, and nine of his accomplices, were hanged without the benefit of the sacraments; and amidst the fears and invectives of the papal court, the Romans pitied, and almost applauded, these martyrs of their country.<sup>85</sup> But their applause was mute, their pity ineffectual, their liberty for ever extinct; and, if they have since risen in a vacancy of the throne or a scarcity of bread, such accidental tumults may be found in the bosom of the most abject servitude.

But the independence of the nobles, which was tormented by discord, survived the freedom of the commons, which must be founded in union. A privilege of rapine and oppression was long maintained by the barons of Rome ; their houses were a fortress and a sanctuary ; and the heroes

83 Statuta alia Urbis Romæ Auctoritate S. D. N. Gregoriæ XIII. Pont. Max. a Senatu Populoque Romano reformata et edita Romæ, 1580, in folio. The obsolete, repugnant statutes of antiquity were collected in five books, and Lucas Petrus, a lawyer and antiquarian, regretted the 85 Besides the curious though concise narrative of Malavelle's travels, Fortunio (1846) and Il Mazzo (1847) by the latter, the Fortunio can only be added to the Diary of Stephen Lukomoro (1848) and Il Mazzo (1847) as the only significant Italian-Bantu texts. The latter two, however, are not only in Italian but also in the form of a diary, and so they are not included in this study. The Fortunio is the only text which is not a translation of a Bantu text, but rather a narrative of the author's own experiences. It is a very interesting text, and it is the only one of its kind in the Italian-Bantu literature. It is a very interesting text, and it is the only one of its kind in the Italian-Bantu literature.

creator and the conservator is implied, rather than affirmed by the statutes.

cious train of banditti and criminals whom they protected from the law, repaid the hospitality with the service of their swords and daggers. The private interest of the pontiffs, or their nephews, sometimes involved them in these domestic feuds. Under the reign of Sixtus the Fourth, Rome was distracted by the battles and sieges of the rival houses: after the conflagration of his palace, the protonotary Colonna was tortured and beheaded; and Savelli, his captive friend, was murdered on the spot, for refusing to join in the acclamations of the victorious Ursini.<sup>56</sup> But the popes no longer trembled in the Vatican: they had strength to command, if they had resolution to claim, the obedience of their subjects; and the strangers, who observed these partial disorders, admired the easy taxes and wise administration of the ecclesiastical state.<sup>57</sup>

The spiritual thunders of the Vatican depend on the force of opinion; and if that opinion be absolute dominion of Rome. A. D. 1509, &c. supplanted by reason or passion, the sound may idly waste itself in the air; and the helpless priest is exposed to the brutal violence of a noble or a plebeian adversary. But after their return from Avignon, the keys of St. Peter were guarded by the sword of St. Paul. Rome was commanded by an impregnable citadel: the use of cannon is a powerful engine against popular seditions: a regular force of cavalry and infantry was enlisted under the banners of the pope: his ample revenues supplied the resources of war; and, from the extent of his domain, he could bring down on a rebellious city an army of hostile neighbours and loyal subjects.<sup>58</sup> Since the union of the duchies of Ferrara and Urbino, the ecclesiastical state extends from the Mediterranean to the Adriatic, and from the confines of Naples to the banks of the Po; and as early as the sixteenth century, the greater part of that spacious and fruitful country acknowledged the lawful claims and temporal sovereignty of the Roman pontiffs. Their claims were readily deduced from the genuine, or fabulous, donations of the darker ages: the successive steps of their final settlement would engage us too far in the transactions of Italy, and even of Europe; the crimes of Alexander the Sixth, the martial operations of Julius the Second, and the liberal policy of Leo the Tenth, a theme which has been adorned by the pens of the noblest historians of the times.<sup>59</sup> In the first period of their conquests, till the expedition of Charles the Eighth, the popes might successfully wrestle with the adjacent princes and states, whose military force was equal, or inferior, to their own. But as soon as the monarchs of France, Germany, and Spain, contended with gigantic arms for the dominion of Italy, they supplied with art the deficiency of strength; and concealed, in a labyrinth of wars and treaties, their aspiring views, and the immortal hope of chasing the barbarians beyond the Alps. The nice balance of the Vatican was often subverted by the soldiers of the North and West, who were united under the standard of Charles the Fifth: the feeble and fluctuating policy of Clement the Seventh exposed his person and dominions to the conqueror; and Rome was abandoned seven months to a lawless army, more cruel and rapacious than the Goths and Vandals.<sup>60</sup> After this severe lesson, the popes contracted their ambition, which was almost satisfied, resumed the character of a common parent, and abstained from all offensive hostilities, except in an hasty quarrel, when the vicar of Christ and the Turkish sultan were armed at the same time against the kingdom of Naples.<sup>61</sup> The French and Germans at length withdrew from the field of battle: Milan, Naples, Sicily, Sardinia, and the sea-coast of Tuscany, were firmly possessed by the Spaniards; and it became their interest to maintain the peace and dependence of Italy, which continued almost without disturbance from the middle of the sixteenth to the opening of the eighteenth century. The Vatican was swayed and protected by the religious policy of the Catholic king: his prejudice and interest disposed him in every dispute to support the prince against the people; and instead of the encouragement, the aid, and the asylum, which they obtained from the adjacent states, the friends of liberty, or the enemies of law, were enclosed on all sides within the iron circle of despotism. The long habits of obedience and education subdued the turbulent spirit of the nobles and commons of Rome. The barons forgot the arms and factions of their ancestors, and insensibly became the servants of luxury and government. Instead of maintaining a crowd of tenants and followers, the produce of their estates was consumed in the private expenses, which multiply the pleasures, and diminish the power, of the lord.<sup>62</sup> The Colonna and Ursini vied with each other in the decoration of their palaces and chapels; and their antique splendour was rivalled or surpassed by the sudden opulence of the papal families. In Rome the voice of freedom and discord is no longer heard; and instead of the <sup>56</sup> The disorders of Rome, which were much inflamed by the partition of Sixtus IV. are exposed in the Diurnes of two operators, Stephanus Infusura, and an anonymous citizen. See the treaties of the year 1511, and the death of the protonotary Colonna, in tom. iii. pars ii. p. 1053, 1138.

<sup>57</sup> Est toute la terre de l'Eglise troublee par cette partialité (des Colomes et des Ursini), come nous diront. Luce et Garimont, ou en l'histoire Home et l'italien; et par un tel trouble de l'Eglise, rend la terre de l'Eglise seroit la plus heureuse habitation pour les peuples, qui sont dans tout le monde (car ils ne payent ni tailles ni guerres autres choses), et seroient toujours bien conduits (car toujours les papes sont sages et bien gouvernez), mais tres souvent en aduient de grands et cruels meurtres et pilleries.

<sup>58</sup> By the state w. tom. iii. that in w. three thousand horse and twenty thousand foot (tom. iii. p. 1053). Since that time (A. D. 1567), the papal arms are happily rooted, but the income must have increased since that time.

<sup>59</sup> More especially by Guicciardini and Machiavel, in the general

history of the former, in the Florentine history, the Prince, and the politics, and discourses of the latter. These, with their worthy successors, barbarians with the subjects of Charles V. (anté, p. 492, 493), an art system, which, like that of the Tartar conquests, I imputed with the less scruple, as I could scarcely hope to reach the conclusion of my work.

appeared to protect his defeat.

<sup>62</sup> This gradual change of manners and expense is admirably explained by Dr. Adam Smith (Wealth of Nations, vol. i. p. 429-431), who proves, perhaps too severely, that the most salutary effects have flowed from the meanest and most selfish causes.

foaming torrent, a smooth and stagnant lake reflects the image of idleness and servitude.

The ecclesiastical government, a patriot, will be equally scandalised by the temporal kingdom of the clergy ; and the local majesty of Rome, the remembrance of her consuls and triumphs, may seem to embitter the sense, and aggravate the shame, of her slavery. If we calmly weigh the merits and defects of the ecclesiastical government, it may be praised in its present state, as a mild, decent, and tranquil system, exempt from the dangers of a minority, the sallies of youth, the expenses of luxury, and the calamities of war. But these advantages are overbalanced by a frequent, perhaps a septennial election of a sovereign, who is seldom a native of the country : the reign of a young statesman of threescore, in the decline of his life and abilities, without hope to accomplish, and without children to inherit, the labours of his transitory reign. The successful candidate is drawn from the church, and even the convent ; from the mode of education and life the most adverse to reason, humanity, and freedom. In the trammels of servile faith, he has learned to believe because it is absurd, to revere all that is contemptible, and to despise whatever might deserve the esteem of a rational being ; to punish error as a crime, to reward mortification and celibacy as the first of virtues ; to place the saints of the kalendar<sup>54</sup> above the heroes of Rome and the sages of Athens ; and to consider the missal, or the crucifix, as more useful instruments than the plough or the loom. In the office of nuncio, or the rank of cardinal, he may acquire some knowledge of the world, but the primitive stain will adhere to his mind and manners ; from study and experience he may suspect the mystery of his pro-

Steuve V
A.D. 1395—1390. fession ; but the sacerdotal art will imbibe some portion of the bigotry which 93 Mr. Hume (Hist. of England, vol. i. p. 782) too rashly concludes, that if the civil and ecclesiastical powers be united in the same person, it is of little moment whether he be styled prince or pope, since the temporal character will always predominate.

94 A Protestant may disdain the unworthy preference of St. Francis to St. Peter, and may think that the pope is in the real or judgment of Jesus V. who placed the statues of the apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, on the vacant columns of Trajan and Antonine.

95 A wandering Italian, (free-gill Lutz) has given the Art of Spelling Quinze fois mieux, than the French, and the Art of writing twice as well.

96 But which does not commend our absolute confidence. Yet the character of the man, and the principal facts are supported by the annals of Spontanus and Muratori. (A. D. 1585-1760), and the contemporary history of the great Theamus (d. 1633). c. 2. l. xxviii. c. p. 1.

96 These privileged places, the quartieri or franchises, were adopted from the Roman nobles by the foreign immigrants. Julius II had once abolished the abominable and detestandum franchitarius ajusmodi nomen; and after Sixtus V they again revived. I cannot dissent either the justice or magnanimity of Louis XIV. who, in 1687, sent his ambassador, the marquis de Lavardin, to Rome, with an armed force of a thousand officers, guards, and domestics, to maintain this iniquitous claim, and multo peius Innocent XI in the heart of his capital (Vita di Sisto V. tom. iii. p. 260-274. Muratori, Annali d'Italia, tom. xc. p. 434-436. and Voltare, Siècle de Louis

97. DM. No. 16. Pl. 38, 39.
 97. The inscription is on a decree which is inscribed on marble, and placed in the Capitol. It is expressed in a style of much simplicity and freedom. Si quis, ue privatus, ue magistratus, gerens de collocandâ rio pontifich statua mentionem facere auit, legitimo S. P. Q. R. decreto in perpetuum infamâ et publicorum munierum expers esto. MDXCI in mensis Augusto (i. ita di isto V. tom. i. p. 463.) I believe that this decree is still observed, and I know that every monarch who deserves a statue, should himself impose the prohibition.

98 The histories of the church, Italy, and Christendom, have contributed to the chapter which I now conclude. In the original Lives of the Popes, we often discover the city and republic of Rome, and the events of the xivth and xvth centuries are preserved in the rude and domestic chronicles which I have carefully inspected, and shall recapitulate in the order of time.

Fragmenta II: tonica Romanae (vulgo Thomas Furthwengeli); in Romana Dialecte vulgare (A. D. 1327-1354, in Muratorio, Antiquitat. p. 525. N. B. The credit of this fragment is somewhat hurt by a singular interpolation, in which the author relates his own death at the age of 115 years.

he inculcates. The genius of Sixtus the Fifth<sup>95</sup> burst from the gloom of a Franciscan cloister. In a reign of five years, he exterminated the outlaws and banditti, abolished the profane sanctuaries of Rome;<sup>96</sup> formed a naval and military force, restored and emulated the monuments of antiquity, and after a liberal use and large increase of the revenue, left five millions of crowns in the castle of St. Angelo. But his justice was sullied with cruelty, his activity was prompted by the ambition of conquest; after his decease, the abuses revived; the treasure was dissipated; he entailed on posterity thirty-five new taxes and the venality of offices; and, after his death, his statue was demolished by an ungrateful, or an injured, people.<sup>97</sup> The wild and original character of Sixtus the Fifth stands alone in the series of the pontiffs: the maxims and effects of their temporal government may be collected from the positive and comparative view of the arts and philosophy, the agriculture and trade, the wealth and population, of the ecclesiastical state. For myself it is my wish to depart in charity with all mankind, nor am I willing, in these last moments, to offend even the pope and clergy of Rome.<sup>98</sup>

CHAP. LXXI.

Prospect of the Ruins of Rome in the Fifteenth Century. — Four Causes of Decay and Destruction. — Example of the Coliseum. — Renovation of the City. — Conclusion of the whole Work.

In the last days of pope Eugenius the Fourth, two of his servants, the learned Poggius<sup>1</sup> and a friend, ascended the Capitoline hill; reposed themselves among the ruins of columns and temples; and viewed from that commanding spot

7. Mosh. Tzet. Ibra. tom. in p. 247—348) the authentic ground-work of the history of Bienna.
8. Duplem. (Gentili) Diarii in Romanorum (A. D. 1370—1410), in the Recur. Ital. arch. tom. i. in p. 101, p. 546.
9. Ant. in (Polo) Diurnum Rom. (A. D. 1304—1417), tom. xxv. p. 561.
10. Puttin. (Pauli) Mss. Aeneae Historica Romana (A. D. 1135—1446), p. 51.
11. Volaterran. (Jacob), Diurnum Rom. (A. D. 1472—1484), tom. xiii. p. 51.
12. Diarii Diurnum Urbis Romae (A. D. 1451—1492), tom. iii. p. 51.

n (A. D. 1494, or 1378).

might be completed from the MSS in different libraries of Italy reprinted ex Diario Joh Burcardi, Leipzig, 1740, in the Journal of Burcard the Memories of the Acad. des diaries are inserted in the acter in the history of Italy,

d to him for the following Scripturae (A. D. 508).— in lucem prodit, & xxviii
A. virescenti f. chronologica
s a key to this great work.
dato. 2. Antiquitates Italae 1717, in lxxv curious disrchie, &c. of the Italians of the antiquities of the
3. Disertationes sopra le Antiquita Italiane, in vols. in It. Milano, 1751, a free version by the author, which may be quoted with the
The Antiquities. 4. Annali d'Italia

the local or gratifying of the subject. In all his works, Muratori approves himself a diligent and laborious writer, who aspires above the prejudices of a school; prize. He was born on the 12th of May 1727, and died on the 12th of April 1791, after having near six years in the colonies of Milan and Modena a Vita di Giuseppe Maria Gioseffo Muratori, Milan, 1795, in 12mo, and successor than Francesco Sola Muratori, Venera, 1796, in 12mo.

View and discourse of Hogius from the Ca-pitoline hill.
A. D. 1170

the wide and various prospect of desolation.<sup>2</sup> The place and the object gave ample scope for moralising on the vicissitudes of fortune, which spares neither man nor the proudest of his works, which buries empires and cities in a common grave; and it was agreed, that in proportion to her former greatness, the fall of Rome was the more awful and deplorable. "Her primeval state, such as she might appear in a remote age, when Evander entertained the stranger of Troy,<sup>3</sup> has been delineated by the fancy of Virgil. This Tarpæian rock was then a sylvage and solitary thicket: in the time of the poet, it was crowned with the golden roofs of a temple; the temple is overthrown, the gold has been pillaged, the wheel of fortune has accomplished her revolution, and sacred ground is again disfigured with thorns and brambles. "The hill of Capitol, on which we sit, was formerly the head of the Roman empire, the citadel of the earth, the terror of kings; insulted by the footsteps of so many triumphs, enriched with the spoils and tributes of so many nations. This spectacle of the world, how is it fallen! how changed! how defaced! the path of victory is obliterated by vines, and the benches of the senators are concealed by a dunghill. Cast your eyes on the Palatine hill, and seek among the shapeless and enormous fragments, the marble theatre, the obelisks, the colossal statues, the porticoes of Nero's palace. survey the other hills of the city, the vacant space is interrupted only by ruins and gardens. The forum of the Roman people, where they assembled to enact their laws and elect their magistrates, is now enclosed for the cultivation of pot-herbs, or thrown open for the reception of swine and buffaloes. The public and private edifices, that were founded for eternity, lie prostrate, naked, and broken, like the limbs of a mighty giant; and the ruin is the more visible, from the stupendous relics that have survived the injuries of time and fortune."<sup>4</sup>

His description of the ruins. These relics are minutely described by Poggius, one of the first who raised his eyes from the monuments of legendary, to those of classic superstition.<sup>5</sup> 1. Besides a bridge, an arch, a sepulchre, and the pyramid of Cestius, he could discern, of the age of the republic, a double row of vaults, in the salt-office of the Capitol, which were inscribed with the name and munificence of Catulus. 2. Eleven temples were visible in some degree, from the perfect form of the Pantheon, to the three arches and a marble column of the temple of peace, which Vespasian erected after the civil wars and the Jewish triumph. 3. Of the number, which he rashly defines, of seven thermæ, or public baths, none were sufficiently entire to represent the use and distribution of the several parts: but those of Diocletian and Antoninus Caracalla still retained the titles of the founders, and astonished the curious spectator, who, in observing their solidity and extent, the variety of nimbles, the size and multitude of the columns, compared the labour and expense with the use and importance. Of the baths of Constantine, of Alexander, of Domitian, or rather of Titus, some vestige might yet be found. 4. The triumphal arches of Titus, Severus, and Constantine, were entire, both the structure and the inscriptions; a falling fragment was honoured with the name of Trajan; and two arches, then extant, in the Flaminian way, have been ascribed to the baser memory of Faustina and Gallienus. 5. After the wonder of the Coliseum, Poggius might have overlooked a small amphitheatre of brick, most probably for the use of the pratorian camp: the theatres of Marcellus and Pompey were occupied in a great measure by public and private buildings; and in the Circus, Agonalis and Maximus, little more than the situation and the form could be investigated. 6. The columns of Trajan and Antonine were still erect; but the Egyptian obelisks were broken or buried. A people of gods and heroes, the workmanship of art, was reduced to one equestrian figure of gilt brass, and to five marble statues, of which the most conspicuous were the two horses of Phidias and Praxiteles. 7. The two mausoleums or sepulchres of Augustus and Hadrian could not totally be lost; but the former was only visible as a mound of earth; and the latter, the castle of St. Angelo, had acquired the name and appearance of a modern fortress. With the addition of some separate and nameless columns, such were the remains of the ancient city: for the marks of a more recent structure might be detected in the walls, which formed a circumference of ten miles, included three hundred and seventy-nine turrets, and opened into the country by thirteen gates.

This melancholy picture was drawn above nine hundred years after the fall of the Western empire, and even of the Gothic kingdom of Italy. A long period of distress and anarchy, in which empire, and arts, and riches, had migrated from the banks of the Tyber, was incapable of restoring or adorning the city; and as all that is human must retrograde if it do not advance, every successive age must have hastened the ruin of the works of antiquity. To measure the progress of decay, and to ascertain, at each æra, the state of each edifice, would be an endless and a useless labour, and I shall content myself with two observations, which will introduce a short enquiry into the general causes and effects. 1. Two hundred years before the eloquent complaint of Poggius, an anonymous writer composed a description of Rome.<sup>6</sup> His ignorance may repeat the same objects under strange and fabulous names. Yet this barbarous topographer had eyes and ears, he could observe the visible remains, he could exteros colles pelustra omnia vacua edificiorum, ruinis vniuersaque operta compages (Poggius, de Varietate. Fortunus, p. 21.)

Gradual decay of Rome.

<sup>2</sup> See Poggius, p. 4-22.

<sup>3</sup> Liber de Archæologia Romæ, ex Registro Nicolai Cardinalis de Arce, in Bibliotheca St. Iudori Armano IV. No. 69. This treatise, with some short but pertinent notes, has been published by Montfaucon (Museum Italicum, p. 287-301), who thus delivers his own critical opinion: "scriptor namque erroris acrius, ut ibi dem notatur, antiquariorum rei imperitus et, ut ab illo æro, pugni et anilibus fabellis repletus, sed, quia monumenta, quæ in temporibus Romæ supererant, pro molulo reuocet, non parum inde præcipue multabitur quæ Romanis antiquitatibus indagandi speram navabit (p. 285.)"

<sup>2</sup> Considimus in ip[s]is Tarpæiæ arcis ruinis, pone iugos porte, curiadam, ut puto, templi, mirumque limen, pluriusque passim contractas columnas, unde magna ex parte prospectus urbis patet (p. 2).

<sup>3</sup> Æneid, vii. 97-369. This ancient picture, so artfully introduced, and so exquisitely finished, must have been highly interesting to an inhabitant of Rome, and our early studies allow us to sympathise in the feelings of a Roman.

<sup>4</sup> Capitulum adeo . . . immutatum ut vineis in senatorum sublimibus succederent, stercorum ac purgamentorum requiescatulum facerent. Responde ad Palatinum montem . . . vasta rudera . . .

listen to the tradition of the people, and he distinctly enumerates seven theatres, eleven baths, twelve arches, and eighteen palaces, of which many had disappeared before the time of Poggius. It is apparent, that many stately monuments of antiquity survived till a late period,<sup>7</sup> and that the principles of destruction acted with vigorous and increasing energy in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. 2. The same reflection must be applied to the three last ages; and we should vainly seek the Septizomum of Severus;<sup>8</sup> which is celebrated by Petrarch and the antiquarians of the sixteenth century. While the Roman edifices were still entire, the first blows, however weighty and impetuous, were resisted by the solidity of the mass and the harmony of the parts; but the slightest touch would precipitate the fragments of arches and columns, that already nodded to their fall.

After a diligent enquiry, I can discern four principal causes of the ruin of Rome, which continued to operate in a period of more than a thousand years. I. The injuries of time and nature. II. The hostile attacks of the barbarians and Christians. III. The use and abuse of the materials. And, IV. The domestic quarrels of the Romans.

I. The art of man is able to construct monuments far more permanent than the narrow span of his own existence; yet these monuments, like himself, are perishable and frail; and in the boundless annals of time, his life and his labours must equally be measured as a fleeting moment. Of a simple and solid edifice, it is not easy however to circumscribe the duration. As the wonders of ancient days, the pyramids<sup>9</sup> attracted the curiosity of the ancients: an hundred generations, the leaves of autumn,<sup>10</sup> have dropped into the grave; and after the fall of the Pharaohs and Ptolemies, the Cæsars and caliphs, the same pyramids stand erect and unshaken above the floods of the Nile. A complex figure of various and minute parts is more accessible to injury and decay; and the silent lapse of time is often accelerated by hurricanes and earthquakes, by fires and inundations. The air and earth have doubtless been shaken; and the lofty turrets of Rome have tottered from their foundations; but the seven hills do not appear to be placed on the great cavities of the globe; nor has the city, in any age, been exposed to the convulsions of nature, which, in the climate of Antioch, Lisbon, or Lima, have crumbled in a few moments the works of ages into dust. Fire is the most powerful agent of life and death; the rapid mischief may be kindled and propagated by the industry or negligence of mankind; and every period of the Roman annals is marked by the repetition of similar calamities. A memorable conflagration, the guilt or misfortune of Nero's reign, continued, though with unequal fury, either six, or nine days.<sup>11</sup> Innumerable buildings, crowded in close and crooked streets, supplied perpetual fuel for the flames; and when they ceased, four only of the fourteen regions were left entire; three were totally destroyed, and seven were deformed by the relics of smoking and lacerated edifices.<sup>12</sup> In the full meridian of empire, the metropolis arose with fresh beauty from her ashes; yet the memory of the old deplored their irreparable losses, the arts of Greece, the trophies of victory, the monuments of primitive or fabulous antiquity. In the days of distress and anarchy, every wound is mortal, every fall irretrievable; nor can the damage be restored either by the public care of government, or the activity of private interest. Yet two causes may be alleged, which render the calamity of fire more destructive to a flourishing than a decayed city. 1. The more combustible materials of brick, timber, and metals, are first melted or consumed; but the flames may play without injury or effect on the naked walls, and massy arches, that have been despoiled of their ornaments. 2. It is among the common and plebeian habitations, that a mischievous spark is most easily blown to a conflagration; but as soon as they are devoured, the greater edifices which have resisted or escaped, are left as so many islands in a state of solitude and safety.

From her situation, Rome is exposed to frequent inundations. Without excepting the Tyber, the rivers that descend from either side of the Apennine have a short and irregular course: a shallow stream in the summer heats; an impetuous torrent, when it is swelled in the spring or winter, by the fall of rain, and the melting of the snows. When the current is repelled from the sea by adverse winds, when the ordinary bed is inadequate to the weight of waters, they rise above the banks, and overspread, without limits or control, the plains and cities of the adjacent country. Soon after the triumph of the first Punic war, the Tyber was increased by unusual rains; and the inundation, surpassing all former measure of time and place, destroyed all the buildings that were situate below the hills of Rome. According to the variety of ground, the same mischief was produced by different means; and the edifices were either swept away by the sudden impulse, or dissolved and undermined by the long continuance of the flood.<sup>13</sup> Under the reign of Augustus, the same calamity

7 The Père Mabillon (Antiquæ, tom. iv. p. 502.) has published an anonymous palimpsest of the 13th century, who, in his visit round the

8 Septizomum, tom. i. p. 40. Septizomum is a word of Greek origin, and signifies a place of seven hills, or a place of seven hills. Septizomum is a word of Greek origin, and signifies a place of seven hills, or a place of seven hills. Septizomum is a word of Greek origin, and signifies a place of seven hills, or a place of seven hills.

9 Septizomum, tom. i. p. 40. Septizomum is a word of Greek origin, and signifies a place of seven hills, or a place of seven hills. Septizomum is a word of Greek origin, and signifies a place of seven hills, or a place of seven hills. Septizomum is a word of Greek origin, and signifies a place of seven hills, or a place of seven hills.

tuer intacte manebant, tres solo tenuis dejectæ septem reliquis præcatæternæ vestigia supererant, hæc sunt ædificia ruinæ vestigia. Tullius, præsentis Heruli; the in the palace of Numa, the armum. He then deplores man. He then deplores armum decora. . . .
nec quæ seniores meminerant, quæ reparari
nec quæ seniores meminerant, quæ reparari

13 A. D. C. 907, a penitential salverus, against Rome præsentis trium-

14 Septizomum, tom. i. p. 40. Septizomum is a word of Greek origin, and signifies a place of seven hills, or a place of seven hills. Septizomum is a word of Greek origin, and signifies a place of seven hills, or a place of seven hills. Septizomum is a word of Greek origin, and signifies a place of seven hills, or a place of seven hills.

was renewed: the lawless river overturned the palaces and temples on its banks;<sup>14</sup> and, after the labours of the emperor in cleansing and widening the bed that was encumbered with ruins,<sup>15</sup> the vigilance of his successors was exercised by similar dangers and designs. The project of diverting into new channels the Tyber itself, or some of the dependent streams, was long opposed by superstition and local interests;<sup>16</sup> nor did the use compensate the toil and cost of the tardy and imperfect execution. The servitude of rivers is the noblest and most important victory which man has obtained over the licentiousness of nature;<sup>17</sup> and if such were the ravages of the Tyber under a firm and active government, what could oppose, or who can enumerate, the injuries of the city, after the fall of the Western empire? A remedy was at length produced by the evil itself: the accumulation of rubbish and the earth, that has been washed down from the hills, is supposed to have elevated the plain of Rome, fourteen or fifteen feet, perhaps, above the ancient level;<sup>18</sup> and the modern city is less accessible to the attacks of the river.<sup>19</sup>

II. The hostile attacks of the barbarians and Christians. II. The crowd of writers of every nation, who impute the destruction of the Roman monuments to the Goths and the Christians, have neglected to enquire how far they were animated by an hostile principle, and how far they possessed the means and the leisure to satiate their enmity. In the preceding chapters of this History, I have described the triumph of barbarism and religion; and I can only resume, in a few words, their real or imaginary connection with the ruin of ancient Rome. Our fancy may create, or adopt, a pleasing romance, that the Goths and Vandals sallied from Scandinavia, ardent to avenge the flight of Odin;<sup>20</sup> to break the chains, and to chastise the oppressors, of mankind; that they wished to burn the records of classic literature, and to found their national architecture on the broken members of the Tuscan and Corinthian orders. But in simple truth, the northern conquerors were neither sufficiently savage, nor sufficiently refined, to entertain such aspiring ideas of destruction and revenge. The shepherds of Scythia and Germany had been educated in the armies of the empire, whose discipline they acquired, and whose weakness they invaded: with the familiar use of the Latin tongue, they had learned to reverence the name and titles of Rome; and, though incapable of emulating, they were more inclined to admire, than to abolish, the arts and studies of a brighter period. In the transient possession of a rich and unresisting capital, the soldiers of Alaric and Genseric were stimulated by the passions of a victorious army; amidst the wanton indulgence of lust or cruelty, portable wealth was the object of their search; nor could they derive either pride or pleasure from the unprofitable reflection, that they had battered to the ground the works of the consuls and Cæsars. Their moments were indeed precious: the Goths evacuated Rome on the sixth,<sup>21</sup> the Vandals on the fifteenth, day;<sup>22</sup> and, though it be far more difficult to build than to destroy, their hasty assault would have made a slight impression on the solid piles of antiquity. We may remember, that both Alaric and Genseric affected to spare the buildings of the city; that they subsisted in strength and beauty under the auspicious government of Theodoric;<sup>23</sup> and that the momentary resentment of Totila<sup>24</sup> was disarmed by his own temper and the advice of his friends and enemies. From these innocent barbarians, the reproach may be transferred to the Catholics of Rome. The statues, altars, and houses of the daemons, were an abomination in their eyes; and in the absolute command of the city, they might labour with zeal and perseverance to erase the idolatry of their ancestors. The demolition of the temples in the East<sup>25</sup> affords to them an example of conduct, and to us an argument of belief; and it is probable, that a portion of guilt or merit may be imputed with justice to the Roman proselytes. Yet their abhorrence was confined to the monuments of heathen superstition; and the civil structures that were dedicated to the business or pleasure of society might be preserved without injury or scandal. The change of religion was accomplished, not by a popular tumult, but by the decrees of the emperors, of the senate, and of time. Of the Christian hierarchy, the bishops of Rome were commonly the most prudent and least fanatic: nor can any positive charge be opposed to the meritorious act of saving and converting the majestic structure of the Pantheon.<sup>26</sup>

III. The value of any object that supplies the wants or pleasures of mankind, is compounded of its substance and its form, of the materials and the manufacture. Its price must depend on the number of persons by whom it may be acquired and used; on the extent of the market; and consequently on the ease or difficulty of remote exportation, according to the nature of the commodity, its local situation, and the temporary circumstances of the world. The barbarian con-

III. The use and abuse of the materials.

14 Vidimus fluvium Tiberim, retortis
Littore Etrusco volentem undas,
Ire dejectum in monumenta Regis Temp'que Vene.

(Horat. Carm. L. 2.)
If the palace of Numa, and temple of Vesta, were thrown down in the city.

of Italy to the senate against the measure; and we may applaud the progress of reason. On a similar occasion, local interests would undoubtedly be consulted, but an English House of Commons would and savage land, in which the waters are abandoned to themselves, without being regulated by human industry (p. 212. 561. quarto edition).

Be a new

18 In his Travels in Italy, Mr. Addison (his works, vol. ii. p. 98, Baskerville's edition) has observed this curious and unquestionable fact.

19 Yet in modern times, the Tyber has sometimes damaged the city, and in the years 1350, 1357, 1598, the Annals of Muratori record three mischievous and memorable inundations (tom. xiv. p. 204. 129. tom. xv. p. 295, &c.).

20 I take this opportunity of declaring, that in the course of twelve years, to the

The city.

21

22

23

24

25

26

quers of Rome usurped in a moment the toil and treasure of successive ages ; but, except the luxuries of immediate consumption, they must view without desire all that could not be removed from the city in the Gothic wagons or the fleet of the Vandals.<sup>27</sup> Gold and silver were the first objects of their avarice ; as in every country, and in the smallest compass, they represent the most ample command of the industry and possession of mankind. A vase or a statue of those precious metals might tempt the vanity of some barbarian chief ; but the grosser multitude, regardless of the form, was tenacious only of the substance ; and the melted ingots might be readily divided and stamped into the current coin of the empire. The less active or less fortunate robbers were reduced to the baser plunder of brass, lead, iron, and copper : whatever had escaped the Goths and Vandals was pillaged by the Greek tyrants ; and the emperor Constans, in his rapacious visit, stripped the bronze tiles from the roof of the Pantheon.<sup>28</sup> The edifices of Rome might be considered as a vast and various mine ; the first labour of extracting the materials was already performed ; the metals were purified and cast ; the marbles were hewn and polished ; and after foreign and domestic rapine had been satiated, the remains of the city, could a purchaser have been found, were still venal. The monuments of antiquity had been left naked of their precious ornaments, but the Romans would demolish with their own hands the arches and walls, if the hope of profit could surpass the cost of the labour and exportation. If Charlemagne had fixed in Italy the seat of the Western empire, his genius would have aspired to restore, rather than to violate, the works of the Cæsars : but policy confined the French monarch to the forests of Germany ; his taste could be gratified only by destruction ; and the new palace of Aix la Chapelle was decorated with the marbles of Ravenna<sup>29</sup> and Rome.<sup>30</sup> Five hundred years after Charlemagne, a king of Sicily, Robert, the wisest and most liberal sovereign of the age, was supplied with the same materials by the easy navigation of the Tyber and the sea ; and Petrarch sighs an indignant complaint, that the ancient capital of the world should adorn from her own bowels the stolid luxury of Naples.<sup>31</sup> But these examples of plunder or purchase were rare in the darker ages ;

and the Romans, alone and unenvied, might have applied to their private or public use the remaining structures of antiquity, if in their present form and situation they had not been useless in a great measure to the city and its inhabitants. The walls still described the old circumference, but the city had descended from the seven hills into the Campus Martius; and some of the noblest monuments which had braved the injuries of time were left in a desert, far remote from the habitations of mankind. The palaces of the senators were no longer adapted to the manners or fortunes of their indigent successors; the use of baths<sup>32</sup> and porticoes was forgotten; in the sixth century, the games of the theatre, amphitheatre, and circus, had been interrupted: some temples were devoted to the prevailing worship; but the Christian churches preferred the holy figure of the cross; and fashion, or reason, had distributed after a peculiar model the cells and offices of the cloister. Under the ecclesiastical reign, the number of these pious foundations was enormously multiplied; and the city was crowded with forty monasteries of men, twenty of women, and sixty chapters and colleges of canons and priests,<sup>3</sup> who aggravated, instead of relieving, the depopulation of the tenth century. But if the forms of ancient architecture were disregarded by a people insensible of their use and beauty, the plentiful materials were applied to every call of necessity or superstition; till the fairest columns of the Ionic and Corinthian orders, the richest marbles of Paros and Numidia, were degraded, perhaps to the support of a convent or a stable. The daily havoc which is perpetrated by the Turks in the cities of Greece and Asia, may afford a melancholy example; and in the gradual destruction of the monuments of Rome, Sixtus the Fifth may alone be excused for employing the stones of the Septizonium in the glorious edifice of St. Peter's.<sup>34</sup> A fragment, a ruin, howsoever mangled or profaned, may be viewed with pleasure and regret; but the greater part of the marble was deprived of substance, as well as of place and proportion; it was burnt to lime for the purpose of cement. Since the arrival of Poggius, the temple of Concord,<sup>35</sup> and many capital structures, had vanished from his eyes; and an epigram of the same age expresses a just and pious fear, that the continuance of this prac-

27 Flaminii Vacca (apud Montfalcon, p. 155, 156. His Memoir

time, these places were visited and ruled by the Transapine pagans, the heirs of the Gothic conquerors.

28 Omnia quae erant in aere ad ornatum civitatis deposuit, sed et ecclesiam B. Marini ad martyres quae de tegulis aereis constructa discomperuit (Anast. in Vitalian. p. 141) The base and sacrilegious Greek had not even the poor pretence of plundering an heathen temple; the Pantheon was already a Catholic church.

temple; the Pantheon was already a Catholic church.

50 I shall quote the authentic testimony of the Saxons post (A. D. 887-899), de Relugestis Caroli magni, l. v. 157-419, in the Historians of France (tom. v. p. 180.)

Ad quæ in iuniores præstabit Regia columnas, Quædam præcipuas pollicetur Raveria dedit.
De tum longinquæ poterit re, nonne vetustas

And I shall add, from the Chronicle of Siebert (Historians of France, tom. v. p. 378.) exoritur etiam Aquasana bathum; iurtime pulcherrimum, ad usus strumarum a Roma et Rheima co-

[illegible]

unū in re, turbulenti ac seditiosi homines et totius reliquæ vitæ consilii et rationibus discordis, inbumi in fœderis stupendi soc erate conuenerant, in pontes et maria atque inmeritis lapides deæ uident. Denique post vi vel senio collapsa uol' tia, quæ quodam ingentes tenebant vires, post dirutis artus triumphales inde maiores horum lortant (conuulsi), de ignis uoluitas ac propria inopietas fragmi-

- collapse with an  $^{238}\text{Pu}$  and  $^{239}\text{Pu}$  which were built at and the preceding the history of Pere

[illegible]

with the 'legitimate' or 'normal' and 'proper' (although possibly not always 'democratic') status of party politics, the acts of corruption were not. The term used forward was therefore not described by a scholar in the twentieth century, as I have read in a MS. manuscript of the late 17th or early 18th century, as abus, and that could be attributed to the fact that the specimens of P. lutea, and a related but undescribed species, are collected from islands like the Seychelles, that the signature of C. velox Skoleva was blurred for many years.

pronounce, that the latter have been far more ruinous to the city; and our opinion is confirmed by the evidence of Petrarch. "Behold," says the laureat, "the relics of Rome, the image of "her pristine greatness! Neither time, nor the "barbarian, can boast the merit of this stupen- "dous destruction: it was perpetrated by her "own citizens, by the most illustrious of her "sons, and your ancestors (he writes to a noble "Annibaldi) have done with the battering-ram "what the Punic hero could not accomplish "with the sword."<sup>48</sup> The influence of the two last principles of decay must in some degree be multiplied by each other; since the houses and towers, which were subverted by civil war, required a new and perpetual supply from the monuments of antiquity.

These general observations may be separately applied to the amphitheatre of Titus, which has obtained the name of the Coliseum,<sup>49</sup> either from its magnitude, or from Nero's colossal statue: an edifice, had it been left to time and nature, which might perhaps have claimed an eternal duration. The curious antiquaries, who have computed the numbers and seats, are disposed to believe, that above the upper row of stone steps, the amphitheatre was encircled and elevated with several stages of wooden galleries, which were repeatedly consumed by fire, and restored by the emperors. Whatever was precious, or portable, or profane, the statues of gods and heroes, and the costly ornaments of sculpture, which were cast in brass, or overspread with leaves of silver and gold, became the first prey of conquest or fanaticism, of the avarice of the barbarians or the Christians. In the massy stones of the Coliseum, many holes are discerned; and the two most probable conjectures represent the various accidents of its decay. These stones were connected by solid links of brass or iron, nor had the eye of rapine overlooked the value of the baser metals:<sup>50</sup> the vacant space was converted into a fair or market; the artisans of the Coliseum are mentioned in an ancient survey; and the chasms were perforated or enlarged to receive the poles that supported the shops or tents of the mechanic trades.<sup>51</sup> Reduced to its naked majesty, the Flavian amphitheatre was contemplated with awe and admiration by the pilgrims of the North; and their rude enthusiasm broke forth in a sublime proverbial expression, which is recorded in the eighth century, in the fragments of the venerable Bede: "As long as the "Coliseum stands, Rome shall stand; when the "Coliseum falls, Rome will fall; when Rome "falls, the world will fall."<sup>52</sup> In the modern system of war, a situation commanded by three hills would not be chosen for a fortress; but the strength of the walls and arches could resist the engines of assault; a numerous garrison might be lodged in the enclosure; and while one faction occupied the Vatican and the Capitol, the other was entrenched in the Lateran and the Coliseum.<sup>53</sup>

The abolition at Rome of the Games of ancient games must be understood with some latitude; and the carnival sports, of the Testacean mount and the Circus Agonalis,<sup>54</sup> were regulated by the law<sup>55</sup> or custom of the city. The senator presided with dignity and pomp to adjudge and distribute the prizes, the gold ring, or the pallium,<sup>56</sup> as it was styled, of cloth or silk. A tribute on the Jews supplied the annual expense;<sup>57</sup> and the races, on foot, on horseback, or in chariots, were ennobled by a tilt and tournament of seventy-two of the Roman youth. In the year one thousand three hundred and thirty-two, a bull-feast, after the fashion of the Moors and Spaniards, was celebrated in the Coliseum itself; and the living manners are painted in a diary of the times.<sup>58</sup> A convenient order of benches was restored; and a general proclamation, as far as Rimini and Ravenna, invited the nobles to exercise their skill and courage in this perilous adventure. The Roman ladies were marshalled in three squadrons, and seated in three balconies, which on this day, the third of September, were lined with scarlet cloth. The fair Jacova di Rovere led the matrons from beyond the Tyber, a pure and native race, who still represent the features and character of antiquity. The remainder of the city was divided as usual between the Colonna and Ursini: the two factions were proud of the number and beauty of their female bands; the charms of Savella Ursini are mentioned with praise; and the Colonna regretted the absence of the youngest of their house, who

48 Petrarch. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1.

49 The fourth I. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1.

50 The fourth I. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1.

51 Denart. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1.

52 Qu. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1.

53 I cannot recover, in Muratori's original Lives of the Popes, the passage that alludes to the Coliseum.

54 The Circus Agonalis, the Circus Agonalis, the Circus Agonalis, the Circus Agonalis.

55 The Pallium, which Menage is fondly derives from Palmarium, is an expression of the most vulgar and most common of the robe or cloak, to the materials, and from thence to their application as a prize.

56 For these expenses, the Jews of Rome paid each year 1150 fluns, of which the thirty-six represented the price of silver for which Judas had betrayed his Master to the murderers. There was a fine race of Jews as well as of Christian youths (Statius Silv. l. 1. c. 1.)

57 An extraordinary bull-feast in the Coliseum is described in a truly curious manner by the Diary of the Times, l. 1. c. 1. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1.

58 The most important fragments of Roman history, the Diary of the Times, l. 1. c. 1. De Rebus Siculis, l. 1. c. 1.

59 They may seem, they are deeply marked with the character of truth and nature.

had sprained her ancle in the garden of Nero's tower. The lots of the champions were drawn by an old and respectable citizen; and they descended into the arena, or pit, to encounter the wild bulls, on foot as it should seem, with a single spear. Amidst the crowd, our annalist has selected the names, colours, and devices, of twenty of the most conspicuous knights. Several of the names are the most illustrious of Rome and the ecclesiastical state; Malatesta, Polenta, Della Valle, Cafarello, Savelli, Capoccio, Conti, Annibaldi, Altieri, Corsi; the colours were adapted to their taste and situation; the devices are expressive of hope or despair, and breathe the spirit of gallantry and arms. "I am alone," like the youngest of the Horatii, the confidence of an intrepid stranger: "I live disconsolate," a weeping widower: "I burn under the ashes," a discreet lover: "I adore Lavinia, or Lucretia," the ambiguous declaration of a modern passion: "My faith is as pure," the motto of a white livery: "Who is stronger than myself?" of a lion's hide: "If I am drowned in blood, what a pleasant death!" the wish of ferocious courage. The pride or prudence of the Ursini restrained them from the field, which was occupied by three of their hereditary rivals, whose inscriptions denoted the lofty greatness of the Colonna name: "Though sad, I am strong;" "Strong as I am great;" "If I fall," addressing himself to the spectators, "you fall with me;"—intimating (says the contemporary writer) that while the other families were the subjects of the Vatican, they alone were the supporters of the Capitol. The combats of the amphitheatre were dangerous and bloody. Every champion successively encountered a wild bull; and the victory may be ascribed to the quadrupeds, since no more than eleven were left on the field, with the loss of nine wounded and eighteen killed on the side of their adversaries. Some of the noblest families might mourn, but the pomp of the funerals, in the churches of St. John Lateran and St. Maria Maggiore, afforded a second holiday to the people. Doubtless it was not in such conflicts that the blood of the Romans should have been shed; yet, in blaming their rashness, we are compelled to applaud their gallantry; and the noble volunteers, who display their magnificence, and risk their lives, under the balconies of the fair, excite a more generous sympathy than the thousands of captives and malefactors who were reluctantly dragged to the scene of slaughter.<sup>59</sup>

This use of the amphitheatre was a rare, perhaps a singular, festival;

Injuries,

<sup>59</sup> Muratori has given a separate dissertation (p. xxixth) to the games of the Italians in the middle æge.

<sup>60</sup> In a concise but instructive memoir, the Abbé Barthélemy (Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xxviii. p. 751) has mentioned this agreement of the fictions of the sixth century, de Thaurino faciendo in the Coliseum, from an original act in the archives of Rome.

<sup>61</sup> Coliseum . . . ob sterilitatem Romanorum nihil ex parte ad exitum delatum, nec the magnificentiæ, p. 17. but his expression, too strong for the present age, may be very tenderly applied to the sixth century.

<sup>62</sup> Of the Obsequies monks. Montfaucon (p. 112) affirms this fact from the memorial of Plinius Varo, No. 72. "They still hoped, on some future occasion, to reverse and vindicate their guilt."

<sup>63</sup> After mentioning the precise amphitheatre games, Montfaucon (p. 112) only adds, that it was entire under Paul III.; tacendo clapsit the guilt of the Farnese pope, and the indignation of the Roman people. Against the nephews of Urban VIII. I have no other evidence than the vulgar saying, "Quid non fecerunt barbari, fecerit Barberini," which was perhaps suggested by the resemblance of the words.

the demand for the materials was a daily and continual want, which the citizens could gratify without restraint or remorse. In the fourteenth century, a scandalous act of concord secured to both factions the privilege of extracting stones from the free and common quarry of the Coliseum;<sup>60</sup> and Poggius laments, that the greater part of these stones had been burnt to lime by the folly of the Romans.<sup>61</sup> To check this abuse, and to prevent the nocturnal crimes that might be perpetrated in the vast and gloomy recess, Eugenius the Fourth surrounded it with a wall; and, by a charter long extant, granted both the ground and edifice to the monks of an adjacent convent.<sup>62</sup> After his death, the wall was overthrown in a tumult of the people; and had they themselves respected the noblest monument of their fathers, they might have justified the resolve that it should never be degraded to private poverty. The inside was damaged; but in the middle of the sixteenth century, an æra of taste and learning, the exterior circumference of one thousand six hundred and twelve feet was still entire and inviolate; a triple elevation of fourscore arches, which rose to the height of one hundred and eight feet. Of the present ruin, the nephews of Paul the Third are the guilty agents; and every traveller who views the Farnese palace may curse the sacrilege and luxury of these upstart princes.<sup>63</sup> A similar reproach is applied to the Barberini; and the repetition of injury might be dreaded from every reign, till the Coliseum was placed under the safeguard of religion by the most liberal of the pontiffs, Benedict the Fourteenth, who consecrated a spot which persecution and fable had stained with the blood of so many Christian martyrs.<sup>64</sup>

When Petrarch first gratified his eyes with a view of those monuments, whose scattered fragments so far surpass the most eloquent descriptions, he was astonished at the supine indifference<sup>65</sup> of the Romans themselves;<sup>66</sup> he was humbled rather than elated by the discovery, that, except his friend Rienzi and one of the Colonna, a stranger of the Rhone was more conversant with these antiquities than the nobles and natives of the metropolis.<sup>67</sup> The ignorance and credulity of the Romans are elaborately displayed in the old survey of the city which was composed about the beginning of the thirteenth century; and, without dwelling on the manifold errors of name and place, the legend of the Capitol<sup>68</sup> may provoke a smile of contempt and indignation. "The Capitol," says the anonymous and consecration of the Coliseum.

Ignorance and barbarism of the Romans.

<sup>64</sup> As an antiquarian and a priest, Montfaucon thus deprecates the ruin of the Coliseum. Quid si non sumus merito atque pulchritudine dignum fuisse, quod impiois accret manus, indigna res, utique in locum tot martirum cunctosque sacrum tantopere servatum esse.

<sup>65</sup> Yet the Statutes of Rome (l. 11. c. 51. p. 128) impose a fine of 100 aurei on whoever shall demolish any ancient edifice, ne ruinis civitas defructetur, ut antiqua edificia decorem urbis perpetuo representent.

<sup>66</sup> In his first visit to Rome (A. D. 1337. See Mémoires sur Pétrarque, tom. i. p. 324, &c. Petrarch is struck with miracle rerum tantarum, et stupor in sole orbitatus . . . Pre-sentia vero, mirum dictis, nihil admittunt. vere major fuit Roma magnæque sunt reliquæ quam rebus. Jam non ulli enim ab hac urbe domantur, sed terram solum domum, muror (Opp. p. 103. Familiaris, l. 14. Joanni Colimure.

<sup>67</sup> He excerpts and praises the rare knowledge of John Colonna. Quid enim hostis magis sciret rerum Romanarum, quam Romanus civis? Inventus deo iniquum . . .

<sup>68</sup> After the description . . . mundi provinciarum; et . . . Erant ita per mag.

writer, "is so named as being the head of the "world; where the consuls and senators for"merly resided for the government of the city "and the globe. The strong and lofty walls "were covered with glass and gold, and crowned "with a roof of the richest and most curious "carving. Below the citadel stood a palace, "of gold for the greatest part, decorated with "precious stones, and whose value might be "esteemed at one third of the world itself. The "statues of all the provinces were arranged in "order, each with a small bell suspended from "its neck; and such was the contrivance of art
"magic,<sup>69</sup> that if the province rebelled against "Rome, the statue turned round to that quarter "of the heavens, the bell rang, the prophet of "the Capitol reported the prodigy, and the "senate was admonished of the impending "danger." A second example of less importance, though of equal absurdity, may be drawn from the two marble horses, led by two naked youths, which have since been transported from the baths of Constantine to the Quirinal hill.
The groundless application of the names of Phidias and Praxiteles may perhaps be excused; but these Grecian sculptors should not have been removed above four hundred years from the age of Pericles to that of Tiberius: they should not have been transformed into two philosophers or magicians, whose nakedness was the symbol of truth and knowledge, who revealed to the emperor his most secret actions; and, after refusing all pecuniary recompence, solicited the honour of leaving this eternal monument of themselves.<sup>70</sup> Thus awake to the power of magic, the Romans were insensible to the beauties of art: no more than five statues were visible to the eyes of Poggius; and of the multitudes which chance or design had buried under the ruins, the resurrection was fortunately delayed till a safer and more enlightened age.<sup>71</sup>
The Nile, which now adorns the Vatican, had been explored by some labourers, in digging a vineyard near the temple, or convent, of the Minerva; but the impatient proprietor, who was tormented by some visits of curiosity, restored the unprofitable marble to its former grave.<sup>72</sup> The discovery of a statue of Pompey, ten feet in length, was the occasion of a lawsuit. It had been found under a partition wall:
the equitable judge had pronounced, that the head should be separated from the body, to satisfy the claims of the contiguous owners; and the sentence would have been executed, if the intercession of a cardinal, and the liberality of a pope, had not rescued the Roman hero from the hands of his barbarous countrymen.<sup>73</sup>

But the clouds of barbarism were gradually dispelled; and the peaceful authority of Martin the Fifth and his successors, restored the ornaments of the city as well as the order of the ecclesiastical state. The improvements of Rome, since the fifteenth century, have not been the spontaneous produce of freedom and industry. The first and most natural root of a great city, is the labour and populousness of the adjacent country, which supplies the materials of subsistence, of manufactures, and of foreign trade. But the greater part of the Campagna of Rome is reduced to a dreary and desolate wilderness: the overgrown estates of the princes and the clergy are cultivated by the lazy hands of indigent and hopeless vassals; and the scanty harvests are confined or exported for the benefit of a monopoly. A second and more artificial cause of the growth of a metropolis, is the residence of a monarch, the expense of a luxurious court, and the tributes of dependent provinces. Those provinces and tributes had been lost in the fall of the empire: and if some streams of the silver of Peru and the gold of Brazil have been attracted by the Vatican; the revenues of the cardinals, the fees of office, the oblations of pilgrims and clients, and the remnant of ecclesiastical taxes, afford a poor and precarious supply, which maintains however the idleness of the court and city. The population of Rome, far below the measure of the great capitals of Europe, does not exceed one hundred and seventy thousand inhabitants;<sup>74</sup> and within the spacious enclosure of the walls, the largest portion of the seven hills is overspread with vineyards and ruins. The beauty and splendour of the modern city may be ascribed to the abuses of the government, to the influence of superstition. Each reign (the exceptions are rare) has been marked by the rapid elevation of a new family, enriched by the childish pontiff at the expense of the church and country. The palaces of these fortunate nephews are the most costly monuments of elegance and servitude; the perfect arts of architecture, painting, and sculpture, have been prostituted in their service and their galleries and gardens are decorated with the most precious works of antiquity, which taste or vanity has prompted them to collect. The ecclesiastical revenues were more decently employed by the popes themselves in the pomp of the Catholic worship; but it is superfluous to enumerate their pious foundations of altars, chapels, and churches, since these lesser stars are eclipsed by the sun of the Vatican, by the dome of St. Peter, the most glorious structure

Regio Romano Imperio rebellis erat, statum imago illius provincie verbatat se contra illius; unde tutum bellum res nabit quod pendit ad collum; tuncque ante tunc quoniam erat in fide senatui.
Sed He mentions an example of the Romans and Seneca, who, after the rebellion, had been subdued by Agrippa, again rebelled, tum bellum sonitum, sacerdos erat in specie in hiberna senatibus nutritum Agrippa marched back and reduced the ——— Persians (Annoniam in Munifungam n. 796, 295).

<sup>69</sup> The same writer affirms, that Virgil captus a Romanis invisibleiter exiit, utique Neapolim. A tury is introduced by William of glorum, l. ii. p. 86.), and in the 107) it was the vulgar belief that the demons for the discovery of hidden treasures.

 70 Anonima p. 259. Montivium p. 161 not observes, that if Alexander be represented, these names, being the work of Imlil and his, who lived later than

87) relates a number of these Exhibits, which had been made by Turnus, the perpetual light in his sepulchre, a Latin epitaph, the corpse, yet entire, of a young giant, the enormous wound in his breast (pectus perforat ingens), &c. If this fable rests on the slightest foundation, we may give the bodies, as well as the statues, that were exposed recubantis, cujus caput nucha excedat. Quidam

plures in dies magis concurrunt, strepitum adeoq̃uium fastidumque pertasus, horti patronus congesta humo textit (Poggius de Varietate Fortuna, p. 12).

73 See the Memorials of F. vander Vaeke, No. 57 p. 11, 12. at the end of the Rechts Aenwijzing Nardius 1794, p. 166.

eight or ten thousand Jews imported to 178, 18 souls of them, 1800 Jews in Spain and Italy, some 217, 218). In 1760, you had increased to 110, 000 and in 1775, I left them, without the Jews.

1. I am ignorant whether they have since continued in a progressive state.

that ever has been applied to the use of religion. The fame of Julius the Second, Leo the Tenth, and Sixtus the Fifth, is accompanied by the superior merit of Bramante and Fontana, of Raphael and Michael-Angelo: and the same munificence which had been displayed in palaces and temples, was directed with equal zeal to revive and emulate the labours of antiquity. Prostrate obelisks were raised from the ground, and erected in the most conspicuous places; of the eleven aqueducts of the Cæsars and consuls, three were restored; the artificial rivers were conducted over a long series of old, or of new, arches, to discharge into marble basins a flood of salubrious and refreshing waters: and the spectator, impatient to ascend the steps of St. Peter's, is detained by a column of Egyptian granite, which rises between two lofty and perpetual fountains, to the height of one hundred and twenty feet. The map, the description, the monuments of ancient Rome, have been elucidated by the diligence of the antiquarian and the student;<sup>75</sup> and the footsteps of heroes, the relics, not of superstition, but of empire, are devoutly visited by a new race of pilgrims from the remote, and once savage, countries of the North.

Of these pilgrims, and of every reader, the attention will be excited by an history of the decline and fall of the

<sup>75</sup> The Père Montfaucon distributes his own observations into twenty days, he should have styled them weeks, or months, of his visits to the different parts of the city (Diarium Italicum, c. 8. p. 104-201). That learned Benedictine computes that Ancient Rome; the first of Faunus; the superior labour been equal to his labours; omnes obscuravit, and the Nanius. Yet Montfaucon:

Roman empire; the greatest, perhaps, and most awful scene, in the history of mankind. The various causes and progressive effects are connected with many of the events most interesting in human annals: the artful policy of the Cæsars, who long maintained the name and image of a free republic; the disorders of military despotism; the rise, establishment, and sects of Christianity; the foundation of Constantinople; the division of the monarchy; the invasion and settlements of the barbarians of Germany and Scythia; the institutions of the civil law; the character and religion of Mahomet; the temporal sovereignty of the popes; the restoration and decay of the Western empire of Charlemagne; the crusades of the Latins in the East; the conquests of the Saracens and Turks; the ruin of the Greek empire; the state and revolutions of Rome in the middle age. The historian may applaud the importance and variety of his subject; but, while he is conscious of his own imperfections, he must often accuse the deficiency of his materials. It was among the ruins of the Capitol, that I first conceived the idea of a work which has amused and exercised near twenty years of my life, and which, however inadequate to my own wishes, I finally deliver to the curiosity and candour of the public.

LAI SAKN,
June 27. 1757.

tion of the old city, which must be attained by the three following methods:—1. The measurement of the space and intervals of the ruins. 2. The study of inscriptions, and the places where they were found. 3. The investigation of all the acts, charters, diaries, of the middle ages, which name any spot or building of Rome. The laborious work, such as Montfaucon's diurnal, must be promoted by (A. D. 1758) would furnish a solid and accurate basis for the ancient topography of Rome.

GENERAL INDEX.

A

ABAN, the Saracen, heroism of his widow, 900.
Abbasides, elevation of the house of, to the office of caliph of the Saracens, 933.
Abdallah, the Saracen, his excursion to plunder the fair of Abyla, 902. His African expedition, 914.
Abdalmulck, caliph of the Saracens, refuses tribute to the emperor of Constantinople, and establishes a national mint, 928.
Abdallahman, the Saracen, establishes his throne at Cordova in Spain, 924. Splendour of his court, 933. His estimate of his happiness, 936.
Abdelaziz, the Saracen, his treaty with Theodemir the Gothic prince of Spain, 921, 922. His death, 922.
Abderame, his expedition to France, and victories there, 931. His death, 932.
Abdol Motallib, the grandfather of the prophet Mahomet, his history, 867.
Agarus, enquiry into the authenticity of his correspondence with Jesus Christ, 834.
Agarus, the last king of Edessa, sent in chains to Rome, 73.
Agaveus, the confidential prefect under Constantine the Great, a conspiracy formed against him on that emperor's death, 250, 251. Is put to death, 251.
Abu Agub, his history, and the veneration paid to his memory by the Mahometans, 927, 1182.
Abubcker, the friend of Mahomet, is one of his first converts, 874. Flies from Mecca with him, 875. Succeeds Mahomet as caliph of the Saracens, 880. His character, 892. Invades Syria, 897.
Abu Caab commands the Andalusian Moors who subdued the island of Crete, 940.
Abu Sophian, prince of Mecca, conspires the death of Mahomet, 875. Battles of Beder and Uhud, 877, 878. Besieges Medina without success, 878. Surrenders Mecca to Mahomet, and receives him as a prophet, 879.
Abu Taher, the Carmathian, pillages Mecca, 945.
Abulfeda, his account of the splendour of the caliph Motadar, 935.
Abulpharagus, primate of the Eastern Jacobites, some account of, 800. His encomium on wisdom and learning, 936.
Abundantius, general of the East, and patron of the eunuch Eutropius, is disgraced and exiled by him, 306.
Abyla, the fair of, plundered by the Saracens, 902.
Abyssinia, the inhabitants of, described, 686. Their alliance with the emperor Justinian, 697. Ecclesiastical history of, 803, 804.
Acacius, bishop of Amida, an uncommon instance of episcopal benevolence, 517.
Achaia, its extent, 9.
Acre, the memorable siege of, by the crusaders, 1031. Final loss of, 1037.
Actions, institutes of.
Actum, a review of.
Adacturus, the only.
persecution under Diocletian, 217.
Adolphus, the brother of Alaric, brings him a reinforcement of troops, 487. Is made count of the domestics to the new emperor Attalus, 488. Succeeds his brother as king of the Goths, and concludes a peace with Honorius, 494. Marches into Spain, 504. His death, ibid.
Adoption, the two kinds of, under the Greek empire, 1029, note 87.
Adoration of the Roman emperor, custom of, and derivation of the term, 926.
Adurno, the Genesee governor of Phocæa, conveys Amurath I. from Asia to Europe, 1170.
Adrian I, pope, his alliance with Charlemagne against the Lombards, 812. His reception of Charlemagne at Rome, 844. Asserts the fictitious donation of Constantine the Great, 844.
Adultery, distinctions of, and how punished by Augustus, 729. B. The Christian emperors 727.
Ægidius, revolt of, in Gaul, 530. His death, ibid.

Ælia Capitolina, founded on Mount Sion, by Hadrian, 171.
Ælius Pictus, his Tripartite, the oldest work of Roman jurisprudence, 721.
Æmilianus, governor of Pannonia and Mæsia, routs the barbarous invaders of the empire, and is declared emperor by his troops, 95, 96. His death, 96.
Æneas of Gaza, his attestation of the miraculous gift of speech to the Catholic confessors of Tipasa, whose names had been put out, 887.
Æt, the activity of an 1184, 1185. His epigram on the destruction of ancient buildings in Rome, 1222, note 30.
Æra of the world, remarkable epochs in, pointed out, 651, note 103.
Æra, Gelaan, of the Turks, when settled, 1013.
Ærial tribute, in the Eastern empire, what, 639.
Ælius, surmamed the Atheist, his character and adventures, 229, 303, 308, note 130.
Ælius, the Roman general under Valentinian III., his character, 519. His treacherous scheme to ruin count Boniface, 520. Is forced to retire into Pannonia, 526. His invitation of the Huns into the empire, 528. Seizes the administration of the Western empire, ibid. His character, as given by Renatus, a contemporary historian, ibid. Employs the Huns and Alani in the defence of Gaul, 529. Concludes a peace with Theodoric, 540. Raises the siege of Orleans, 542. Battle of Chalons, 544. His prudence on the invasion of Italy by Attila, 540. Is murdered by Valentinian, 549.
Africa, its situation and revolutions, 10. Great revenue raised from, by the Romans, 61. Progress of Christianity there, 191. Is distracted with religious discord in the time of Constantine the Great, 202, 293. Character and revolt of the Circuncellions, 313. Oppressions of, under the government of count Romanus, 385. General state of, 386, 387. Revolt of count Boniface there, 520. Arrival of Genseric king of the Vandals, 521. Persecution of the Donatists, ibid. Devastations of, by the Vandals, 522. Carthage surprised by Genseric, 524. His treatment of the African exiles and captives, 524, 525. Persecution of the Catholics, 522—584. Expedition of Belisarius to, 654. Is recovered by the Romans, 658. The government of, settled by Justinian, 659. Revolt of the troops there, under Stroz, 688. Devastation of the war, 689. Invasion of, by the Saracens, 914. Final conquest of, by Akbal, 917. Decline and extinction of Christianity there, 925. Revolt and independence of the Saracens there, 945.
Agilabius, the Saracen dynasty of, 517.
Agla, a Roman lady, patronises St. Boniface, 518.
Aglicola, review of his conduct in Britain, 2.
Agriculture, great improvement of, in the western countries of the Roman empire, 50, 51. Encouraged in Persia by Zoroaster, 765. State of, in the Eastern empire, under Justinian, 655.
Ajar, the sepulchre of, how distinguished, 122.
Azanadin, battle of, between the Saracens and the Greeks, 809.
Abbas, the Saracen, his exploits in Africa, 915—917.
Alani invade Asia, but are repulsed by the emperor Tacitus, 122, 123. Conquest of, by the Huns, 401. Join the Goths who had emigrated into Thrace, 467. See Goths, and Vandals.
Alaric, the Goth, learns the art of war under Theodosius the Great, 477. Becomes the leader of the Gothic revolt, and ravages Greece, 489, 490. Escapes from Stetho, 461. Is appointed master general of the Eastern Illyrium, ibid. His invasion of Italy, 462. Is defeated by Stetho at Pollentia, 464. Is driven out of Italy, 464, 465. Is, by treaty with Honorius, declared master general of the Roman armies throughout the prefecture of Illyrium, 472. His plans and preparations for marching to Rome, 473. His march to Rome, 474. His capture of Rome, 475. His death, 476. His second siege of Rome, 488. His death, 488.
Alaric, the Goth, learns the art of war under Theodosius the Great, 477. Becomes the leader of the Gothic revolt, and ravages Greece, 489, 490. Escapes from Stetho, 461. Is appointed master general of the Eastern Illyrium, ibid. His invasion of Italy, 462. Is defeated by Stetho at Pollentia, 464. Is driven out of Italy, 464, 465. Is, by treaty with Honorius, declared master general of the Roman armies throughout the prefecture of Illyrium, 472. His plans and preparations for marching to Rome, 473. His march to Rome, 474. His capture of Rome, 475. His death, 476. His second siege of Rome, 488. His death, 488.

- on the Imperial throne, 489. Degrades him, ibid. Seizes the city of Rome, 490—492. His sack of Rome compared with that by the emperor Charles V., 493. Retires from Rome, and ravages Italy, ibid. His death and burial, 494.
- Alaric II., king of the Goths, his overthrow by Clovis king of the Franks, 504.
- Alberic, the son of Marozia, his revolt, and government of Rome, 854.
- Albigens of France, persecution of, 971.
- Albinus. See Clodius Albinus.
- Alboin, king of the Lombards, his history, 743. His alliance with the Avars against the Gepidae, 744. Reduces the Gepidae, ibid. He undertakes the conquest of Italy, ibid. Overruns what is now called Lombardy, 745, 746. Assumes the regal title there, 746. Takes Pavia, and makes it his capital city, ibid. Is murdered at the instigation of his queen Rosamond, ibid.
- Alchemy, the books of, in Egypt, destroyed by Diocletian, 138.
- Alemanni. See Allmanni.
- Aleppo, siege and capture of, by the Saracens, 906. Is recovered by the Greeks, 948. Is taken and sacked by Tamerlane, 1130.
- Alexander, pope, establishes the papal election in the college of cardinals, 1196.
- Alexander, archbishop of Alexandria, excommunicates Arius for his errors, 297.
- Alexander Severus, is declared Caesar by the emperor Elagabalus, 56. Is raised to the throne, 57. Education and virtuous temper, ibid. Journal of his ordinary life, 57, 58. Happiness of the world under his administration, 58. Attempts to reform the army, ibid. Sedition of the praetorian guards, 59. His firmness during a sedition of one of the legions, ibid. Detects of his reign and character, 60. His murder by Maximin, 65. Examination into his pretended victory over Artaxerxes, 79. Showed a regard for the Christian religion, 210.
- Alexandria, a general massacre there, by order of the emperor Caracalla, 52. The city described, 106. Is ruined by ridiculous intestine commotions, ibid. By famine and pestilence, ibid. Is besieged and taken by Diocletian, 138. The Christian theology reduced to a systematical form in the school of, 190. Number of martyrs who suffered there in the persecution by Decius, 905. The theological system of Plato taught in the school of, and received by the Jews there, 294.
- Outrages at
of his succe
distracted l
The city life and Restora-shed by y an earthquake, 395.
there, 443. This temple, and the famous library, destroyed by bishop Theophilus, 443, 444. Is taken by Amrour the Saracen, 910, 911. The famous library destroyed, 911, 912.
- Alexus Angelus, his usurpation of the Greek empire, and character, 1061. Dies before the crusaders, 1067.
- Alexius I Comnenus, emperor of Constantinople, 826. New titles of dignity invented by him, 953. Battle of Dazazzo, 957. Solicits the aid of the emperor Henry III., 958. Solicits the aid of the Christian princes against the Turks, 1047. His suspicious policy on the arrival of the crusaders, 1062. Exacts homage from them, 1069. Profits by the success of the crusaders, 1041, 1042.
- Alexius II Comnenus, emperor of Constantinople, 828.
- Alexius Strategopulus, the Greek general, retakes Constantinople from the Latins, 1044.
- Alexius, the son of Isaac Angelus, his escape from his uncle, who had deposed his father, 1062. His treaty with the crusaders for his restoration, 1063. Restoration of his father, 1069. His death, 1071.
- Affred sends an embassy to the shrine of St. Thomas in India, 708.
- Algebra, by whom invented, 937.
- Ali, joins Mahomet in his prophetic mission, 575. His heroism, 579. His character, 585. Is chosen caliph of the Saracens, 587. Devotion paid at his tomb, 588. His posterity, ibid.
- Aligern, defends Cumae, for his brother Teias, king of the Goths, 758. Is reduced, ibid.
- Allatus murders Carausius, and usurps his station, 136.
- Allmanni, the origin and warlike spirit of, 97. Invade Gaul and Italy, 98. Are driven out of Italy by the senate and people, ibid. Invade the empire under Aetian, 112. Are totally routed, 113. Invade and establish themselves in Gaul, 170. Are defeated at Strasburgh by Jul. in, 572, 573. Are reduced by Julian in his expeditions beyond the Rhine, 574. Invade Gaul under the emperor Valentinian, 575. Are reduced by Julian, 580. Are chastised by Valentinian, ibid. Are subdued by Clovis king of the Franks, 590.
- Alp Arslan, sultan of the Turks, his reign, 1010.
- Alpyus, governor of Britain, is commissioned by the emperor Julian to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, 340.
- Amala, king of the Goths, his high credit among them, 92.
- Amalasontha, queen of Italy, her history and character 653, 664. Her death, 664.
- Amisiph, description of the city, and its commerce, 993.
- Amazons, improbability of any society of, 118, note 78.
- Ambition, reflections on the violence, and various operations of that passion, 802, 833.
- Ambrose, St., composed a treatise on the Trinity, for the use of the emperor Gratian, 418, note 4. His birth, and promotion to the archbishopric of Milan, 426, 427. Opposes the Arian worship of the empress Justina, 427. Refuses obedience to the Imperial power, 428. Controls the emperor Theodosius, 434. Imposes penance on Theodosius for his cruel treatment of Thessalonica, ibid. Employed his influence over Gratian and Theodosius, to inspire them with maxims of persecution, 439. Opposes Symmachus, the advocate for the old Pagan religion, 441. Comforts the citizens of Florence with a dream, when besieged by Radagaisus, 468.
- Amantius, the eunuch, death of, 627.
- Amada, siege of, by Sapor king of Persia, 269. Receives the fugitive inhabitants of Nisibis, 366. Is besieged and taken by Cabades king of Persia, 647.
- Amir, prince of Ionia, his character, and passage into Europe, 1120.
- Ammonius, the historian, his religious character of the emperor Constantine, 302. His remark on the enmity of Christians toward each other, ibid. His account of the fiery obstructions to restoring the temple of Jerusalem, 340. His account of the hostile contest of Demasus and Ursinus for the bishopric of Rome, 378. Testimony in favour of his historical merit, 414 and note 113. His character of the nobles of Rome, 480—482.
- Ammonius, the mathematician, his measurement of the circuit of Rome, 484.
- Ammonius, the monk of Alexandria, his martyrdom, 782.
- Anomium, siege and destruction of, by the caliph Motassem, 943.
- Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium, gains the favour of the emperor Theodosius by an orthodox bon mot, 421.
- Amphitheatre at Rome, a description of, 131, 132.
- Anron, his birth and character, 908. His invasion and conquest of Egypt, 909, 910. His administration there, 912, 913. His description of the country, 913.
- Annajah I., sultan of the Turks, his reign, 1121, 1122.
- Anurath II., sultan, his reign and character, 1137. 1160—1162.
- Anchoritis, in monkish history, described, 578.
- Anacleus, pope, his Jewish extraction, 1199.
- Anastasia I marries the empress Aradine, 615. His war with Theodoric, the Ostrogoth king of Italy, 619, 620. His economy celebrated, 618. His long wall from the Propontis to the Euxine, 643, 646. Is humbled by the Catholic clergy, 791.
- Anastasia II, emperor of Constantinople, 811. His preparations of defence against the Saracens, 928, 929.
- Anastatus, St., his brief history and martyrdom, 769, note 63.
- Anatho, the city of, on the banks of the Euphrates, described, 333.
- Andathena, derivation of the name of that province, 918, note 16b.
- Andronicus, president of Lybia, excommunicated by Synesius bishop of Ptolemais, 290.
- Andronicus Comnenus, his character, and first adventures, 824—826. Seizes the empire of Constantinople, 821. His unhappy fate, 832.
- Andronicus, the Elder, emperor of Constantinople, his superstition, 1035. His war with his grandson, and abdications, 1102. His death, 1104.
- Andronicus, the Younger, emperor of Constantinople, his licentious character, 1102. His civil war against his grandfather, 1103. His reign, 1103, 1104. Is vanquished and wounded by sultan Orchan, 1119. His private application to pope Benedict XII. of Rome, 1144.
- Anegra, battle of, between Tamerlane and Bajazet, 1153.
- Anagnin, bishop of Orleans, his pious anxiety for the relief of that city, when besieged by Attila the Hun, 542.
- Annan family at Rome, brief history of, 478.
- Anna Comnena, character of her history of her father, Alexius I emperor of Constantinople, 826. Her conspiracy against her brother John, ibid.
- Anthimus, emperor of the West, his descent, and investiture by Leo the Great, 562. His election confirmed at Rome, 562, 563. Is killed in the sack of Rome by Ricimer, 568.
- Anthimus, prefect of the East, character of his administration, in the minority of the emperor Theodosius the Younger, 565, 714.
- Anthimus the architect, instances of his great knowledge in mechanics, 641. Forms the design of the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, 642.

- Anthony, St., father of the Egyptian monks, his history, 573
- Anthropomorphites, among the early Christians, personifications of the Deity, 779, 780.
- Antioch taken and destroyed by Sapor king of Persia, 162. Flourishing state of the Christian church there, in the reign of Theodosius, 190. History of the body of St. Babylas, bishop of, 343. The cathedral of, shut up, and its wealth confiscated, by the emperor Julian, 344. Licentious manners of the citizens, 350. Popular discontents during the residence of Julian there, 351. Sedition there, against the emperor Theodosius, 422. The city pardoned, 455. Is taken and ruined, by Chosroes I king of Persia, 689. Great destruction there by an earthquake, 714. Is again seized by Chosroes II, 768. Is reduced by the Saracens, and razed, 965. Is recovered by the Greeks, 948. Besieged and taken by the first crusaders, 1033—1036. Final capture of, by the Mahometans, 1077.
- Antonia, the wife of Belisarius, her character, 673. Examine and her history, 674. Her secret history, 677. Her activity, 678. Her secret history, 677. Her activity, 678.
- Antoninus, a Roman refugee at the court of Sapor king of Persia, stimulates him to an invasion of the Roman provinces, 288.
- Antoninus Pius, his character compared with that of Hadrian, 30. Is adopted by Hadrian, 30.
- Antoninus Marcus, his defensive wars, 4. Is adopted by Pius at the instance of Hadrian, 29. His character, 30. His indulgence to his wife Faustina, 32; and to his son Commodus, ibid. His war against the united Germans, 89. Suspicious story of his edict in favour of the Christians, 200.
- Apraxius, praetorian praefect, and father-in-law to the emperor Numerian, is killed by Diocletian as the presumptive murderer of that prince, 132.
- Aparhan, the Persian, his embassy from Narses king of Persia, to the emperor Galerius, 141.
- Apocalypse, why now admitted into the canon of the Scriptures, 177, note 67.
- Apocaucus, admiral of Constantine, his confederacy against John Cantacuzene, 1105. His death, 1106.
- Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea, his hypothesis of the divine incarnation of Jesus Christ, 750.
- Apollinaris, patriarch of Alexandria, butchers his flock in defence of the Catholic doctrine of the incarnation, 802.
- Apollonius of Tyana, his doubtful character, 115, note 63.
- Apollonius of the Roman emperors, how this custom was introduced, 56, 57.
- Apismar dethrones Leontius emperor of Constantinople, and usurps his place, 849.
- Apulia is conquered by the Normans, 889. Is confirmed to them by papal grant, 999.
- Aquila, besieged by the emperor Maximian, 71. Is taken and destroyed by Attila king of the Huns, 546.
- Aquitain is settled by the Goths, under their king Wallia, 501. Is conquered by Clovis king of the Franks, 555.
- Arabia, its situation, soil, and climate, 858, 859. Its division into the Saudi, the Stomy, and the Happy, 854. The pastoral Arabs, ibid. Their horses and camels, 869. Cities of, ibid. Manners and customs of the Arabs, 861. Their language, 862. Their benevolence, 864. National independence, 861. Character, 862—864. History and description of the Caaba of Mecca, 865. Religions, 866. Life and doctrine of Mahomet, ibid. Conquest of, by Mahomet, 880. Character of the caliphs, 892. Rapid conquests of, 893. Limits of their conquests, 927. Three caliphs established, 924. Introduction of learning among the Arabians, 956. Their progress in the sciences, 957. Their literary deficiencies, 958. Decline and fall of the caliphs, 946.
- Arbeto, a veteran under Constantine the Great leaves his retirement to oppose the usurper Procopius, 572.
- Arbogastes, the Frank, his military promotion under Valentinian against Theodosius, and by Theodosius, and
- Arri, a tribe of the Lygians, their terrific mode of waging war, 125.
- Arintheus, is appointed general of the horse by the emperor Julian in his Persian expedition, 352. Distinguishes himself against the usurper Procopius, 573.
- Arizans seizes two thirds of the lands of the Sequani in Gaul, for himself and his German followers, 349.
- Aristobolus, principal minister of the house of Carus, is received into confidence by the emperor Diocletian, 133.
- Aristotle, his logic better adapted to the detection of error, than for the discovery of truth, 477.
- Arms, is excommunicated for heretical notions concerning the Trinity, 297. Strength of his party, ibid. His opinions examined in the council of Nice, 238. Account of Arrian sects, 239. Council of Rimini, 300. 303. His banishment and recall, 301. His suspicious craft, ibid. The Arians persecute the Catholics in Africa, 582.
- Armenia, is seized by Sapor king of Persia, 162. Tridates restored, 130. He is again expelled by the Persians, 140. Is resigned to Tridates by treaty between the Romans and Persians, 142. Is rendered tributary to Persia, on the death of Tridates, 252. Character of Arsaces Tiranus, king of, and his conduct toward the emperor Julian, 351, 352. Is reduced by Sapor to a Persian province, 387. Its distractions and division between the Persians and the Romans, 517. History of Christianity there, 801.
- Arms of the Eastern empire, state of, under the emperor Maurice, 764.
- Armenia, the provinces of, form a free government independent of the Romans, 502. Submits to Clovis king of the Franks, 701. Settlement of Britons in, 637, 638.
- Armour, defensive, is laid aside by the Romans, and adopted by the barbarians, 439.
- Arms of the Roman legions, described, 5, 6.
- Arnold of Brescia, his heresy, and history, 1189, 1190.
- Araggon, derivation of the name of that province, 8, note 70.
- Arrian, his visit to, and description of, Colchos, 681.
- Arsaces Tiranus, king of Armenia, his character, and disaffection to the emperor Julian, 351, 352. Withdraws his troops treacherously from the Roman service, 358. His disastrous end, 387.
- Arsenius, patriarch of Constantinople, excommunicates the emperor Michael Palaeologus, 1094. Faction of the Arsenites, ibid.
- Artaban, king of Parthia, is defeated and slain by Artaxerxes king of Persia, 75.
- Artaban, his conspiracy against the emperor Justinian, 704. Is intrusted with the conduct of the armament sent to Italy, 703.
- Artasires, king of Armenia, is deposed by the Persians at the instigation of his own subjects, 717.
- Artavasdes, his revolt against the Greek emperor Constantine V. at Constantinople, 857.
- Ataxerxes, restores the Persian monarchy, 74. Prohibits every worship but that of Zoroaster, 77. Establishes the royal authority in the Persian provinces, ibid. His war with the Romans, 79. His character and maxims, 80.
- Atenius, duke of Egypt under Constantine, is condemned to death under Julian, for cruelty and corruption, 27.
- Arthur, king of the Britons, his history obscured by monkish notions, 657.
- Artulcy of the Roman legions, 6.
- Arundus, praetorian praefect of Gaul, his trial and condemnation by the Roman senate, 506.
- Ascan, battle of, between Godfrey king of Jerusalem, and the sultan of Egypt, 1038.
- Aschew, in ecclesiastical history, account of, 572.
- Asipodatus reduces and kills the British usurper Allectus, 126.
- Asia, summary view of the revolutions in that quarter of the world, 74.
- Asa Minor described, 9, 10. Amount of its tribute to Rome, 61. Is conquered by the Turks, 1014.
- Asiarch, the nature of this office among the ancient Pagans, 158, note 151.
- Aspar, is commissioned by Theodosius the Younger to conduct Valentinian III to Italy, 518. Places his steward Leo on the throne of the Eastern empire, 562. He and his sons murdered by Leo, 612.
- Assassins, the principality of, destroyed by the Moguls, 1115.
- Assemblies of the people abolished under the Roman emperors, 26. The nature of, among the ancient Germans, 83.
- Assyria, the province of, described, 353, 354. Is invaded by the emperor Julian, 54. His retreat, 504.
- Asatir, her image brought from Carthage to Rome, as a spouse for Elagabalus, 5.
- Asaphus, king of the Lombards, takes the city of Ravenna, and attacks Rome, 81. Is repulsed by Pepin king of France, 82.

Astronomy, why cultivated by the Arabian astronomers, 138.

Athalaric, the son of Amalasontha queen of Italy, his education and character, 164.

Athalaric, the Gothic chief, his war against the emperor Valens, 270. His alliance with Theodosius, his death and funeral, 415.

Athanasius, St., confesses his understanding bewildered by meditating on the divinity of the Logos, 128. General view of his opinions, 297. Is banished, 301, 322. His character and adventures, 302—310, 345, 346. His death, 377. Was not the author of the famous creed under his name, 784, note 114.

Athanasius, patriarch of Constantinople, his contests with the Greek emperor Anthonius the Elder, 1101, 1102.

Athenais, daughter of the philosopher Leontius. See Eudocia.

Athens, the libraries in that city, why said to have been spared by the Goths, 102. Naval strength of the republic, during its prosperity, 164, note 166. Is laid under contribution by Alaric the Goth, 469. Review of the philosophical history of, 648, 654. The schools of, silenced by the emperor Justinian, 619. Revolutions of, after the crusades, and its present state, 1106, 1101.

Atmos, Mount, beatific visions of the monks of, 1108, 1109.

Atlantic Ocean, derivation of its name, 10.

Attacotti, a Caledonian tribe of cannibals, account of, 884.

Attalus, prefect of Rome, is chosen emperor by the senate, under the influence of Alaric, 489. Is publicly degraded, ibid. His subsequent fortune, 490.

Attalus, a noble youth of Auvergne, his adventures, 601, 602.

Attila, the Hun, 527. Description of his person and character, ibid. His conquests, 528, 529. His treatment of his captives, 540. Imposes terms of peace on Theodosius the Younger, 521, 532. Oppresses Theodosius by his ambassadors, 533. Description of his royal residence, 544. His reception of the ambassadors of Theodosius, 533. His behaviour on discovering the scheme of Theodosius to get him assassinated, 537. His haughty messages to the emperors of the East and West, 538. His invasion of Gaul, 542. His oration to his troops on the approach of Ætius and Theodoric, 544. Battle of Chalons, ibid. His invasion of Italy, 543, 546. His retreat purchased by Valentinian, 547. His death, 548.

Atys and Cybele, the fable of, allegorised by the pen of Julian, 532.

Avars, are discomfited by the Turks, 684. Their embassy to the emperor Justinian, ibid. Their conquests in Poland and Germany, ibid. Their embassy to Justin II., 743. They join the Lombards against the Gepidae, 744. Pride, policy, and power, of their chagan Baian, 762. Their conquests, 763. Invest Constantinople, but are repulsed, 773, 774.

Averroes, his religious infidelity, how far justifiable, 938, note 72.

Aversa, a town near Naples, built as a settlement for the Normans, 999.

Augustus, Roman, their number and peculiar office, 439.

Augustus, his account of the miracles wrought by the body of St. Stephen, 448. Celebrates the piety of the Goths in the sacking of Rome, 190. Approves the persecution of the Donatists of Africa, 521. His death, character, and writings, 523. History of his relics, 638, note 22.

Augustulus, son of the patrician Orestes, is chosen emperor of the West, 569. Is deposed by Odoacer, 570. His banishment to the Lucullan villa in Campania, ibid.

Augustus, emperor, his moderate exercise of power. 1. Is imitated by his successors, ibid. His naval regulations, 7. His division of Gaul, 8. His situation after the battle of Actium, 23. He reforms the senate, ibid. Resigns his usurped power, ibid. Is prevailed upon to resume it under the title of emperor or general, 25, 24. Division of the provinces between him and the senate, 24. Is allowed his military command and guards in the city of Rome, 25. Obtains the consular and tribunician offices for life, ibid. His character and policy, 27. Adopts Tiberius, 28. Formed an accurate register of the revenues and expenses of the empire, 60. Taxes instituted by him, 61. His naval establishments at Ravenna, 491.

Augustus and Cæsar, those titles explained and discriminated, 27. Two Augusti and two Cæsars appointed, 145, 146.

Avicenna, his character and embassy from Valentinian III. to Attila king of the Huns, 547.

Argmon, the holy see how transferred from Rome to that city, 1197. Return of pope Urban V. to Rome, 1211.

Arvisius, his embassy from Ætius to Theodoric king of the Visigoths, 543. Assumes the empire, 553. His deposition and death, 555, 556.

Aurclan, emperor, his birth and services, 110. His successful reign, ibid. Severe discipline, 111. Concludes a treaty with the Goths, ibid. Resigns to them the province of Dacia, ibid. Defeats the Alamanii, 113. His expedition against Palmyra, 115—117. His triumph, 117. His clemency to his rivals, 118. He suppresses a sedition at Rome, ibid. His cruelty and death, 119.

Aurungzeb, account of his immense camp, 78, note 41.

Aurculus is invested with the purple on the Upper Danube, 107. His death, 108.

Aurum, the tutor of the emperor Gratian, his promotions, 418, note 2.

Aurthur, king of the Lombards in Italy, his wars with the Franks, 750. His adventurous gallantry, 752.

Autun, the city of, stormed and plundered by the legions in Gaul, 114.

Auvergne, province and city of, in Gaul, revolutions of, 660, 661.

Auxiliaries, barbarian, introduced into the Roman armies, 6. The fatal consequences of such admission, 260.

Azech, a Turkish slave, his generous friendship to the princess Anna Comnena, 827. And to Manuel Comnenus, ibid.

Avanturiers, the citizens of, defend their privileges against Peter, brother of the Eastern emperor Maurice, 763, 764.

Azamus, remarkable spirit shown by the citizens of, against Attila and his Huns, 532.

B

Baalbec, description of the ruins of, 903.

Babylas, St., bishop of Antioch, his posthumous history, 543, 544.

Babaud, in Gaul, revolt of, its occasion, and suppression by Maximian, 114, 135.

Bagdad becomes the royal residence of the Abbassides, 935. Derivation of the name, ibid. note 43. The fallen state of the caliphs of, 946, 1046. The city of, stormed and sacked by the Moguls, 1069.

Bahram, the Persian general, his character and exploits, 750. Is provoked to rebellion, ibid. Dethrones Chosroes, 760. His usurpation and death, 761.

Baijan, chagan of the Avars, his pride, policy, and power, 762. His perfidious seizure of Sirimium and Singdunum, 763. His conquests, ibid. His treacherous attempt to seize the emperor Heraclius, 770. Invests Constantinople in conjunction with the Persians, 773. Retires, 774.

Bajazet I., sultan of the Turks, his reign, 1123, 1123. His correspondence with Tamerlane, 1125. Is defeated and captured by Tamerlane, 1132. Enquiry into the story of the iron cage, ibid. His sons, 1136, 1137.

Balthus elected joint emperor with Maximus, by the senate, on the deaths of the two Gordians, 71.

Baldwin, count of Flanders, engages in the fourth crusade, 1062. Is chosen emperor of Constantinople, 1075. Is taken prisoner by Calo-John, king of the Bulgarians, 1079. His death, ibid.

Baldwin II., emperor of Constantinople, 1062. His distresses and expedients, 1083. His expulsion from that city, 1085.

Baldwin, brother of Godfrey of Bouillon, accompanies him on the first crusade, 1025. Founds the principality of Edessa, 1033.

Baltic Sea, progressive subsidence of the water of, 81, note 1. How the Romans acquired a knowledge of the naval powers of, 381, note 103.

Baptism, theory and practice of, among the primitive Christians, 272.

Barbary, the name of that country, whence derived, 917, note 162. The Moors of, converted to the Mahometan faith, 918.

Barbato, general of infantry in Gaul under Julian, his misconduct, 272.

Barcochebas, his rebellion against the emperor Hadrian, 135.

Bards, Celtic, their power of exciting a martial enthusiasm in the people, 87, 88.

Bards, British, their peculiar office and duties, 609.

Barbas, Cæsar, one of the restorers of learning, 964.

Bari is taken from the Saracens by the joint efforts of the Latin and Greek empires, 985.

Barlaam, a Calabrian monk, his dispute with the Greek theologians about the light of Mount Thabor, 1108. His embassy to Rome, from Andronicus the Younger, 1111. His literary character, 1153.

Basil I., the Macedonian, emperor of Constantinople, 817, 818. Reduces the Paulicians, 969.

Basil II., emperor of Constantinople, 821, 822. His great wealth, 944. His inhuman treatment of the Bulgarians, 974, 975.

Basil, archbishop of Cæsarea, no evidence of his having been persecuted by the emperor Valens, 777. Insults

- his friend Gregory Nazianzen, under the appearance of promotion, 422. The father of the monks of Pontus, 574.
- Eusiliscus, brother of the empress Verina, is intrusted with the command of the armament sent against the Vandals in Africa, 504. His fleet destroyed by Genseric, ibid. His promotion to the empire, and death, 615.
- Bassianus, high priest of the sun, his parentage, 54. Is proclaimed emperor at Etnesa, ibid. See Elagabalus.
- Bassianus, brother-in-law to Constantine, revolts against him, 100.
- Bessora, its foundation and situation, 894.
- Baths, public, of Rome, described, 483.
- Battle, reception of the emperor Julian there, 751.
- Beasts, wild, the variety of, introduced in the circus, for the public games at Rome, 150.
- Beausobin, M. de, character of his Histoire Critique du Manichéisme, 778, note 1.
- Bede, battle of, between Mahomet and the Koreish of Mecca, 877.
- Bedouines of Arabia, their mode of life, 864.
- Bey, remarks on the structure of their combs and cells, 9, 6, note 52.
- Belisarius, his birth and military promotion, 632. Is appointed by Justinian to conduct the African war, 653. Embarkation of his troops, 654. Lands in Africa, 655. Defeats Gelimer, 656. Is received into Carthage, ibid. Second defeat of Gelimer, 657. Reduction of Africa, 658, 659. Surrender of Gelimer, 659. His triumphant return to Constantinople, 659. Is declared sole consul, 661. He menaces the O-trogoths of Italy, 665. He seizes Sicily, 665. Invades Italy, 666. Takes Naples, 667. He enters Rome, 668. He is besieged in Rome by the Goths, ibid. The siege raised, 672, 673. Causes Constantine, one of his generals, to be killed, 673. Siege of Ravenna, 675. Takes Ravenna by stratagem, 676. Returns to Constantinople, ibid. His character and behaviour, 676, 677. Scandalous life of his wife Antonina, 677. His disgrace and submission, 678. Is sent into the East, 680. His politic ibid. His second attempt to retake Totila from destroying Rome, 704. Recovers the city, ibid. His final recall from Italy, 704. Rescues Constantinople from the Bulgarians, 711. His disgrace and death, 712.
- Benafre, in feudal language, explained, 599.
- Benvenuto, battle of, between Charles of Anjou, and Manfroy the Sicilian usurper, 1497.
- Beneventum, anecdotes relating to the siege of, 885.
- Benjamin of Tudela, his account of the riches of Constantinople, 953.
- Bereva, or Aleppo, reception of the emperor Julian there, 351.
- Bernard, St., his character and influence in promoting the second crusade, 1045. His character of the Romans, 1188.
- Berner, his account of the camp of Aurengzebe, 78, note 41.
- Berytus, account of the law school established there, 233. Is destroyed by an earthquake, 714.
- Bessarion, cardinal, his character, 1177.
- Besvas, governor of Rome for Justinian, his rapacity during the siege of that city by Totila the Goth, 701. Occasions the loss of Rome, 702.
- Bezabde, is taken and garrisoned by Sapor king of Persia, 289. Is ineffectually besieged by Constantius, 270.
- Bizaces, a Sasanian prince, deposes and puts to death Hormouz king of Persia, 559, 560.
- Birthright, the least invidious of all human distinctions, 64.
- Bishops, among the primitive Christians, the office of, explained, 183. Progress of episcopal authority, 184. Dignity of episcopal government, 188. Number of, at the time of Constantine the Great, 286. Mode of their election, 287. Their power of ordination, ibid. The ecclesiastical revenue of each diocese how divided, 289. Their civil jurisdiction, ibid. Their spiritual censures, ibid. Their legislative assemblies, 291.
- Bishops, rural, their rank and duties, 286.
- Bissacelle, superstitious regard to this year by the Romans, 370.
- Ethynic, the cities of, plundered by the Goths, 100. Conquest of, by Orchan, 1119.
- Blennynes, their revolt against the emperor Diocletian, 128.
- Buccace, his literary character, 1154.
- Euthius, the learned senator of Rome, his history, 624, 625. His imprisonment and death, 625.
- Bohemond, the son of Robert Guiscard, his character and military exploits, 925, 1025. His route to Constantinople on the crusade, 1025. His flattering reception by the emperor Alexius Comnenus, 1029. Takes Antioch, and obtains the principality of it, 1034. His subsequent transactions, and death, 1042.
- Bontface, St., his history, 218.
- Bontface, count, the Roman general under Valentinian 111, his character, 519. Is betrayed into a revolt by Etnus, 520. His timely repentance, 522. Is besieged in Hippo Regius by Genseric king of the Vandals, ibid. Returns to Italy, and is killed by Etnus, 523.
- Bontface V111, pope, his violent contest with Philip the Fair, king of France, and his character, 1197. Institutes the Jubilee, 1198.
- Bontface, marquis of Montferrat, is chosen general of the fourth crusade to the Holy Land, 1604. Is made king of Macedonia, 1670. Is killed by the Bulgarians, 1679.
- Bosphorus, revolutions of that kingdom, 97. Is seized by the Goths, ibid. The strait of, described, 222.
- Bosra, siege of, by the Saracens, 808.
- Boheric, the Imperial general in Thessalonica, murdered in a sedition, 433.
- Bonaccuti, marshal, defends Constantinople against Bajazet, 1125.
- Boudage, the port of, recovered from Carausius, by Constantius Chlorus, 156.
- Boudes, the Persian dynasty of, 946.
- Brancaleone, senator of Rome, his character, 1192.
- Bretagne, the province of, in France, settled by Britons, 607, note 136.
- Britain, reflections on the conquest of, by the Romans, 2. Description of, 8. Colonies planted in, 14, note 32. A colony of Vandals settled there by Probus, 126. Revolt of Carausius, 135. Is recovered by Constantius, 136. How first peopled, 382. Invasions of, by the Scots and Picts, 383. Is restored to peace by Theodosius, 384. Revolt of Maximus there, 419. Revolt of the Romans, 562. State of, until the arrival of the Saxons, 562, 563. Descent of the Saxons on, 605. Establishment of the Saxon heptarchy, ibid. Wars in, 606. Saxon devastation of the country, 607, 608. Manners of the independent Britons, 609. Description of, by Procopius, ibid. Conversion of the Britons by a mission from pope Gregory the Great, 755. The doctrine of the incarnation received there, 785.
- Brutus, the Trojan, his colonisation of Britain, now given up by intelligent historians, 582, note 108.
- Buffon, M., his extraordinary burning mirrors, 641, note 99.
- Bulgarians, their character, 681. Their inroads on the Eastern empire, 682. Invasion of, under Zabergan, 711. Repulsed by Belisarius, ibid. The kingdom of, destroyed by Basil II the Greek emperor, 822, 974. Emigration, 973. Revolt of, from the Greek empire, and submission to the pope of Rome, 973, 1064. War with the Greeks under Calisto John, 1078.
- Bull-fest, in the Coliseum at Rome, described, 1223, 1224.
- Burgundians, their settlement on the Elbe, and maxima of government, 881. Their settlement in Gaul, 361. Embrace Christianity, 580. Limits of the kingdom of, under Gundobald, 592. Are subdued by the Franks, 593.
- Bun-nut, character of his Sacred Theory of the Earth, 177, note 64.
- Burampooter, source of that river, 1129, note 26.
- Busr, in Egypt, four several places known under this name, 934, note 37.
- Buzurg, the philosophical preceptor of Hormouz king of Persia, his high reputation, 738, and note 8.
- Buzurg, the Persian, character of, 805. List and character of, 85, note 97.
- Buzurg, emperor Severus, 46. Is taken by Maximin, 161. Siege of, by Constantine the Great, 167. Its situation described, 222. By whom founded, ibid. note 2. See Constantinople.

C

- Caaba, or temple of Mecca, described, 865. The idols in, destroyed by Mahomet, 880.
- Cabades, king of Persia, besieges and takes Amida, 647. Seizes the straits of Caucasus, 648. Vicissitudes of his reign, 686.
- Cadesai, battle of, between the Saracens and the Persians, 805, 804.
- Cadyah, her marriage with Mahomet, 877. Is converted by him to his new religion, 873. Her death, 875. Mahomet's veneration for her memory, 884.
- Cecilian, the pecc of the church in Africa disturbed by him and his party, 232.
- Cecilius, the authority of his account of the famous vision of Constantine the Great, enquired into, 281, and note 41.
- Celestian, senator of Carthage, his distress on the taking of that city by Genseric, 523, 524.
- Cesar, Julius, his inducement to the conquest of Britain, 2. Degrades the senatorial dignity, 51, note 2. Assumes a place among the titular deities of Rome, in his life-time, 58. His address in appealing a military se-

- dition, 59, note 77. His prudent application of the coronary gold presented to him, 243.
- Cæsar* and Augustus, those titles explained and discriminated, 27.
- Cæsars*, of the emperor Julian, the philosophical fable of that work delineated, 247, 248.
- Cæsarea*, capital of Cappadocia, taken by Sapor king of Persia, 193. Is reduced by the Saracens, 907.
- Cahna*, queen of the Moors of Africa, her policy to drive the Arabs out of the country, 917, 918.
- Carraon*, the city of, founded in the kingdom of Tunis, 916.
- Caled*, Jeserts from the idolatrous Arabs to the party of Mahomet, 889. His gallant conduct at the battle of Muta, 881. His victories under the caliph Abubeker, 898. Attends the Saracen army on the Syrian expedition, 899. His valour at the siege of Damascus, ibid. Distinguishes himself at the battle of Aznadin, 902, 900. His cruel treatment of the refugees from Damascus, 902. Joins in plundering the fair of Abyla, ibid. Commands the Saracens at the battle of Yermuk, 904. His death, 907.
- Caledonia*, its ancient inhabitants described, 282, 283.
- Caledonian war*, under the emperor Severus, an account of, 49. Contrast of the Caledonians and Romans, ibid.
- Caliphs* of the Saracens, character of, 926. Their rapid conquests, 927. Triple division of the office, 924. Their power, 925. They patronise learning of their empire, 946 1046.
- of a religious sedition in that city opposed by St Ambrose, 454.
- Callimæus*, of Helopolis, assists in defending Constantinople against the Saracens, by his chemical inflammable compositions, 931.
- Calucks*, Black, recent emigration of, from the confines of Russia to those of China, 400.
- Calo-John*, the Bulgarian chief, his war with Baldwin, the Latin emperor of the Greeks, 1075. Defeats, and takes him prisoner, 1079. His savage character and death, 1080.
- Calocerus*, a camel-driver, excites an insurrection in the island of Cyprus, 243, and note 54.
- Calphurnius*, the machinery of his eclogue on the accession of the emperor Carus, 128.
- Calvin*, the reformer, his doctrine of the Eucharist, 971. Examination of his conduct to Servetus, 972, note 36.
- Camel*, of Arabia, described, 860.
- Camisards* of Languedoc, their enthusiasm compared with that of the Cimbri of Numidia, 314.
- Camp* of a Roman army described, 6.
- Campania*, the province of, desolated by the ill policy of the Roman emperors, 241. Description of the Lucullan villa in, 571.
- Canada*, the present climate and circumstances of, compared with those of ancient Germany, 81.
- Cannon*, enormous one of the sultan Mahomet II. described, 1171. Bursts, 1175.
- Canoes*, Russian, a description of, 981.
- Cantacuzene*, John, character of his Greek history, 1102. His good fortune under the younger Andronicus, 1105. Is driven to assume the purple, 1106. His lively distinction between foreign and civil war, ibid. His entry into Constantinople, and reign, 1107. Abdicates, and turns monk, 1108. His war with the Genoese factory at Pera, 1110. Marries his daughter to a Turk, 1141. His negotiation with pope Clement VI., 1145, 1142.
- Cantemur's* History of the Ottoman Empire, a character of, 1119, note 41.
- Capellanus*, governor of Mauritania, defeats the younger Gordian, and takes Carthage, 68.
- Capitulation-tax*, under the Roman emperors, an account of, 241, 242.
- Capito*, Ateus, the civilian, his character, 723.
- Capitol* of Rome, burning and restoration of, 242.
- Capipodocia*, famous for its fine breed of horses, 238.
- Capraria*, Isle of, character of the monks there, 457.
- Capricious*, how treated by the barbarians, 501 530, 531.
- Carpocilla*, son of the emperor Severus, his fixed antipathy to his brother Geta, 49. His ambition, ibid. Succeeds to the empire jointly with him, 50. Jealousy and hatred of the two emperors, ibid. Murders his brother, ibid. His remorse and cruelty, 51. Tyranny, ibid. Is himself murdered, 52. Tendency of his edict to extend the privileges of Roman citizens to all the free inhabitants of his empire, 63. Doubles the tax on legacies and inheritances, ibid.
- Caracorum*, the Tartar settlement of, described, 1117.
- Caracans*, Scythian, their route to and from China, for silk, to supply the Roman empire, 636.
- Caracius*, his revolt in Britain, 133. Is acknowledged by Diocletian and his colleagues, 137. His death, ibid.
- Caribæas*, the Paulician, his revolt from the Greek emperor to the Saracens, 906.
- Cardinals*, the election of a pope vested in them, 1193. Institution of the conclave, ibid.
- Carduene*, situation and history of that territory, 142.
- Carinus*, the son of Carus, succeeds his father in the empire, jointly with his brother Numerian, 129. His vices, ibid. Defeat and death, 132.
- Carizmians*, their invasion of Syria, 1055.
- Carlovingian* race of kings, commencement of, in France, 842, 843.
- Carmath*, the Arabian reformer, his character, 944. His military exploits, ibid.
- Carm. lites*, from whom they derive their pedigree, 573, note 5.
- Carpathian* mountains, their situation, 81.
- Carthage*, the bishopric of, bought for Majorinus, 211, note 127. Religious discord generated there by the factions of Cæcilian and Donatus, 292, 295. The temple of Venus there, converted into a Christian church, 443. Is surprised by Genseric king of the Vandals, 524. The gates of, opened to Belisarius, 657. Natural alterations produced by time in the situation of this city, ibid note 19. • The walls of, repaired by Belisarius, 657. Insurrection of the Roman troops there, 658. Is reduced and pillaged by Hassan the Saracen, 917. Subsequent history of, ibid.
- Carthage*, an extraordinary rich silver mine worked there, for the Romans, 61.
- Carus*, emperor, his election and character, 129. Victories and death, 129.
- Caspian* and Iberian gates of Mount Caucasus, distinguished, 647, 648.
- Cassians*, the party of, among the Roman civilians, explained, 723.
- Cassiodorus*, his Gothic history, 91. • His account of the infant state of the republic of Venice, 547. His long and prosperous life, 621.
- Cætriot*, George. See Scanderbeg.
- Catalans*, their service and war in the Greek empire, 1099, 1100.
- Catholic* church, the doctrines of, how discriminated from the opinions of the Platonic school, 295. The authority of, extended to the minds of mankind, 296. Faith of the Western or Latin church, 300. Is distracted by factions in the cause of Athanasius, 304. The dogology, how introduced, and how perverted, 511. The revenue of, transferred to the heathen priests, by Julian, 341. Edict of Theodosius, for the establishment of the Catholic faith, 421. The progressive steps of idolatry in, 447. Persecution of the Catholics in Africa, 582—584. Pious frauds of the Catholic clergy, 584. How bewildered by the doctrine of the Incarnation, 781. Union of the Greek and Latin churches, 795. Schism of the Greek church, 1053 1150, 1159.
- Celestine*, pope, espouses the party of Cyril against Nestorius, and pronounces the degradation of the latter from his episcopal dignity, 784.
- Celtic* language, driven to the mountains by the Latin, 15, note 39.
- Censor*, the office of, revived under the emperor Decius, but without effect, 94.
- Ceas*, the manufacture of silk first introduced to Europe from that island, 635.
- Cerca*, the principal queen of Attila king of the Huns, her reception of Maximin the Roman ambassador, 534, 535.
- Cerinthus*, his opinion of the twofold nature of Jesus Christ, 780.
- Ceylon*, ancient names given to that island, and the imperfect knowledge of, by the Romans, 348, note 6.
- Chalcedon*, the injurious situation of this city stigmatised by proverbial contempt, 222. A tribunal erected there by the emperor Julian, to try and punish the evil ministers of his predecessor Constantius, 327. A stately church built there by Theodosius, the infamous minister of the emperor Theodosius, 457. Is taken by Chosroes II. king of Persia, 763. Council of, 788.
- Chalcedonians*, the Greek historian, his remarks on the several nations of Europe, 1144, 1145.
- Chalons*, battle of, between the Romans and Attila king of the Huns, 543, 544.
- Chamavians* reduced and generously treated by Julian, 273.
- Chamberlain*, office of, 226.
- Chancellor*, the original and modern application of this word compared, 120, note 81.
- Characters*, national, the distinction of, how formed, 394.
- Charlots* of the Romans described, 480, note 57.
- Charlemagne* conquers the kingdom of Lombardy, 842. His reception at Rome, 843. Eludes fulfilling the promises of Pepin and himself to the Roman pontiff, 844. His coronation at Rome by the pope Leo III., 847. His reign and character, 848. Extension of his empire, 849, 850. His neighbours and enemies, 850. His successors, 851. His negotiations and treaty with the Eastern empire, 852. State of his family and dominions in the tenth century, 902.
- Charles* the Fat, emperor of the Romans, 857.
- Charles* of Anjou subdues Naples and Sicily, 1096. The Sedam Peppers, 1098. His character as a senator of Rome, 1193.
- Charles* IV., emperor of Germany, his weakness and po- verty, 877. His public ostentation, 838. Contrast between him and Augustus, ibid.

Charles V., emperor, parallel between him and Diocletian, 116. And between the sack of Rome by him, and that by Alaric the Goth, 492.
Chastity, its high esteem among the ancient Germans, 86. And the primitive Christians, 181, 182.
Chemistry, the art of, from whom derived, 9, 8.
Chersonesus, Thracian, how tortured by the emperor Justinian, 644, 645.
Chersonites assist Constantine the Great against the Goths, 249. Are cruelly persecuted by the Greek emperor Justinian II., 810.
Chess, the object of the game of, by whom invented, 688.
Childebert, king of France, deposed under papal sanction, 812.
Children, the exposing of, a prevailing vice of antiquity, 164, 729. Prohibited by Constantine, 164. Natural, according to the Roman laws, what, 731.
China, how distinguished in ancient history, 139, note 58. Great numbers of children annually exposed there, 187, note 144. Its situation, 327. The high chronology claimed by the historians of, ibid. The great wall of, when erected, 298. Was twice conquered by the Northern tribes, ibid. The Romans supplied with silk by the caravans from, 636. Is conquered by the Moguls, 1113, 1117. Expulsion of the Moguls, 1117.
Chualpy, origin of the order of, 1036, 1027.
Chudomir, prince of the Alemanni, taken prisoner by Julian at the battle of Strasburgh, 272, 273.
Chovros, king of Armenia, assassinated by the emissaries of Sapor king of Persia, 102.
Chosroes, son of Tiridates, king of Armenia, his character 253.
C . . . . . Persia, protects the last . . . . . in his treaty with the . . . . . of his history, 686—688. Sells a peace to Justinian, 688. His invasion of Syria, 689. His negotiations with Justinian, 695. His prosperity, 696. Battle of Mehtene, 737. His death, 738.
Chazars II. king of Persia, is raised to the throne on the deposition of his father Hormouz, 769. Is reduced to implore the assistance of the emperor Maurice, ibid. His restoration and policy, 761. Conquers Syria, 768. Palestine, ibid. Egypt and Asia Minor, 768, 769. His reign and magnificence, 769. Rejects the Mahometan religion, ibid. Imposes an ignominious peace on the emperor Heraclius, 770. His flight, deposition, and death, 775, 776.
Chozars, the horde of, sent by the Turks to the assistance of the emperor Heraclius, 774.
Christ, history of the doctrine of the incarnation of, 777, et seq. The festival of his birth, why fixed by the Romans at the winter solstice, 321, note 152.
Christians, primitive, the various sects into which they branched out, 171—175. Whether they were mean and ignorant, 182. Ascribed the Pagan idolatry to the agency of demons, 173. Believed the end of the world to be near at hand, 176. The miraculous powers ascribed to the primitive church, 178. Their faith stronger than in modern times, ibid. Their superior virtue and austerity, 179. Repentance, a virtue in high esteem among them, ibid. Their notions of marriage and chastity, 181. They disclaim war and government, 182. Were active, however, in the internal government of their own society, ibid. Bishops, 183. Synods, 184. Metropolitans and primates, ibid. Bishop of Rome, 185. Their probable proportion to the Pagan subjects of the empire before the conversion of Constantine the Great, 192. Enquiry into their persecutions, 194. Why more odious to the governing powers than the Jews, 195—197. Their religious meetings suspected, 197. And their manners calumniated, ibid. Are persecuted by Nero as the incendiaries of Rome, 199. Instructions of the emperor Trajan to Pliny the Younger for the regulation of his conduct towards them, 202. Remained exposed to popular resentment on public festivals, ibid. Legal mode of proceeding against them, 204. The ardour with which they earned martyrdom, 207. When allowed to erect places for public worship, 210. Their persecution under Diocletian and his associates, 214—218. An edict of toleration for them published by Galerius just before his death, 218. Some considerations necessary to be attended to . . . . . of the . . . . . 219. Edict . . . . . Great, 277. P . . . . . morality to Constantine, 288. Theory and practice of passive obedience, ibid. Their loyalty and zeal, 279. The sacrament of baptism, how administered in early times, 284. Extraordinary propagation of Christianity after it obtained the Imperial sanction, 285. Becomes the established religion of the Roman empire, 286. Spiritual and temporal powers distinguished, ibid. Review of the episcopal order in the church, 286—288. The ecclesiastical revenue of each diocese, how di- vided, 289. Their legislative assemblies, 291. Edict of Constantine the Great against heretics, 291, 292. Mysterious doctrine of the Trinity, 295. The doctrines of the Catholic church, how discriminated from the opinions of the Platonic school, 296. General character of the Christian sects, 314. Christian schools prohibited by the emperor Julian, 314. They are removed from all offices of trust, 312. Are obliged to renege the Pagan temples, ibid. Their imprudent and irregular zeal against idolatry, 346, 347.
Christians, distinction of, into vulgar and ascetic, 372. Conversion of the barbarous nations, 379.
Christianity, enquiry into the progress and establishment of, 168, 189—192. Religion and character of the Jews, 169. The Jewish religion the basis of Christianity, 170. Is offered to all mankind, ibid. The sects into which the Christians divided, 171—173. The theology of, reduced to a systematical form in the school of Alexandria, 199. Injudicious conduct of its early advocates, 198. Its persecutions, 199—202. First erection of churches, 210. The system of, found in Plato's doctrine of the Logos, 294. Salutary effects resulting from the conversion of the barbarous nations, 379. Its progress in the North of Europe, 384.
Chrysaphus, the eunuch, engages Edeon to assassinate his king Attila, 5, 6. Is put to death by the empress Pulcheria, 537. Assisted at the second council of Ephesus, 787.
Chrysosch, a, general of the revolted Panicians, over-runs and pillages Asia Minor, 900. His death, ibid.
Chrysosolus, Manuel, the Greek envoy, his character, 1155. His admiration of Rome and Constantinople, 1158.
Chrysopolis, battle of, between Constantine the Great and Licinius, 167.
Chrysostom, St., his account of the pompous luxury of the emperor Arcadius, 304. Protects his fugitive patron, the eunuch Eutropius, 308. History of his promotion to the archiepiscopal see of Constantinople, 310. His character and administration, 311. His persecution, 312. His death, ibid. His riches removed to Constantinople, 313. His eponym on the monastic life, 374, note 25.
Churches, Christian, the first erection of, 2, 0. Demolition of, under Diocletian, ibid. Splendour of, under Constantine the Great, 238. Seven, of Asia, the fate of, 1124.
Cibalus, battle of, between Constantine the Great and Licinius, 167.
Cicero, his view of the philosophical opinions as to the immortality of the soul, 175. His eponym on the study of the law, 718. System of his republic, 752.
Commencement, darkness, the expression of, whence derived, 441, note 42.
Circumcellions of Africa, Donatist schismatics, history of their revolt, 313. Their religious practices, 314. Persecution of, by the emperor Honorius, 314.
Circumcision of both sexes, a physical custom in Ethiopia, unconnected with religion, 804.
Circus, Roman, the four factions in, described, 631, 632. Constantinople, and the Eastern empire, distracted by these factions, 632.
Cities, number and greatness of, in the Roman empire, 19. Commercial, of Italy, rise and government of, 8, 5.
Citizens of Rome, motive of Caracalla for extending the privileges of, to all the free inhabitants of the empire, 63. Political tendency of this grant, ibid.
City, the birth of a new one, how celebrated by the Romans, 224, and note 3.
Civilians of Rome, origin of the profession, and the three periods in the history of, 7, 1, 7, 2.
Civitas, the Batavian, his successful revolt against the Romans, 88.
Claudian the . . . . . supply the murder of . . . . . 476. His character of the eunuch Eutropius, 305, 306.
Claudius, emperor, chosen by the praetorian guards, without the concurrence of the senate, 28.
Claudius, emperor, successor to Galienus, his character, and elevation to the throne, 198. His clemency and justice, ibid. He undertakes the reformation of the army, 109. Invaded by the Goths, ibid. His distress and firmness, ibid. His victory over the Goths, ibid. His death, 110.
Cleander, minister of the emperor Commodus, his history, 34, 35.
Clemens, Flavius, and his wife Domitilla, why distinguished as Christian martyrs, 202.
Clement III., pope, and the emperor Henry III. mutually confirm each other's sovereign characters, 988.
Clement V., pope, transfers the holy see from Rome to Avignon, 119.
Clement VII. elected pope, 1211.
Clapham, king of the Lombards, death of, 747.
Clay, when first introduced into the lute, 185, 286.
Clarks, the ranks and numbers of, how multiplied, 287. Their - property, 284. Their offices only cognisable by their own order, 289. Valentinian's edict to restrain the advance of, 377, 378.

- Chiron*, the first of the Merovingian race of kings of the Franks in Gaul, his reign, 549, 551.
- Clovis*, Albovis, governor of Britain, character of, 41, 42. Declares himself against Julianus, 42. His death, 46.
- Clotilda*, niece of the king of Burgundy, is married to Clovis king of the Franks, and converts her Pagan husband, 591. Exhorts her husband to the Gothic war, 594.
- Clovis*, king of the Franks, his descent, and reign, 591.
- Clausulus*, his account of the objects of adoration among the ancient Germans, 87, note 62.
- Cochleus*, importance of the discovery of, in the art of dyeing, 655, note 59.
- Code* of Justinian, how formed, 724. New edition of, 726.
- Codex*, how far admitted by the Roman law respecting testaments, 755.
- Conobates*, in monkish history, described, 773.
- Conuagie*, how regulated by the Roman Cæsar, 1191.
- Culcher*, the modern Mingrelia, described, 1201. Manners of the natives, ibid. Result of, from the Romans to the Persians, and repentance, 695. Colchian war, in consequence, 644, 635.
- Conscience*, of the emperor Titus, observations on, 1223.
- Exhibition of a bull-kiss in, 1233, 1225.
- Collydian* heretics, an account of, 593.
- Colones*, Roman, how planted, 14.
- Colonna*, history of the Roman family of, 1193, 1200.
- Colossus* of Rhodes, some account of, 908.
- Columns* of Hercules, their situation, 11.
- Comana*, the rich temple of, suppressed, and the revenues confiscated, by the emperors of the East, 238.
- Combat*, judicial, origin of, in the Saxe laws, 768. The laws of, according to the Assize of Jerusalem, 1041. Apology for the practice of, 1022, note 17.
- Comets*, account of those which appeared in the reign of Justinian, 713.
- Commentolus*, his disgraceful warfare against the Avars, 764.
- Commodus*, emperor, his education, character, and reign, 39—71. His death, 77.
- Comneni*, origin of the family of, on the throne of Constantinople, 821. Its extinction, 1185.
- Conception*, immaculate, of the Virgin Mary, the doctrine of, from whence derived, 801.
- Concubine*, according to the Roman civil law, explained, 751.
- Confagration*, general, ideas of the primitive Christians concerning, 177.
- Conquest*, the vanity of, not so justifiable as the desire of spoil, 384. Is rather achieved by art than personal valour, 527.
- Conrad III*, emperor, engages in the second crusade, 1042. His disastrous expedition, 1044.
- Conrad* of Montferrat defends Tyre against Saladin, 1051. Is assassinated, 1052.
- Constantine*, treaty of, 576.
- Constantine*, the third son of Constantine the Great, is sent to govern the western province of the empire, 248. Division of the empire among him and his brothers, on the death of their father, 251. Is murdered by his brother Constantine, 254. Is killed, on the usurpation of Magnentius, 255. Espoused the cause of Athanasius against his brother Constantine, 255.
- Constantin II*, emperor of Constantinople, 65.
- Constantina*, princess, grand-daughter of Constantine the Great, is carried by her mother to the camp of the usurper Procopius, 572. Narrowly escapes falling into the hands of the Quani, 321. Marries the emperor Gratian, 392.
- Constantina*, daughter of Constantine the Great, and widow of Hannibalianus, places the diadem on the head of the general Vetricius, 275. Is married to Galus, 290. Her character, 291. Dies, 262.
- Constantina*, widow of the Eastern emperor Maurice, the cruel fate of, and her daughters, 769.
- Constantine* the Great, the several opinions as to the place of his birth, 151, note 10. His history, 150. He is saluted emperor by the British legions on the death of his father, 151. Marries Fausta, the daughter of Maximian, 153. Puts Maximian to death, 155. General review of his administration in Gaul, 156. Undertakes to deliver Rome from the tyranny of Maxentius, 157, 158. Defeats Maxentius, and enters Rome, 160. His alliance with Licinius, 161. Defeats Licinius, 163, 164. Peace concluded with Licinius, 164. His laws, ibid. Chastises the Goths, 165. Second civil war with Licinius, 165, 166. Reunion of the empire under Constantine, 167. Motives which induced him to make Byzantium the capital of his empire, 221. Declares his determination to spring from divine command, 224. Despoils other cities of their ornaments to decorate his new capital, 225. Ceremony of dedicating his new city, 227. Form of civil and military administration established there, 228. Separates the civil from the military administration, 234. Corrupted military discipline, 237. His character, 234, 241. Account of his family, 241, 245. His jealousy of his son Crispus, 245. Mysterious deaths of Crispus and Licinius, 246. His repentance and acts of atonement enquired into, ibid. His sons and nephews, 247. Sends them to superintend the several provinces of the empire, 248. Assists the Sarmatians, and procures the Goths, 249. Reduces the Goths to peace, ibid. His death, 250. Attempt to ascertain the date of his conversion to Christianity, 276. His Pagan superstition, 277. Protects the Christians in Gaul, ibid. Publishes the edict of Milan, ibid. Motives which recommended the Christians to his favour, 278. Exhorts his subjects to embrace the Christian profession, 279. His famous standard the Labarum described, 280. His celebrated vision previous to his battle with Maxentius, 281. Story of the miraculous cross in the air, 282. His conversion accounted for, from natural and probable causes, 283. His theological discourses, ibid. His devotion and privileges, ibid. The delay of his baptism accounted for, 284. Is commemorated as a saint by the Greeks, 285. His edict against heretics, 292. Favours the cause of Cæcilian against Donatus, 293. His sensible letter to the bishop of Alexandria, 301. How prevailed on to ratify the Nicene council, 302. His levity in religion, ibid. Granted a toleration to his Pagan subjects, 317. His reform of Pagan abuses, ibid. Was associated with the Heathen Deities after his death, by a decree of the senate, 316. His discovery of the holy sepulchre, 320. Publication of his fictitious donation to the bishops of Rome, 344, 345. Fabulous interdict of marriage with strangers, ascribed to him, 377.
- Constantine II*, the son of Constantine the Great, is sent to preside over Gaul, 248. Division of the empire among him and his brothers, on the death of their father, 251. Invades his brother Constans, and is killed, 254.
- Constantine III*, emperor of Constantinople, 807.
- Constantine IV*, Pogonatus, emperor of Constantinople, 808.
- Constantine V*, Copronymus, emperor of Constantinople, 811. Fates of his five sons, 812. Revolt of Artavasdes, and troubles on account of image worship, 807. Abolishes the monkish order, ibid.
- Constantine VI*, emperor of Constantinople, 812.
- Constantine VII*, Porphyrogenitus, emperor of Constantinople, 813. His reign, 813—820. His death, 820. His reign, 820—829. His death, 829. His reign, 829—840. His death, 840. His reign, 840—846. His death, 846. His reign, 846—855. His death, 855. His reign, 855—869. His death, 869. His reign, 869—879. His death, 879. His reign, 879—895. His death, 895. His reign, 895—905. His death, 905. His reign, 905—912. His death, 912. His reign, 912—926. His death, 926. His reign, 926—944. His death, 944. His reign, 944—959. His death, 959. His reign, 959—975. His death, 975. His reign, 975—989. His death, 989. His reign, 989—1002. His death, 1002. His reign, 1002—1015. His death, 1015. His reign, 1015—1028. His death, 1028. His reign, 1028—1041. His death, 1041. His reign, 1041—1055. His death, 1055. His reign, 1055—1068. His death, 1068. His reign, 1068—1081. His death, 1081. His reign, 1081—1094. His death, 1094. His reign, 1094—1107. His death, 1107. His reign, 1107—1119. His death, 1119. His reign, 1119—1132. His death, 1132. His reign, 1132—1145. His death, 1145. His reign, 1145—1158. His death, 1158. His reign, 1158—1171. His death, 1171. His reign, 1171—1184. His death, 1184. His reign, 1184—1197. His death, 1197. His reign, 1197—1210. His death, 1210. His reign, 1210—1223. His death, 1223. His reign, 1223—1236. His death, 1236. His reign, 1236—1249. His death, 1249. His reign, 1249—1262. His death, 1262. His reign, 1262—1275. His death, 1275. His reign, 1275—1288. His death, 1288. His reign, 1288—1301. His death, 1301. His reign, 1301—1314. His death, 1314. His reign, 1314—1327. His death, 1327. His reign, 1327—1340. His death, 1340. His reign, 1340—1353. His death, 1353. His reign, 1353—1366. His death, 1366. His reign, 1366—1379. His death, 1379. His reign, 1379—1392. His death, 1392. His reign, 1392—1405. His death, 1405. His reign, 1405—1418. His death, 1418. His reign, 1418—1431. His death, 1431. His reign, 1431—1444. His death, 1444. His reign, 1444—1457. His death, 1457. His reign, 1457—1470. His death, 1470. His reign, 1470—1483. His death, 1483. His reign, 1483—1496. His death, 1496. His reign, 1496—1509. His death, 1509. His reign, 1509—1522. His death, 1522. His reign, 1522—1535. His death, 1535. His reign, 1535—1548. His death, 1548. His reign, 1548—1561. His death, 1561. His reign, 1561—1574. His death, 1574. His reign, 1574—1587. His death, 1587. His reign, 1587—1600. His death, 1600. His reign, 1600—1613. His death, 1613. His reign, 1613—1626. His death, 1626. His reign, 1626—1639. His death, 1639. His reign, 1639—1652. His death, 1652. His reign, 1652—1665. His death, 1665. His reign, 1665—1678. His death, 1678. His reign, 1678—1691. His death, 1691. His reign, 1691—1704. His death, 1704. His reign, 1704—1717. His death, 1717. His reign, 1717—1730. His death, 1730. His reign, 1730—1743. His death, 1743. His reign, 1743—1756. His death, 1756. His reign, 1756—1769. His death, 1769. His reign, 1769—1782. His death, 1782. His reign, 1782—1795. His death, 1795. His reign, 1795—1808. His death, 1808. His reign, 1808—1821. His death, 1821. His reign, 1821—1834. His death, 1834. His reign, 1834—1847. His death, 1847. His reign, 1847—1860. His death, 1860. His reign, 1860—1873. His death, 1873. His reign, 1873—1886. His death, 1886. His reign, 1886—1899. His death, 1899. His reign, 1899—1912. His death, 1912. His reign, 1912—1925. His death, 1925. His reign, 1925—1938. His death, 1938. His reign, 1938—1951. His death, 1951. His reign, 1951—1964. His death, 1964. His reign, 1964—1977. His death, 1977. His reign, 1977—1990. His death, 1990. His reign, 1990—2003. His death, 2003. His reign, 2003—2016. His death, 2016. His reign, 2016—2029. His death, 2029. His reign, 2029—2042. His death, 2042. His reign, 2042—2055. His death, 2055. His reign, 2055—2068. His death, 2068. His reign, 2068—2081. His death, 2081. His reign, 2081—2094. His death, 2094. His reign, 2094—2107. His death, 2107. His reign, 2107—2120. His death, 2120. His reign, 2120—2133. His death, 2133. His reign, 2133—2146. His death, 2146. His reign, 2146—2159. His death, 2159. His reign, 2159—2172. His death, 2172. His reign, 2172—2185. His death, 2185. His reign, 2185—2198. His death, 2198. His reign, 2198—2211. His death, 2211. His reign, 2211—2224. His death, 2224. His reign, 2224—2237. His death, 2237. His reign, 2237—2250. His death, 2250. His reign, 2250—2263. His death, 2263. His reign, 2263—2276. His death, 2276. His reign, 2276—2289. His death, 2289. His reign, 2289—2302. His death, 2302. His reign, 2302—2315. His death, 2315. His reign, 2315—2328. His death, 2328. His reign, 2328—2341. His death, 2341. His reign, 2341—2354. His death, 2354. His reign, 2354—2367. His death, 2367. His reign, 2367—2380. His death, 2380. His reign, 2380—2393. His death, 2393. His reign, 2393—2406. His death, 2406. His reign, 2406—2419. His death, 2419. His reign, 2419—2432. His death, 2432. His reign, 2432—2445. His death, 2445. His reign, 2445—2458. His death, 2458. His reign, 2458—2471. His death, 2471. His reign, 2471—2484. His death, 2484. His reign, 2484—2497. His death, 2497. His reign, 2497—2510. His death, 2510. His reign, 2510—2523. His death, 2523. His reign, 2523—2536. His death, 2536. His reign, 2536—2549. His death, 2549. His reign, 2549—2562. His death, 2562. His reign, 2562—2575. His death, 2575. His reign, 2575—2588. His death, 2588. His reign, 2588—2601. His death, 2601. His reign, 2601—2614. His death, 2614. His reign, 2614—2627. His death, 2627. His reign, 2627—2640. His death, 2640. His reign, 2640—2653. His death, 2653. His reign, 2653—2666. His death, 2666. His reign, 2666—2679. His death, 2679. His reign, 2679—2692. His death, 2692. His reign, 2692—2705. His death, 2705. His reign, 2705—2718. His death, 2718. His reign, 2718—2731. His death, 2731. His reign, 2731—2744. His death, 2744. His reign, 2744—2757. His death, 2757. His reign, 2757—2770. His death, 2770. His reign, 2770—2783. His death, 2783. His reign, 2783—2796. His death, 2796. His reign, 2796—2809. His death, 2809. His reign, 2809—2822. His death, 2822. His reign, 2822—2835. His death, 2835. His reign, 2835—2848. His death, 2848. His reign, 2848—2861. His death, 2861. His reign, 2861—2874. His death, 2874. His reign, 2874—2887. His death, 2887. His reign, 2887—2900. His death, 2900. His reign, 2900—2913. His death, 2913. His reign, 2913—2926. His death, 2926. His reign, 2926—2939. His death, 2939. His reign, 2939—2952. His death, 2952. His reign, 2952—2965. His death, 2965. His reign, 2965—2978. His death, 2978. His reign, 2978—2991. His death, 2991. His reign, 2991—3004. His death, 3004. His reign, 3004—3017. His death, 3017. His reign, 3017—3030. His death, 3030. His reign, 3030—3043. His death, 3043. His reign, 3043—3056. His death, 3056. His reign, 3056—3069. His death, 3069. His reign, 3069—3082. His death, 3082. His reign, 3082—3095. His death, 3095. His reign, 3095—3108. His death, 3108. His reign, 3108—3121. His death, 3121. His reign, 3121—3134. His death, 3134. His reign, 3134—3147. His death, 3147. His reign, 3147—3160. His death, 3160. His reign, 3160—3173. His death, 3173. His reign, 3173—3186. His death, 3186. His reign, 3186—3199. His death, 3199. His reign, 3199—3212. His death, 3212. His reign, 3212—3225. His death, 3225. His reign, 3225—3238. His death, 3238. His reign, 3238—3251. His death, 3251. His reign, 3251—3264. His death, 3264. His reign, 3264—3277. His death, 3277. His reign, 3277—3290. His death, 3290. His reign, 3290—3303. His death, 3303. His reign, 3303—3316. His death, 3316. His reign, 3316—3329. His death, 3329. His reign, 3329—3342. His death, 3342. His reign, 3342—3355. His death, 3355. His reign, 3355—3368. His death, 3368. His reign, 3368—3381. His death, 3381. His reign, 3381—3394. His death, 3394. His reign, 3394—3407. His death, 3407. His reign, 3407—3420. His death, 3420. His reign, 3420—3433. His death, 3433. His reign, 3433—3446. His death, 3446. His reign, 3446—3459. His death, 3459. His reign, 3459—3472. His death, 3472. His reign, 3472—3485. His death, 3485. His reign, 3485—3498. His death, 3498. His reign, 3498—3511. His death, 3511. His reign, 3511—3524. His death, 3524. His reign, 3524—3537. His death, 3537. His reign, 3537—3550. His death, 3550. His reign, 3550—3563. His death, 3563. His reign, 3563—3576. His death, 3576. His reign, 3576—3589. His death, 3589. His reign, 3589—3602. His death, 3602. His reign, 3602—3615. His death, 3615. His reign, 3615—3628. His death, 3628. His reign, 3628—3641. His death, 3641. His reign, 3641—3654. His death, 3654. His reign, 3654—3667. His death, 3667. His reign, 3667—3680. His death, 3680. His reign, 3680—3693. His death, 3693. His reign, 3693—3706. His death, 3706. His reign, 3706—3719. His death, 3719. His reign, 3719—3732. His death, 3732. His reign, 3732—3745. His death, 3745. His reign, 3745—3758. His death, 3758. His reign, 3758—3771. His death, 3771. His reign, 3771—3784. His death, 3784. His reign, 3784—3797. His death, 3797. His reign, 3797—3810. His death, 3810. His reign, 3810—3823. His death, 3823. His reign, 3823—3836. His death, 3836. His reign, 3836—3849. His death, 3849. His reign, 3849—3862. His death, 3862. His reign, 3862—3875. His death, 3875. His reign, 3875—3888. His death, 3888. His reign, 3888—3901. His death, 3901. His reign, 3901—3914. His death, 3914. His reign, 3914—3927. His death, 3927. His reign, 3927—3940. His death, 3940. His reign, 3940—3953. His death, 3953. His reign, 3953—3966. His death, 3966. His reign, 3966—3979. His death, 3979. His reign, 3979—3992. His death, 3992. His reign, 3992—4005. His death, 4005. His reign, 4005—4018. His death, 4018. His reign, 4018—4031. His death, 4031. His reign, 4031—4044. His death, 4044. His reign, 4044—4057. His death, 4057. His reign, 4057—4070. His death, 4070. His reign, 4070—4083. His death, 4083. His reign, 4083—4096. His death, 4096. His reign, 4096—4109. His death, 4109. His reign, 4109—4122. His death, 4122. His reign, 4122—4135. His death, 4135. His reign, 4135—4148. His death, 4148. His reign, 4148—4161. His death, 4161. His reign, 4161—4174. His death, 4174. His reign, 4174—4187. His death, 4187. His reign, 4187—4200. His death, 4200. His reign, 4200—4213. His death, 4213. His reign, 4213—4226. His death, 4226. His reign, 4226—4239. His death, 4239. His reign, 4239—4252. His death, 4252. His reign, 4252—4265. His death, 4265. His reign, 4265—4278. His death, 4278. His reign, 4278—4291. His death, 4291. His reign, 4291—4304. His death, 4304. His reign, 4304—4317. His death, 4317. His reign, 4317—4330. His death, 4330. His reign, 4330—4343. His death, 4343. His reign, 4343—4356. His death, 4356. His reign, 4356—4369. His death, 4369. His reign, 4369—4382. His death, 4382. His reign, 4382—4395. His death, 4395. His reign, 4395—4408. His death, 4408. His reign, 4408—4421. His death, 4421. His reign, 4421—4434. His death, 4434. His reign, 4434—4447. His death, 4447. His reign, 4447—4460. His death, 4460. His reign, 4460—4473. His death, 4473. His reign, 4473—4486. His death, 4486. His reign, 4486—4499. His death, 4499. His reign, 4499—4512. His death, 4512. His reign, 4512—4525. His death, 4525. His reign, 4525—4538. His death, 4538. His reign, 4538—4551. His death, 4551. His reign, 4551—4564. His death, 4564. His reign, 4564—4577. His death, 4577. His reign, 4577—4590. His death, 4590. His reign, 4590—4603. His death, 4603. His reign, 4603—4616. His death, 4616. His reign, 4616—4629. His death, 4629. His reign, 4629—4642. His death, 4642. His reign, 4642—4655. His death, 4655. His reign, 4655—4668. His death, 4668. His reign, 4668—4681. His death, 4681. His reign, 4681—4694. His death, 4694. His reign, 4694—4707. His death, 4707. His reign, 4707—4720. His death, 4720. His reign, 4720—4733. His death, 4733. His reign, 4733—4746. His death, 4746. His reign, 4746—4759. His death, 4759. His reign, 4759—4772. His death, 4772. His reign, 4772—4785. His death, 4785. His reign, 4785—4798. His death, 4798. His reign, 4798—4811. His death, 4811. His reign, 4811—4824. His death, 4824. His reign, 4824—4837. His death, 4837. His reign, 4837—4850. His death, 4850. His reign, 4850—4863. His death, 4863. His reign, 4863—4876. His death, 4876. His reign, 4876—4889. His death, 4889. His reign, 4889—4902. His death, 4902. His reign, 4902—4915. His death, 4915. His reign, 4915—4928. His death, 4928. His reign, 4928—4941. His death, 4941. His reign, 4941—4954. His death, 4954. His reign, 4954—4967. His death, 4967. His reign, 4967—4980. His death, 4980. His reign, 4980—4993. His death, 4993. His reign, 4993—5006. His death, 5006. His reign, 5006—5019. His death, 5019. His reign, 5019—5032. His death, 5032. His reign, 5032—5045. His death, 5045. His reign, 5045—5058. His death, 5058. His reign, 5058—5071. His death, 5071. His reign, 5071—5084. His death, 5084. His reign, 5084—5097. His death, 5097. His reign, 5097—5110. His death, 5110. His reign, 5110—5123. His death, 5123. His reign, 5123—5136. His death, 5136. His reign, 5136—5149. His death, 5149. His reign, 5149—5162. His death, 5162. His reign, 5162—5175. His death, 5175. His reign, 5175—5188. His death, 5188. His reign, 5188—5201. His death, 5201. His reign, 5201—5214. His death, 5214. His reign, 5214—5227. His death, 5227. His reign, 5227—5240. His death, 5240. His reign, 5240—5253. His death, 5253. His reign, 5253—5266. His death, 5266. His reign, 5266—5279. His death, 5279. His reign, 5279—5292. His death, 5292. His reign, 5292—5305. His death, 5305. His reign, 5305—5318. His death, 5318. His reign, 5318—5331. His death, 5331. His reign, 5331—5344. His death, 5344. His reign, 5344—5357. His death, 5357. His reign, 5357—5370. His death, 5370. His reign, 5370—5383. His death, 5383. His reign, 5383—5396. His death, 5396. His reign, 5396—5409. His death, 5409. His reign, 5409—5422. His death, 5422. His reign, 5422—5435. His death, 5435. His reign, 5435—5448. His death, 5448. His reign, 5448—5461. His death, 5461. His reign, 5461—5474. His death, 5474. His reign, 5474—5487. His death, 5487. His reign, 5487—5500. His death, 5500. His reign, 5500—5513. His death, 5513. His reign, 5513—5526. His death, 5526. His reign, 5526—5539. His death, 5539. His reign, 5539—5552. His death, 5552. His reign, 5552—5565. His death, 5565. His reign, 5565—5578. His death, 5578. His reign, 5578—5591. His death, 5591. His reign, 5591—5604. His death, 5604. His reign, 5604—5617. His death, 5617. His reign, 5617—5630. His death, 5630. His reign, 5630—5643. His death, 5643. His reign, 5643—5656. His death, 5656. His reign, 5656—5669. His death, 5669. His reign, 5669—5682. His death, 5682. His reign, 5682—5695. His death, 5695. His reign, 5695—5708. His death, 5708. His reign, 5708—5721. His death, 5721. His reign, 5721—5734. His death, 5734. His reign, 5734—5747. His death, 5747. His reign, 5747—5760. His death, 5760. His reign, 5760—5773. His death, 5773. His reign, 5773—5786. His death, 5786. His reign, 5786—5799. His death, 5799. His reign, 5799—5812. His death, 5812. His reign, 5812—5825. His death, 5825. His reign, 5825—5838. His death, 5838. His reign, 5838—5851. His death, 5851. His reign, 5851—5864. His death, 5864. His reign, 5864—5877. His death, 5877. His reign, 5877—5890. His death, 5890. His reign, 5890—5903. His death, 5903. His reign, 5903—5916. His death, 5916. His reign, 5916—5929. His death, 5929. His reign, 5929—5942. His death, 5942. His reign, 5942—5955. His death, 5955. His reign, 5955—5968. His death, 5968. His reign, 5968—5981. His death, 5981. His reign, 5981—5994. His death, 5994. His reign, 5994—6007. His death, 6007. His reign, 6007—6020. His death, 6020. His reign, 6020—6033. His death, 6033. His reign, 6033—6046. His death, 6046. His reign, 6046—6059. His death, 6059. His reign, 6059—6072. His death, 6072. His reign, 6072—6085. His death, 6085. His reign, 6085—6098. His death, 6098. His reign, 6098—6111. His death, 6111. His reign, 6111—6124. His death, 6124. His reign, 6124—6137. His death, 6137. His reign, 6137—6150. His death, 6150. His reign, 6150—6163. His death, 6163. His reign, 6163—6176. His death, 6176. His reign, 6176—6189. His death, 6189. His reign, 6189—6202. His death, 6202. His reign, 6202—6215. His death, 6215. His reign, 6215—6228. His death, 6228. His reign, 6228—6241. His death, 6241. His reign, 6241—6254. His death, 6254. His reign, 6254—6267. His death, 6267. His reign, 6267—6280. His death, 6280. His reign, 6280—6293. His death, 6293. His reign, 6293—6306. His death, 6306. His reign, 630

of the armies under the emperor Maurice, 764. The armies and city revolt against him, 765. Deliverance of the city from the Persians and Avars, 773, 774. Religious war about the Trisagion, 793, 794. Pro-petus of the remaining history of the Eastern empire, 807. Summary review of the five dynasties of the Greek empire, 825, 833. Tumults in the city to oppose the destruction of images, 840. Abolition of the monkish order by Constantine, 847. First siege of, by the Saracens, 927. Second siege by the Saracens, 928, 929. Review of the provinces of the Greek empire in the tenth century, 930. Riches of the city of Constantinople, 935. The Imperial palace of, 974. Offices of state, 985. Military character of the Greeks, 979. The name and character of Romans supported to the last, 985. Decline and revival of literature, 986, 994. The city menaced by the Turks, 977. Account of the Varangians, 979. Naval expeditions of the Russians against the city, 981. Origin of the separation of the Greek and Latin churches, 1058. Massacre of the Latins, 1060. Invasion of the Greek empire, and conquest of Constantinople by the emnaders, 1067. The city taken, and Isaac Angelus restored, 1068, 1069. Part of the city burnt by the Latins, 1070. Second siege of the city by the Latins, 1071. Is pillaged, 1072. Account of the status destroyed, 1073, 1074. Partition of the Greek empire by the French and Venetians, 1076. The Greeks rise against their Latin conquerors, 1079. The city retaken by the Greeks, 1084. The suburb of Galata assigned to the Genoese, 1109. Hostilities between the Genoese and the emperor, 1110. How the city escaped the Moguls, 1118. Is besieged by the sultan Amurath II, 1138. Is compared with Rome, 1178, 1139. Is besieged by Mahomet II. sultan of the Turks, 1174. Is stormed and taken, 1178, 1179. Becomes the capital of the Turkish empire, 1182.

Constantius Chlorus, governor of Dalmatia, was intended to be adopted by the emperor Carus, in the room of his vicious son Carinus, 120. Is associated as Cæsar by Diocletian in his administration, 134. Assumes the title of Augustus, on the abdication of Diocletian, 149. His death, 151. Granted a toleration to the Christians, 217.

Constantius, the second son of Constantine the Great, his education, 247. Is sent to govern the Eastern provinces of the empire, 248. Seizes Constantine on the death of his father, 251. Considers the death of his kinsmen, ibid. Division of the empire among him and his brothers, ibid. Reverts to Choroës king of Armenia, 252. Battle of Singara with Sapor king of Persia, 253. Rejects the offers of Marcianus and Valerian, on the plea of a vision, 255. His relation to the Illyrian troops at the interview with Valerian, 258. Defeats Marcianus at the battle of Mita, 257. His councils governed by eunuchs, 259, 261. Education of his sons Gallus and Julian, 261. Disgrace and death of Gallus, 262. Sends for Julian to court, 264. Invests him with the title of Cæsar, and. Visits Rome, 265. Presents an obelisk to that city, ibid. The Ovidian and Sarmatian wars, 266. His Persian negotiations, 267. Mismanagement of affairs in the East, 268. Favors the Arians, 269. His religious character by Ammianus the historian, ibid. His restless endeavours to establish an unanimity of Christ an doctrine, 263. Athanasius driven into exile by the council of Antioch, 267. Is intimidated by his brother Constantine, and invites Athanasius to court, 269.

Athanasius writes invectives to expose his character, 310. Is constrained to restore Liberius, bishop of Rome, 311. Supports Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, and countenances his persecutions of the Catholics and Novatians, 312. His conduct toward his Persian subjects, 313. Enriches the fame of Julian, 315. Recalls the legions from Gaul, 317. Negotiations between him and Julian, 318, 321. His preparations to oppose Julian, 323. His death and character, 324.

Constantius, general, relieves the British emperor Constantine when besieged in Aries, 497. His character and victories, 498. His marriage with Placidia, and death, 518.

Constantius, secretary to Attila king of the Huns, his matrimonial negotiation at the court of Constantinople, 531.

Conval, the office of, explained, 25. Alterations this office underwent under the emperors, and when Constantinople became the seat of empire, 229. The office of, suppressed by the emperor Justinian, 620. Is now sunk to a commercial agent, 1191.

Contracts, the Roman laws respecting, 755. Especially the matrimonial contract, 723, 740.

Copts of Egypt, brief history of, 861, 862.

Corinth, reviving as a Roman colony, celebrates the Isthmian games, under the emperor Julian, 260. The isthmus of, fortified by the emperor Justinian, 644.

Cornwall, reduction of, by the Saxons, 697.

Cotonyary gold, nature of those offerings to the Roman emperors, 243.

Cotenus, Matthias, king of Hungary, his character, 1154.

Cotinus, Indoeuropæan, account of his Christian topography, 688, note 77. 797, note 116.

Cosmo of Mevris, his character, 1157.

Couchs and Scurds of Antioch, 265.	Frankfort, 846.

Aries, 307.	Iscus, 322. 1082. 1095.
Basil, 1147.	Milan, 847.
Cæsarea, 304.	Nice, 228. 847. 846.
Carthage, 283. 620.	Pisa, 1147. 1213.
Chalcedon, 788.	Placentia, 1019.
Clermont, 1011.	Quinsext in Trullo, 777.
Constante, 1147. 1217.	note 56.
Constantinople, 121. 793.	Rimini, 290. 303.
797. 826. 1059.	Sardonia, 304.
Ephesus, 784. 787.	Selenia, 703.
Ferrara, 1149.	Toledo, 787. 604.
Firenze, 1879.	Tyre, 304.

Count, great difference between the ancient and modern application of this title, 224. By whom first invented, ibid. Of the sacred largesses, under Constantine the Great, his office, 288. Of the private estate, ibid. Of the domestics in the Eastern empire, his office, 299.

Courage, decline of, in the Roman empire, 92.

Contatius, history of the family of, 1087—1089.

Crescentius, consul of Rome, his vicissitudes, and disgraceful death, 875.

Cretia, the isle of, subdued by the Saracens, 940. Is recovered by Nicephorus Phocas, 947. Is purchased by the Venetians, 1016.

Crimis, how distinguished by the penal laws of the Romans, 737.

Crispus, son of Constantine the Great, is declared Cæsar, 104. Distinguished his valour against the Franks and Alemanni, 105. Forces the passage of the Hellespont, and defeats the fleet of Laermis, 107. His character, 147. His mysterious death, 240.

Crisis, the patrician, marries the daughter of Phocas, and contrives to depose him, 777. Is obliged to turn monk, ibid.

Crotala, account of the kingdom of, 973, 974.

Cross, the different sentiments entertained of this instrument of punishment, by the Pagan and Christian Romans, 284. The famous standard of, in the army of Constantine the Great, described, 281, 281. His visions of, 282. The truly speculative and cross of Christ discovered, ibid. The cross of Christ unadorned by adoration to pilgrims, ibid.

Crown of thorns, its transfer from Constantinople to Paris, 1083.

Crown, moral and civil, the distinction between, 37, note 2.

Crusades, the first, resolved on at the council of Clermont, 1090. Largely into the justice of the holy war, ibid. Examination into the private motives of the crusaders, 1091. Departure of the crusaders, 1093. Account of the chiefs, 1094. Their march to Constantinople, 1097. Review of their numbers, 1100. They take Nice, 1101. Battle of Dorylaeum, 1097. They take Antioch, 1103. Their distresses, 1034. Are relieved by the discovery of the holy lance, 1035. Siege and conquest of Jerusalem, 1097. Goutrey of Bouillon elects king of Jerusalem, 1098. The second crusade, 1101. The crusades illustrated by the Greek emperors, 1043, 1044. The third crusade, 1051. Siege of Acre, ibid. Fourth crusade, 1051. Sixth crusade, 1055. Seventh crusade, 1056. Recapitulation of the fourth crusade, 1092. General consequences of the crusades, 1063, 1066.

Ctesiphon, the city of, plundered by the Romans, 78. Its situation described, 56. Julian declines the siege of that city, 268. Is sacked by the Saracens, 834.

Callar, emperor of China, his character, 1115.

Cæsa, foundation of, 259.

Cenaphtha, his office under the Greek emperors, 955.

Customs, duties of, imposed by Augustus, 64.

Cycle of indications, the origin of, traced, and how now employed, 247, note 170.

Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, his history and martyrdom, 405—407.

Cyprus, the kingdom of, bestowed on the house of Lusignan, by Richard I. of England, 1101.

Cyrene, the Greek colonies there finally exterminated by Choroës II. king of Persia, 799.

Cynades, an obscure fugitive, is set up, by Sapor the Persian monarch, as emperor of Rome, 102.

Cyrl, bishop of Jerusalem, his pious relation of a miraculous appearance of a celestial cross, ibid. His marvellous character, 109.

Cyrl, patriarch of Alexandria, his former character, 781, 782. Condemns the heresy of Nestorius, 787. Presents the decision of the council of Ephesus against Nestorius, 783, 785. His conduct afterwards, 783, 786.

Cyzicus, how it escaped destruction from the Goths, 100
Is at length ruined by them, ibid. The island and city of, seized by the usurper Procopius, 372.

D

Dacia, conquest of, by the emperor Trajan, 2, 3 Its situation, 9 Is over-run by the Goths, 93. Is resigned to them by Aurelian, 111.

Dæmons, supposed to be the authors and objects of Pagan idolatry by the primitive Christians, 173.

Dagisteus, general of the emperor Justinian, besieges Petra, 694. Commands the Huns in Italy under Narses, 706.

Daimbert, archbishop of Pisa, installed patriarch of Jerusalem, 1039.

Dalmatia, described, 9. Produce of a silver mine there, 61, note 94.

Dalmatius, nephew of Constantine the Great, is created Caesar, 247. Is sent to govern the Gothic frontier, 248 Is cruelly destroyed by Constantus, 251.

Damascus, siege of, by the Saracens, 598. The city reduced both by storm and by treaty, 901 Remarks on Hughes's tragedy of this siege, ibid. note 62 Taken and destroyed by Tamerlane, 1130.

Danasus, bishop of Rome, edict of Valentinian addressed to him, to restrain the crafty avarice of the Roman clergy, 377, 378 His bloody contest with Ursinus for the episcopal dignity, 378.

Dames, the Arab, his gallant enterprise against the castle of Aleppo, 906.

Damietta is taken by Louis IX. of France, 1655.

Damophilus, archbishop of Constantinople, resigns his see, rather than subscribe the Nicene creed, 453.

Dandolo, Henry, doge of Venice, his character, 1064. Is made despot of Romania, 1076.

Daniel, first bishop of Winchester, his instructions to St. Boniface, for the conversion of idolaters, 540.

Danielis, a Grecian matron, her presents to the emperor Basil, 817 Her visit to him at Constantinople, 924. Her testament, ibid.

Danube, course of the river, and the provinces of, described, 9.

Daphne, the sacred grove and temple of, at Antioch, described, 343. Is converted to Christian purposes by Gallus, and restored to the Pagans by Julian, ibid. The temple burned, 344.

Dava, the fortification of, by Justinian, described, 647. The demolition of, by the Persians, prevented by peace, 688. Is taken by Chosroes king of Persia, 777.

Darius, his scheme for connecting the continents of Europe and Asia, 222.

Darkness, preternatural, at the time of the passion, is unnoticed by the heathen philosophers and historians, 194.

Dastagard, the Persian royal seat of, plundered by the emperor Heraclius, 776.

Datanus, governor of Spain, yields ready obedience to the Imperial edicts against the Christians, 217.

Datus, bishop of Milan, instigates the revolt of the Ligurians to Justinian, 672. Escapes to Constantinople on the taking of Milan by the Burgundians, 674.

Debtors, insolvent, cruel punishment of, by the law of the twelve tables, 757.

Decemvirs, review of the laws of the twelve tables, 717. Their laws superseded by the perpetual edict, 719. Severity of, 756, 777.

Decus, his exaltation to the empire, 90. His war with the Goths, 93. Defeat and death, 93. Was a persecutor of the Christians, 211.

Decurions, in the Roman empire, are severely treated by the Imperial laws, 240.

Degeneracy, progress of, in the Roman empire, 22.

Dedication of the Roman emperors, how this species of idolatry was introduced, 56.

Delators, are encouraged by the emperor Commodus, to gratify his hatred of the senate, 31. Are suppressed by Pertinax, 38.

Delphi, the sacred ornaments of the temple of, removed to Constantinople by Constantine the Great, 236, note 48.

Democracy, a form of government unfavourable to freedom in a large state, 11.

Demosthenes, governor of Casarea, his gallant defence against, and heroic escape from, Sapor king of Persia, 163.

Deogratias, bishop of Carthage, humanely succours the captives brought from Rome by Genseric king of the Vandals, 533.

Derar, the Saracen, his character, 899.

Desiderius, the last king of the Lombards, conquered by Charlemagne, 842.

Despot, nature of that title in the Greek empire, 955.

Despotism originates in superstition, 55, note 42. Despotism of the Greek emperors, 938.

Diadem assumed by Diocletian, what, 145.

Diadememmanus associated in the empire by Macrinus, 53.

Diadmonds, the art of cutting them, unknown to the ancients, 62, note 99.

Ditius Julianus, purchases the Imperial dignity at a public auction, 41. Various revolts against him, ibid. Is deserted by the prætorians, 43. Condemned and executed by order of the senate, 42.

Dioceses of the Roman empire, their number and government, 232.

Diocletian, the manner of his military election to the empire, 132. His birth and character, 133. Takes Maximian for his colleague, ibid. Associates as Cæsar, Galerius, and Constantius Chlorus, 134. His triumph in conjunction with Maximian, 145. Fixes his court at the city of Nicomedia, ibid. Abdicates the empire, 146. Parallel between him and the emperor Charles V. ibid. Passes his life in retirement at Salona, 147. His impartial behaviour toward the Christians, 212. Causes that produced the persecution of the Christians under his reign, 214. His death, 147.

Dion Cassius, the historian, screened from the fury of the soldiers, by the emperor Alexander Severus, 39.

Dioscorus, patriarch of Alexandria, his outrageous behaviour at the second council of Ephesus, 757. Is deposed by the council of Chalcedon, 784.

Divulb, great khan of the Turks, his reception of the ambassadors of Justinian, 683.

Discipline of the Roman legions, 4. Of the Persian cavalry, 80.

Duorce, the liberty and abuse of, by the Roman laws, 730. Limitations of, 730, 731.

Docets, their peculiar tenets, 295 779. Derivation of their name, 295, note 28.

Dominic, St. Loricatus, his fortitude in flagellation, 1022.

Dominans, when this epithet was applied to the Roman emperors, 144.

Domitian, emperor, his treatment of his kinsmen Flavius Sabinus, and Flavius Clemens, 202.

Domitian, the Oriental præfect, is sent by the emperor Constantius to reform the state of the East, then oppressed by Gallus, 261. Is put to death there, 262.

Donatus, his contest with Cæcilian for the see of Carthage, 292. History of the schism of the Donatists, 293. Persecution of the Donatists by the emperor Honorius, 261.

Dorylaeum, battle of, between sultan Soliman and the first crusaders, 1032.

Doxology, how introduced into the church service, and how perverted, 311.

Dramatic representations at Rome, a character of, 484.

Dreams, the popular opinion of the preternatural origin of, favourable to that of Constantine previous to his battle with Maxentius, 281.

Dromedary, extraordinary speed of this animal, 116, note 72.

Dromon of the Greek empire, described, 479.

Druids, their power in Gaul suppressed by the emperors Tiberius and Claudius, 13.

Drusus at Mount Libanus, a character of, 1017, note 68.

Ducenarius, office of, 211, note 126.

Duke, derivation of that title, and great change in the modern, from the ancient, application of it, 234.

Durazzo, siege of, by Robert Guiscard, 493. Battle of, between him and the Greek emperor Alexius, 996.

E

Earthquake, an extraordinary one over great part of the Roman empire, 293. Account of those that happened in the reign of Justinian, 714.

East India, the Roman commercial intercourse with that region, 51. Commodities of, taxed by Alexander Severus, 62.

Ebonites, account of that sect, 171. A confutation of their errors, supposed by the primitive fathers to be a particular object in the writings of St. John the Evangelist, 195. Their ideas of the person of Jesus Christ, 778.

Ecl. wastes, the book of, why not likely to be the production of King Solomon, 601, note 33.

Echlesiastical and civil powers, distinguished, by the fathers of the Christian church, 286.

Ecdicus, son of the emperor Avitus, his gallant conduct in Gaul, 565.

Eclipsis of the emperor Heraclius, 794.

Edda, of Iceland, the system of mythology in, 91.

Edemon, is sent from Attila king of the Huns, as his ambassador to the emperor Theodosius the Younger, 523.

Engages in a proposal to assassinate Attila, 536. His son Odoacer, the first barbarian king of Italy, 569.

Edeusa, the purest dialect of the Syriac language spoken there, 78, note 44. 796, note 110. The property of the Christians there, confiscated by the emperor Julian, for the disorderly conduct of the Arians, 445. Revolt of the Roman in troops there, 764. Account of the school of, 736.

History of the famous image there, 834. The city and principality of, seized by Baldwin the crusader, 1033.

Is retained by Zenghi, 1046. The counts of, 10-7.
East of Milan, published by Constantine the Great, 277.
Edicts of the praetors of Rome, under the republic, their nature and tendency, 719.
Edom, why that name was applied to the Roman empire by the Jews, 196, note 7.
Edwards, the Saracen dynasty of, 945.
Edward I of England, his crusade to the Holy Land, 1057.
Egidius, his character, and revolt in Gaul, 560. His son Sragrus, 589.
Egypt, general description of, 10. The superstitions of, with difficulty tolerated at Rome, 13. Amount of its revenues, 61. Public works executed there by Probus, 127. Conduct of Diocletian there, 138. Progress of Christianity there, 190. Edict of the emperor Valens to restrain the number of recluse monks there, 377. The worship of Serapis, how introduced there, 443. His temple, and the Alexandrian library, destroyed by bishop Theophilus, 444. Origin of monkish institutions in, 573. Great supplies of wheat furnished by, for the city of Constantinople, in the time of Justinian, 635. Ecclesiastical history of, 801. Invaded and reduced by the Saracens, 902. Capture of Alexandria, 911. Administration of, 912. Description of, by Amrou, 913. The Egyptians take Jerusalem from the Turks, 1036. Egypt conquered by the Turks, 1047. Government of the Mamelukes there, 1056, 1057.
Elagabalus, is declared emperor by the troops at Emesa, 54. His character, 55. Luxury, ibid. Contempt of decency, 56. Sedition of the guards against him, and his death, ibid. Was the first Roman who wore garments of pure silk, 636.
Elephants, enquiry into the number of, brought into the field by the ancient princes of the East, 79, note 49. With what view introduced into the circus at Rome in the first Punic war, 131.
Eleusian mysteries, why tolerated by the emperor Valentinian, 376.
Emigration of the ancient northern nations, the nature and motives of, examined, 84. Of the Huns, 440.
Emperors of Rome, idea of their system, 24, 25. Deification of them, 56. A review of their constitutions, 719. Their legislative power, 720. Their rescripts, ibid. Of Germany, their limited powers, 583. Of Constantinople, their pomp and luxury, 953. Officers of the palace, state, and army, 955. Abolition of the emperor, mode of, 956. Their public appearance, ibid. Their despotic power, 958. Their navy, 959. They retain the name of Romans to the last, 963.
Empire, Roman, extent and military force of, in the age of the Antonines, 1—11. General idea of it, 11. Its union and internal prosperity during that age, 11—22. Constitution, ——— Division of, into the East and West empires, by Valentinian, 371. Extinction of the Western empire, 570.
Encampment, Roman, described, 6.
Ennodius, the servile flatterer of Theodoric the Ostroth king of Italy, is made bishop of Pavia, 618, note 23.
Epigritus, leader of the mutinous praetorians, who murdered their praetor Ulpian, punished by the emperor Alexander Severus, 39.
Ephesus, the famous temple of Diana at, destroyed by the Goths, 101. Council of, 784. Episcopal riots there, 785. Second council there, 787.
Epicurus, his legacy to his philosophical disciples at Athens, 649.
Epirus, despoils of, on the dismemberment of the Greek empire, 1077.
Equites, master-general of the Illyrian frontier, is defeated by the Sarmatians, 391.
Eschinas, his merit as a reformer, 972.
Eschynus, their distinguishing tenets and practices, 190.
Encharis, a knotty subject to the first reformers, 472.
Endes, duke of Aquitan, repels the first Saracen invasion of France, 931. ibid. Gives the aid of Charles Martel, 932. Removes his dukedom, ibid.
Eudokia, her birth, character, and marriage, with the emperor Theodosius the Younger, 515, 516. Her disgrace and death, 516.
Eudokia, widow of Constantine VII., marries Romanus-Diogenes, and raises him to the throne, 521.
Eudoxia, her marriage with the emperor Arcadius, 452. Stimulates him to give up his favourite Eutropius, 458. Persecutes St. Chrysostom, 511. Her death and character, 513.
Eudozia, the daughter of Theodosius the Younger, is betrothed to the young emperor Valentinian III of the West, 519. Her character, 550. Is married to the emperor Maximus, 552. Invites Genseric, king of the Vandals, to Italy, ibid.
Eudorus, bishop of Constantinople, baptizes the emperor Valens, 376.
Eugenius, the rhetorician, is made emperor of the West by Arbogastes the Frank, 456. Is deposed and killed by Theodosius, 456—458.

Eugenius IV., pope, his contest with the council of Basil, 1147. Provides a re-union of the Latin and Greek churches, 1151. Forms a league against the Turks, 1161. Revolt of the Roman citizens against him, 1214.
Eumenius, the orator, some account of, 149, note 123.
Eunapius, the sophist, his character of monks, and of the objects of their worship, 447.
Eunomians, punishment of, by the edict of the emperor Theodosius against heretics, 425.
Eunuchs, enumerated in the list of eastern commodities imported and taxed in the time of Alexander Severus, 62. They infest the palace of the third Gordian, 72. Their ascendancy in the court of Constantius, 229. They favoured the Arians, 302, and note 86. Procure the banishment of Liberius bishop of Rome, 308. A conspiracy of, to disappoint the schemes of Rufinus, and marry the emperor Arcadius to Eudoxia, 432. They distract the court of the emperor Honorius, 487. And govern that of Arcadius, 505. Scheme of Chrysaphius to assassinate Attila king of the Huns, 536. The bishop of Sees and his whole chapter castrated, 1187, note 11.
Eunic, king of the Visigoths in Gaul, his conquests in Spain, 565. Is visited with all the Roman conquests beyond the Alps by Odoacer king of Italy, 588.
Europe, evidences that the climate of, was much colder in ancient than in modern times, 81. This alteration accounted for, ibid. Final division of, between the Western and Eastern empires, 450. Is ravaged by Attila, king of the Huns, 549. Is now one great republic, 612.
Eusebia, empress, wife of Constantius, her steady friendship to Julian, 261, 290. Is accused of arts to deprive Julian of children, 264 and note 9.
Eusebius, his character of the followers of Artemon, 193. His own character, 212. His story of the miraculous appearance of the cross in the slay to Constantine the Great, 282.
Eutropius the eunuch, great chamberlain to the emperor Arcadius, conceals his marriage with Eudoxia, in opposition to the views of Rufinus, 452. Succeeds Rufinus in the emperor's confidence, 455. His character and administration, 505. Provides for his own security, in a new law against treason, 506, 507. Takes sanctuary with St. Chrysostom, 508. His death, 509.
Eutyches, his opinion on the subject of the incarnation supported by the second council at Ephesus, 787. And adhered to by the Armenians, 801.
Euxine Sea, description of the vessels used in navigating, 90.
Exaltation of the cross, origin of the annual festival of, 114.
Exarch, under the Greek empire, the office and rank of, 843. Or Ravenna, the government of Italy settled in, and administered by, 710-750.
Exile duties imposed by Augustus, 61.
Excommunication from Christian communion, the origin of, 187.
Exercitus of the Roman legions, 5.
Exile, voluntary, under accusation and conscious guilt, its advantages among the Romans, 741.

F

Felix is consecrated bishop of Rome, to supersede Liberius, who was exiled, 311. He is violently expelled, 311, 312.
179 his Historia Sacula, 1003.
station on the transfer of the sovereignty of the island to the emperor Henry VI., 1004.
Fathers of the Christian church, cause of their austere morality, 180
Fathers and children, Roman law ceremony, 728.
Fausta, empress, wife of Constantine the Great, causes of her being put to death, 247
Faustina, wife of Marcus Antoninus, her character, 32.
Faustina, the widow of the emperor Constantius, countermands the revolt of Procopius against the emperor Valens, 52.
Felix, an African bishop, his martyrdom, 216.
Festivals, Pagan, great office taken at, by the primitive Christians, 174.
Federal government, the rudiments of, to be found among the Scythians, 26.
Fetus-communis, nature of, 755
Figures, numeral, occasion of their first public and familiar use, 984.
Finances of the Roman empire, general account of, 60—62.
Review of them when the seat of it was removed to Constantinople, 278—284.
Fingal, his questionable history, whether to be connected with the invasion of Caledonia by the emperor Severus, 49
Fish, Greek, the Saracen fleet destroyed by, in the harbor of Ephesus, 1663. It long preserved as a secret, 920. Its effects not to be compared with gunpowder, 930.

Farmas, an Egyptian merchant, his revolt against the emperor Aurelian, 117.

Farmas the Moor, history of his revolt against the emperor Valentinian, 383, 384.

Flagellation, its efficacy in penance, and how proportioned, 1022.

Flamens, Roman, their number, and peculiar office, 440.

Flammian way, its course described, 707, note 31.

Flavian, archbishop of Constantinople, is killed at the second council of Ephesus, 787.

Flax, culture of, introduced into the Western empire, 21.

Fleece, golden, probable origin of the fable of, 691.

Florence, the foundation of that city, 463, note 74. Is besieged by Radagaisus, and relieved by Stilicho, 474, 475.

Florentius, prætorian præfect of Gaul under Constantius, his character, 318. Is condemned by the tribunal of Chalcedon, but suffered to escape by Julian, 327.

Florianus, brother of the emperor Theodosius, his eager usurpation of the Imperial dignity, 125.

Forerunner, a doubtful plea for divorce, by Gospel authority, 731, note 131.

France, modern, computation of the number of its inhabitants, and the average of their taxation, 241, 242. The name of, whence derived, 600. Derivation of the French language, 603, note 119. Childeric deposed, and Pepin appointed king, by papal sanction, 842, 843. Reign and character of Charlemagne, 848. Invasion of, by the Saracens, 921.

Frangipani, Censio, his profligate violation of the persons of pope Gelasius II. and his college of cardinals, 1188. Derivation of his family name, 1194.

Franks, their origin and confederacy, 95. They invade Gaul, and ravage Spain, 97. They pass over into Africa, ibid. Bold and successful return of a colony of, from the sea of Pontus, by sea, 135. They overrun and establish themselves at Toxandria in Germany, 270. Subdued by Julian, 274. Their fidelity to the Roman government, 470. Origin of the Merovingian race of their kings, 540. How converted to Christianity, 550. Reign of their king Clovis, 588. Final establishment of the French monarchy in Gaul, 595. Their laws, 595. Give the name of France to their conquests in Gaul, 600. They degenerate into a state of anarchy, 603. They invade Italy, 674, 709. Their military character, 681, 682.

Fravilla the Goth, his character, and deadly quarrel with his countryman Priulf, 417. His operations against Gaisas, 549.

Frederic I., emperor of Germany, his tyranny in Italy, 800. Engaged in the third crusade, 1092. His disastrous expedition, 1044, 1045. Sacrifices Arnold of Brescia to the pope, 1100. His reply to the Roman ambassadors, 1194.

Frederic II. is driven out of Italy, 836. His disputes with the pope, and reluctant crusade, 1074. Exhorts the European princes to unite in opposing the Tartars, 1116.

Friedrich III., the last emperor crowned at Rome, 1214.

Friedrich of Hohenstaufen, and his privileges, 13.

Friedman, among the Romans, their rank in society, 757.

Frisemen of Laconia, account of, 672.

Fritigern, the Gothic chief, extricates himself from the hands of Lupinus, governor of Thrace, 465. Defeats him, ibid. Battle of Salices, 485, 487. His strength recruited by the accession of new tribes, 497. Negotiates with Valens, 499. Battle of Hadrianopolis, ibid. The union of the Gothic tribes broken by his death, 473.

Frodo was the first Christian missionary in Abyssinia, 27.

Fulk of Neully, his ardour in preaching the fourth crusade, 1022.

G

Gabinus, king of the Quadi, is treacherously murdered by Marcellinus governor of Valeria, 91.

Gisard, M., character of his Histoire de Charlemagne, 848, note 95.

Gaisas, the Goth, is commissioned by Stilicho to execute his revenge on Rithinus, præfect of the East, 454, 455. His conduct in the war against the revolted Tribigild, 508. Joins him, ibid. His flight and death, 509, 510.

Gala, probable derivation of the term, 946, note 52.

Gallata, the suburb of, at Constantinople, assigned to the Genoese, 1106.

Galerius is associated in the administration, as Cæsar, by the emperor Diocletian, 14. Is defeated by the Persians, 190. Surprises and overthrows Sapor, 191. Assumes the title of Augustus, on the abdication of Diocletian, 194. His policy of Constantinople, 171. Declines to proceed to acknowledge him Cæsar, 172. His unsuccessful invasion of Italy, 174. Invests Maximian with the purple on the death of Severus, 157. His death, 156. From what causes he is entertained an aversion to the Christians, 214. Obtains the countenance of Diocletian for persecuting them, 215. Publishes an edict of toleration just before his death, 219.

Gallileus, two-fold application of that name in the infancy of Christianity, 501. Why the emperor Julian applied this name to the Christians, 341.

Gallienus, son of the emperor Valerian, is associated by him in the Imperial throne, 95. Prohibits the senators from exercising military employments, 98. Contracts an alliance with the Alemanni, ibid. Character of his administration after the captivity of his father, 103, 104. Names Claudius for his successor, 108. Favoured the Christians, 211.

Galleys of the Greek empire described, 959.

Gallus elected emperor, on the minority of Hostilianus, the son of Decius, 95. He purchases peace of the Goths, ibid. Revolt of Emilianus against him, ibid. He is abandoned and slain, 96.

Gallus, nephew of Constantine the Great, his education, 200. Is invested with the title of Cæsar, ibid. His cruelty and inhumanity, 202. Embraces Christianity.

Ganges, public, of the Romans described, 73, 481. Greek games revived by Julian, 329. Account of the factions of the circus, 631, 632.

Ganges, source of that river, 1129, note 26.

Gaudinius, the notary, is condemned to death under the emperor Julian, 327.

Gaul, the province of, described, 8. The power of the Druids suppressed there by Titus and Claudius, 13. Cities in, 19. Amount of the tribute paid by that province to Rome, 61. Is defended against the Franks by Postumian, 97. Succession of usurpers there, 113. Invasion of, by the Lygians, 157. Revolt of the Bagaudæ suppressed by Maximian, 157. Progress of Christianity there, 231. Proportion of the capitation-tax levied there by the Roman emperors, 241. Is invaded by the Germans, 270. The government of, assigned to Julian, ibid. His civil administration, 274. Is invaded by the Alemanni, under the emperor Valentinian, 679. And under Gratian, 407, 800. Destruction of idols and temples there, by Martin bishop of Tours, 422. Is overrun by the barbarous troops of Radagaisus, after his defeat by Stilicho, 470. Is settled by the Goths, Burgundians, and Franks, 501. Assembly of the seven provinces in, 503. Reign of the Merovingian race of kings of the Franks in, 540. Invasion of, by Attila king of the Huns, 542. Battle of Châlons, 543. Revolutions of, on the death of the emperor Majorian, 565. Conversion of, to Christianity by the Franks, 570. Representation of the advantages it enjoyed under the Roman government, 565. Conquests and property of Loric king of the Visigoths, ibid. 588. Character and reign of Clovis, 590. The Alemanni conquered, 590. Submission of the Armoricans, and the Roman troops, 591. Final establishment of the French monarchy in Gaul, 595. History of the Salic laws, 597. The lands of, how claimed and divided by the barbarian conquerors of, 598, 599. Domain and benefices of the Merovingian princes, 599. Usurpations of the seignurs, ibid. Privileges of the Romans in, 602.

Gauls, the revolutions of the sea-coast of, 77, note 33.

Gedizian a ra of the Turks, when settled, 1013.

Gelasius, pope, his zeal against the celebration of the feast of Lupercalia, 560. Deplores the miserable decay of Italy, 1123.

Gelasius II., pope, his rough treatment by Censio Frangipani, 1188.

Genseric deposes Hilderic the Vandal king of Africa, and usurps the government, 651. Is defeated by Belisarius, 654. His final defeat, 657. His distressful flight, 659. Surrenders himself to Belisarius, 660. Grants his triumph, 661. His peaceful retirement, ibid.

General of the Roman army, extensive power of, 24.

Genosia, Arabian, striking instances of, 864.

Genusus, decline of, in the Roman empire, 22.

Genovodus, the monk, his denunciation against a Greek union with the Latin church, 1174.

General, of the Roman general, under the emperor Honorius, his character, 487.

Genoves, their mercantile establishment in the suburb of Pera at Constantinople, 1109. Their war with the emperor Constantine, 1106. Victory over the Venetians and Greeks, 1111.

Genetic, king of the Vandals in Spain, his character, 320. Goes over to Africa on the invitation of count Boniface, 521. His successes there by the assistance of the Donatists, ibid. Devastation of Africa by his troops, 522. Besieges Boniface in Hippo Regius, ibid. His treacherous surprise of Carthage, 534. Strengthens himself by an alliance with Attila king of the Huns, 541. His brutal treatment of his wife, daughter of Theod-

- Adopted by Trajan, 29. His several adoptions of successors, ibid. Founders the city of Elia Capitolina on Mount Sion, 171. Reforms the laws of Rome in the perpetual edict, 719.
- Hadrianople*, battle of, between Constantine the Great and Licinius, 100. Is ineffectually besieged by the Goths, 411. Battle of, between the emperor Valens and the Goths, 409, 410.
- Hakem*, caliph of the Saracens, assumes a divine character to supplant the Mahometan faith, 1016, 1017.
- Hamadaniates*, the Saracen dynasty of, in Mesopotamia, 498.
- Hannibal*, review of the state of Rome when he besieged that city, 477.
- Hannibalantius*, nephew of Constantine the Great, is dignified with the title of king, 247. Provinces assigned to him for a kingdom, 248. Is cruelly destroyed by Constantius, 251.
- Happiness*, instance how little it depends on power and magnificence, 935, 936.
- Harmozan*, the Persian satrap, his interview with the caliph Omar, 896.
- Harpies*, an ancient mythologic history, Le Clerc's conjecture concerning, 222, note 4.
- Haukal al Rashid*, caliph, his friendly correspondence with the emperor Charlemagne, 851. His wars with the Greek empire, 933.
- Hassan*, the Saracen, conquers Carthage, 917.
- Hastings*, the art and sport of, introduced into Italy by the Lombards, 752.
- Hegra*, the era of, how fixed, 879.
- Helena*, the mother of Constantine, her parentage ascertained, 150. Was converted to Christianity by her son, 277, note 10.
- Helena*, sister of the emperor Constantius, married to Julian, 264. Is reported to be deprived of children by the arts of the empress Eusebia, ibid. Her death, 320.
- Helopulus* taken by the Saracens, 903.
- Hel*, according to Mahomet, described, 873.
- Hellespont* described, 223.
- Helvetia*, amount of its population in the time of Caesar, 84, note 36.
- Hengist*, his arrival in Britain, with succours for Vortigern, against the Caledonians, 603. His establishment in Kent, 606.
- Heraclion* of the emperor Zeno, character of, 700.
- Herry* succeeds his brother Baldwin as emperor of Constantinople, 1079. His character and administration, 1079, 1080.
- Henry III.*, emperor, his contest with pope Gregory VII., 988. Takes Rome, and sets up pope Clement III., ibid.
- Henry VI.*, emperor, conquers and pillages the island of Sicily, 1604.
- Hunry* the Fowler, emperor of Germany, defeats the Turkish invaders, 978.
- Heptarchy*, Saxon, establishment of, in Britain, 603.
- Review of the state of, 818, 603.
- Heraclian*, count of Africa, retains that province in obedience to Honorius, 489. His cruel usage of the refugees from the sack of Rome by Alaric, 442. His revolt and death, 504, 477.
- Heraclius*, emperor of Constantinople, 807, 808.
- Heraclius*, deposes the Eastern usurper Phocas, and is chosen emperor, 707. Conquers of Chosroes II king of Persia, 708, 709. His distressful situation, 710. Accepts an ignominious peace from Chosroes, ibid. His first expedition against the Persians, 711. His second Persian expedition, 773. Strengthens himself by an alliance with the Turks, 774. His third Persian expedition, 775. His treaty of peace with Persia, 777. His triumph and pilgrimage to Jerusalem, 777. His theological disputes, 774.
- Heraclius* marries his niece Martina, 807. Leaves his two sons joint successors to the empire, ibid. Invasion of his provinces by the Saracens, 827, et seq. Flees from Syria, 866. Death, 867.
- Heraclius* the praetor, his expedition against the Vandals in Africa, 533, 534.
- Heraclius* the eunuch, instigates the emperor Valentinian III to the murder of the petrician Etus, 549. His death, 550.
- Herakl*, character of his Bibliothèque Orientale, 893, note 15.
- Herzian* forest, the extent of, unknown in the time of Caesar, 81, note 5.
- Herz* in religion, the origin of, traced, 172. Edict of Constantine the Great, against, 291, 292.
- Hermanric*, king of the Ostrogoths, his conquests, 289. His death, 402.
- Hermeneuld*, prince of Bética, his marriage with Ingundis princess of Austrasia, and conversion to the Nicene faith, 586. Revolt and death, ibid.
- Hermits* of the East, their mortified course of life, 578. Miracles said to be performed by them and their relics, 579.
- Herm* does, the Egyptian, asserts the Romans in compiling their twelve tables (4 law), 717.
- Hermogenes*, master general of the cavalry, is killed in the attempt to banish Paul, bishop of Constantinople, 312.
- Hero and Leander*, the story of, by whom controverted and defended, 223, note 10.
- Herodes Atticus*, his extraordinary fortune and munificence, 17, 18.
- Heronian*, his life of Alexander Severus, why preferable to that in the Augustan history, 64, note 80.
- Herodotus*, his character of the Persian worship, 76.
- Herod*, of Germany and Poland, their character, 619.
- Hilarion*, the monk of Palestine, account of, 574.
- Hilarus*, bishop of Poiners, his remarkable observations on the diversity of Christian doctrines, 229. His exposition of the term Homoiousson, 300.
- Hilary*, pope, censures the emperor Anthemius for his tolerating principles, 463.
- Hilderic*, the Vandal king of Africa, his indulgence to his Catholic subjects displeases both the Arians and Athanasians, 631. Is deposed by Gelimer, ibid. Is put to death, 636.
- Hindoos* of the East, not the disciples of Zoroaster, 924, note 199.
- Hindostan*, conquest of, by Tamerlane, 1128.
- Hippo Regius*, siege of, by Genseric king of the Vandals, 522.
- History*, the principal subjects of, 83, 90.
- Holagor Khan*, conquests of, 1113.
- Holy war*, the justice of it ensured into, 1020, 1021.
- Homocide*, how commuted by the Salm laws, 597.
- Homoiousson*, origin and use of that term at the council of Nice, 298. And Homoiousson, the distinction between, 300.
- Honani*, war of, 890.
- Honoratus*, archbishop of Milan, is, with his clergy, driven from his see by the Lombards, 746.
- Honorata*, princess, sister of the emperor Valentinian III., her history, 741, 512.
- Honorius*, son of Theodosius the Great, is declared emperor of the West, by his dying father, 438. Marries Maria, the daughter of Stilicho, 458. His character, ibid. Flees from Milan on the invasion of Italy by Alaric, 463. His triumphant entry into Rome, 463. Abolishes the combats of gladiators, 465, 466. Fixes his residence at Ravenna, 467. Orders the death of Stilicho, 474. His impolitic measures and cruelty unite his barbarian soldiers against him under Alaric, 485. His councils distracted by the eunuchs, 487. His abortive overtures to Attilus and Alaric, 489. His last acts, and death, 497. His triumph for the reduction of Spain by Wallia the Goth, 501. Is suspected of incest with his sister Placidia, 518. His death, ibid. His persecution of the Donatists in Africa, 521.
- Honour*, the new ranks of, introduced in the city of Constantinople, 228, 653.
- Hosroes*, a fugitive Persian prince, in the court of the emperor Constantius, his remarks on the city of Rome, 555, note 42. His history, and station under Julian, 562, 553.
- Hosroes*, the son of Chosroes, king of Persia, his accession, 728. His character, ibid. Is deposed, and at length killed, 739, 739.
- Houses* of Arabia, their peculiar qualities, 810.
- Hosein*, the son of Ali, his tragical death, 823, 829.
- Hospitality* of the monks, 577.
- Hospitaliers*, knights, of St John of Jerusalem, popularity and character of the order of, 1039.
- Hstianus*, the minor son of the emperor Decius, elected emperor, under the guardianship of Gallus, 245.
- Huth*, king of Burgundy, his marriage with Marozia, and expulsion from Rome by Alaric, 854.
- High*, count of Vermandois, engages in the first crusade, 1025. Is shipwrecked, and made captive by the Greek emperor Alexis Comnenus, 1029. His return, 1033.
- Hivian* nature, its natural propensities, 180.
- Hume*, Mr., his natural history of religion, the best commentary on the polytheism of the ancients, 11, note 3. His difficulty, as to the extent of the Imperial palace at Rome, resolved, 70, note 18. Charges the most refined and philosophic sects with intolerance, 77, note 24.
- Hungary*, establishment of the Huns in, 520. State of, under the emperor Charlemagne, 830. Their character, 926. Terror excited by their first approach to Europe, 977.
- Hunades*, John, his exploits against the Turks, 1163, 1164. His violence of, 1164.
- Huneric*, the son of Gelimer, persecutes his Catholic subjects, 630. Is killed by the Catholics of Tipasa, 653.
- Huns*, their original seat, and their conquests in Scythia, 588. Wars with the Chinese, 588, 589. Their decline, 589. Their emigrations, 401. Their victories over the Goths, 414, 462. They drive other barbarous tribes before them, upon the Roman provinces, 467. Their establishment in modern Hungary, 526. Character of their king Attila, 527. Their invasion of Persia, 528.

529. The empire of, extinguished by the death of Attila, 548, 549.
- Hunting* of wild beasts, when a virtue, and when a vice, 50. Is the school of war, 295.
- Iulianus* and wives, Roman law concerning, 729.
- Hypatia*, the female philosopher, murdered in the church at Alexandria, 782.
- Hypatius*, sedition of, at Constantinople, 634.
- I and J
- Jacobites* of the East, history of the sect of, 799, 800.
- James*, St., his legendary exploits in Spain, 191.
- Januarius*, first institution of those troops, 1122.
- Iberum* and Caspian gates of Mount Caucasus, distinguished, 647. The Iberian gates occupied by Cabades king of Persia, 648.
- Idatius*, his account of the misfortunes of Spain by an irruption of the barbarous nations, 499, 500.
- Idolatriy* ascribed to the agency of demons, by the primitive Christians, 173. Derivation of the term, and its successive applications, 316, note 174.
- Jerom*, his extravagant representation of the devastation of Pannonia by the Goths, 411. His influence over the widow Paula, 575.
- Jerusalem*, its situation, destruction, and profanation, 338, 339. Pilgrimages to, and curious relics preserved there, 129. Abortive attempts of the emperor Julian to rebuild the temple, 339, 340. A magnificent church erected there to the Virgin Mary by Justinian, 643. The vessels of the temple brought from Africa to Constantinople by Eucharis, 660, 661. Is conquered by Chosroes II. king of Persia, 768. Insurrection of the monks there, 789. The city conquered by the Saracens, 905. Great resort of pilgrims to, 1016. Conquest of, by the Turks, 1017. Is taken from the Turks by the Egyptians, 1036. Is taken by the crusaders, 1037. Is erected into a kingdom under Godfrey of Bouillon, 1038. Succession of its Christian princes, 1049. Taken by Saladin, 1070. Is pillaged by the Caramanians, 1057.
- Jerusalem*, New, described according to the ideas of the primitive Christians, 178.
- Josue*, Portuguese, persecute the Eastern Christians, 798.
- Their labours in, and expulsion from, Abyssinia, 804, 805.
- Jews*, an obscure, unsocial, obstinate race of men, 168. Review of their history, 169. Their religion the basis of Christianity, 169, 170. The promises of divine favour extended by Christianity to all mankind, 170. The immortality of the soul not inculcated in the law of Moses, 173, 176. Why there are no Hebrew Gospels extant, 189. Provoked the persecutions of the Roman emperors, 195. Those of a more liberal spirit adopted the theological system of Plato, 224. Their condition under the emperors Constantine and Constantius, 238. Abortive attempt of Julian to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, 339, 340. Miraculous conversion of a number of, at Minorca, 419, note 84. Persecution of, in Spain, 557. Are persecuted by the Catholics in Italy, 623. And by Cyril at Alexandria, 782. How plagued by the emperor Justinian, 792. Those in Arabia subdued by Mahomet, 878. Assist the Saracens in the reduction of Spain, 924. Massacres of, by the first crusaders, 1024.
- Jazdegard*, king of Persia, is said to be left guardian to Theodosius the Younger, by the emperor Arcadius, 516. His war with Theodosius, 516.
- Jedutha*, the small island of, serves as a place of refuge for Romans who fled from the sack of Rome by Alaric, 492.
- Ignatius*, bishop of Antioch, the Christian fortitude displayed in his epistles, 107.
- Ikshidites*, the Saracen dynasty of, 918.
- Illystius*, the title of, how limited in the times of Roman simplicity, and how extended when Constantinople became the seat of empire, 228, 229.
- Idriacum*, described, 9.
- Imagis*, introduction of, into the Christian church, 853. The worship of, derived from Paganism, ibid. Are condemned by the council of Constantinople, 846. The adoration of, justified by pope Gregory II., 838. And sanctioned by the second council of Nice, 843, 846. The worship of, reluctantly admitted by the Franks, 846.
- Imperator*, in the Roman history, explained, 24, note 5. The Imperial prerogatives, 25. The court, 26. The sense of this appellation altered by long use, 144.
- Incarnation*, theological history of the doctrine of, 77, et seq.
- Incest*, natural, and arbitrary, distinguished, 731.
- India*, account of the Christians of St Thomas in, 798. Persecution of, by the Portuguese, ibid.
- Indictiones*, the memorable era of, whence dated, 179, note 62. The name and use of, in the middle ages, whence derived, 249.
- Indulgence*, in the Romish church, the nature of, explained, 1021, 1022.
- Inebrians*, princess of Austrasia, is married to Liemene, gold prince of Beticia, and cruelly treated by his mother Gotswintha, 586.
- Inheritance*, paternal, subject to parental discretion among the Romans, 62. Tax on inheritances, ibid. The Roman law of, 733. Testamentary dispositions of property, 734. The Vomanian law, how evaded, 735.
- Injuries*, review of the Roman laws for the redress of, 73.
- Innocent III.*, pope, enjoyed the plenitude of papal power, 571, 1053.
- Inquisition*, the first erection of that tribunal, 971.
- Institutes* of Justinian, an analysis of, 727.
- Interest* of money, how regulated by the Roman law, 756.
- Jonn*, pope, the story of, fictitious, 853, note 132.
- John*, principal secretary to the emperor Honorius, usurps the empire after his death, 518, 519.
- John*, the almsgiver, archbishop of Alexandria, relieves the Jewish refugees when Jerusalem was taken by the Persians, 768. His extraordinary liberality of the church treasure, 802.
- John*, bishop of Antioch, arrives at Ephesus after the meeting of the council, and, with his bishops, decides against Cyril, 785. Coalition between him and Cyril, ibid.
- John*, of Apri, patriarch of Constantinople, his pride, and confederacy against John Cantacuzene, 1103.
- John*, of Brenne, emperor of Constantinople, 1082.
- John*, of Cappadocia, praetorian prefect of the East, under the emperor Justinian, his character, 640. Is disgraced by the empress Theodora, and becomes a bishop, ibid. Opposes the African war, 652. His fraud in supplying the army with bread, 654.
- John Comnenus*, emperor of Constantinople, 826, 827.
- John Damascenus*, St., his history, 837, note 22.
- John* of Lycopolis, the hermit, his character, and oracular promise to the emperor Theodosius the Great, 436.
- John*, the Monophysite bishop of Asa, is employed by the emperor Justinian to root out Pagans and heretics, 802.
- John XII.*, pope, his flagitious character, 854. Degradation of, ibid.
- John XXIII.*, pope, his profligate character, 1213.
- John*, St., the evangelist, reveals the true sense of Plato's doctrine of the Logos, 234.
- John* the Sanguinary, seizes the Gothic treasures in Aecum, and obliges Vitiges to raise the siege of Rome, 672, 673.
- John Zimisces*, murders the Greek emperor Nicephorus, and succeeds him, 821. His Eastern victories, 947. Defeats Swatoslaus, czar of Russia, 982, 983.
- Jona*, one of the Hebride islands, its ancient monastic eminence, 574.
- Jovis*, renegade of Damascus, story of, 901, 902.
- Jordan*, character of his work, De Originibus Sclavicis, 673, note 8.
- Joseph* the Arizmanian, governor of Berzem, kills the sultan Alp Arslan, 912.
- Josephus*, the mention of Jesus Christ in his history, a forgery, 501, note 36. His opinion, that Plato derived knowledge from the Jews, controverted, 230, note 11.
- Jorian* is elected emperor by the troops of Julian, on their retreat from Assyria, 562. His treaty with Sapor king of Persia, 563. His death, 569.
- Jovians* and Herulians, new bodies of guards instituted to supersede the praetorian bands, 144.
- Jovinian* of Verona, his punishment by a Roman synod, for heresy, 402.
- Jovinus* reduces the Alemanni, who had invaded Gaul, 480. Account of his revolt against the emperor Honorius in Germany, 488.
- Jovius*, praetorian prefect under the emperor Honorius, succeeds Olympias as his confidential minister, 487. His negotiations with Alaric obstructed, 488. Deserts Honorius, and goes over to Alaric, and the new emperor Arcadius, 489.
- Jovis*, her marriage with the Greek emperor Leo, 812. Her ambition, and barbarity to her son Constantine, 817. Restores moages to public devotion, 845.
- Irakund* was first colonised from Scotland, 887. Derivation of the name of its titular saint, Patrick, 579, note 176.
- Isaac I.*, Comnenus, emperor of Constantinople, 826, 828.
- Isaac II.*, Angelus, emperor of Constantinople, 828. His character and reign, 1043. Is deposed by his brother Alexius, 1061. Is restored by the crusaders, 1069. His death, 1071.
- Isaac*, archbishop of Armenia, his apology for the vices of king Artasars, 517.
- Isauria*, the rebellion there against the emperor Gallienus, 106.
- Isaurians*, reduction of, by the Eastern emperors, 645.
- Isidore*, cardinal, his ill treatment in Russia, 1190. Receives an act of union from the Greek clergy at Constantinople, 1115.
- Isocrates*, his oration for the tuition of his pupils, 419.
- Italy*, state of, described, 89. Revolt of the Goths, 479. The domination of, under Odoacer, succeeds the extinction of the Western empire, 500. The variable state at this day, 502. Conversion of the Lombards, 671.

the Nicene faith, 587 Is reduced by Theodoric the Ostrogoth, 617 His administration, 618 Civil government of, according to the Roman law, by Theodoric, 620 Its flourishing state at this time, 621, 622 How supplied with silk from China, 623 History of Amalasontha queen of Italy, 623 Invasion of, by Belisarius, 664 Siege of Rome by the Goths, 668 Invasion of Italy by the Franks, 674 Expedition of the eunuch Narses, 704 Invasion of, by the Franks and Alemanni, 709 Government of, under the exarchs of Ravenna, 710 Conquests of Alboin king of the Lombards in 745, 746 Distress of, 749 How divided between the Lombards and the exarchs of Ravenna, 750 Growth of the papal power in, 837, 838 Revolt of, against the Greek emperors, 839 The exarchate of Ravenna granted to the pope, 844 Extent of the dominions of Charlemagne there, 850 The power of the German Cesars destroyed by the rise of the commercial cities there, 855 Conflict of the Saracens, Latins, and Greeks in, 985 Faction of the Guelphs and Ghibelines, 1200 Revival of Greek learning in, 1153 Authors consulted for the history of, 1217, note 98.

Jubilee, popish, a revival of the secular games, 73, note 56, 1198. The return of, accelerated, 1198.

Jude, St., examination of his grandsons before the tribunal of the procurator of Judea, 342.

Judgments of God, in the Saxon laws, how determined, 549.

Judgments, popular, of the Romans, displayed, 740.

Julia Domna, wife of the emperor Severus, her character, 48 Her death, 54.

Julian, the nephew of Constantine the Great, his education, 290 His dangerous situation on the death of his brother Gallus, 303 Is sent to Athens, where he cultivates philosophy, ibid Is recalled by Constantius, ibid Is invested with the title of Cesar, 304 Is appointed to the government of Gaul, 370 His first campaign, 371 Second campaign, 371, 372 Battle of Strasburg, 372 Reduces the Franks at Foxolin, 373 His three expeditions beyond the Rhine, 374 Retires to the cities of Gaul, ibid His civil administration, 375 Is account of the theological disputes of the empire under Constantius, 375 Constantine grows jealous of him, 376 The Gaulish legions are ordered into the East, 377 Is saluted emperor by the troops, 378 His embassy and epistle to Constantius, 379 His fourth and fifth expeditions beyond the Rhine, 382 Declares war against Constantius, and alpires the Christian religion, 381 His march from the Rhine into Myricum, 382 Enters Sirmium, ibid Publishes apologies for his conduct, 383 His triumphant entry into Constantinople on the death of Constantius, 384 His private life and civil government, 384, 385 His reformation in the Imperial palace, 385 Becomes a sloven to avoid foppery, 386 Erects a tribunal for the trial of the civil ministers of Constantius, 387 Dismisses the spies and informers employed by his predecessors, ibid His love of freedom and the republic, 388 His kindness to the Greek cities, ibid His abilities as an orator, 389 And as a preacher, ibid His character, ibid His apostasy accounted for, 390 Adopts the Pagan mythology, 391 His theological system, 392 His initiation into the Elysian mysteries, and his baptism, 393 His hypocritical duplicity, 394 Writes a vindication of his apostasy, ibid His edict for a general toleration, 395 His Pagan superstitions, 396, 397 His circular letters for the reformation of the Pagan religion, 396 His industry in gaining proselytes, 397 His address to the Jews, ibid History of his attempt to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem, 399, 400 Transfers the revenues of the Christian church to the heathen priests, 401 Prohibits Christian schools, ibid Orders the Christians to renounce the Pagan temples, 402 Restores the sacred grove and temple of Delphes, 403 Persecutes the Christians of Antioch for burning the temple, 404 His attempt of the cities of Ephesus and Alexandria, 405 Banishes Athanasius, 406 The philosopher Iulius the Cæsars, delineated, 347, 348 Meditates the conquest of Persia, 408 Popular discontents during his residence at Antioch, 349 Occasion of writing his Mysopogon, 350 His march to the Euphrates, 352 He enters the Persian territories, ibid Invades Assyria, 354 His personal conduct in this enterprise, 355 His address to his discontented troops, 356 His successful passage over the Tigris, 357 Burns his fleet, 358 His retreat and mistres, 360 His death, 361 Reflections on his death and funeral, 361, 367.

Julian, count, offers to betray Spain into the hands of the Arabs, 921 His advice to the victorious Turks, 920.

Julian, the papal legate, exhorts Ladislaus, king of Hungary and Poland, to breach of faith with the Turks, 1162 His death and character, 1164.

Julius, master-general of the troops in the Eastern empire, conceals a general massacre of the Gothic youth in Asia, 412.

Jurisprience, Roman, a review of, 716 Was polished by Grecian philosophy, 732 Abuses of, 741.

Justin the Elder, his military promotion, 627 His elevation to the empire, and character, ibid His death, 628.

Justin II., emperor, succeeds his uncle Justinian, 742 His firm behaviour to the ambassadors of the Avars, 743 His abdication, and investiture of Tiberius, as his successor, 747, 748 His death, 748.

Justin Martyr, his decision in the case of the Ebionites, 371 His extravagant account of the progress of Christianity, 192 Occasion of his own conversion, 193.

Justina, the popular story of her marriage with the emperor Valentinian examined, 192 Her infant son Valentinian II. invested with the Imperial ensigns, on the death of his father, 293 Her contest with Ambrose archbishop of Milan, 427 Flies from the invasion of Maximus with her son, 429.

Justinian, emperor of the East, his birth and promotion, 626, 627 His orthodoxy, 627, 628 Is invested with the diadem by his uncle Justin, 628 Marries Theodora, 630 Patronises the blue faction of the circus, 631 State of agriculture and manufacture in his provinces, 635 Introduces the culture of the silk-worm, and manufacture of silk, into Greece, 637 State of his revenue, 638 His avarice and profusion, ibid Taxes and monopolies, 639 His ministers, 640 His public buildings, 641 Founds the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, ibid His other public works, 643 His European fortifications, 644 His Asiatic fortifications, 645, 646 He suppresses the schools of Athens, 648 And the consular dignity, 650 Purchases a peace from the Persians, 651 Undertakes to restore Hilderic king of Carthage, 651 Reduction of Africa, 655 His instructions for the government of Africa, 659 His acquisitions in Spain, 662 His successful negotiations in Italy, 663 Weakness of his empire, 675 Receives an embassy from the Avars, 684 And from the Turks, 684, 685 Persian war, 689, 690 His negotiations with Chosroes, 695 His alliance with the Abyssinians, 697 Neglects the Italian war under Belisarius, 701 Settles the government of Italy under the exarch of Ravenna, 710 Disgrace and death of Belisarius, 712 His death and character, 712, 713 Comets and calamities in his reign, 713 His Code, Pandects, and Institutes, 715, 716 His theological character and government, 791 His persecuting spirit, 792 His orthodoxy, 793 Died a heretic, 794.

Justinian II., emperor of Constantinople, 849, 850.

Justinian, the son of Germanus, his conspiracy, with the eunuchs Sophia, and successes against the Persians, 741.

Juvénal, his remarks on the crowded state of the inhabitants of Rome, 454.

K

Khan, import of this title in the northern parts of Asia, 386 Paragages of the Tartar khans, 386, 387.

King, the title of, conferred by Constantine the Great on his nephew Hannibalianus, 247.

Kindred, degrees of, according to the Roman civil law, 732.

Knight, ibid, how originally conferred, and its obligations, 120, 162.

Korish, Mahomet, account and character of the, 870.

Korish, the tribe of, a quire the custody of the Caaba at Mecca, 867 Pedigree of Mahomet, 867 They oppose his pretensions to a prophetic character, 874 Flight of Mahomet, 875 Battle of Bedr, 877 Battle of Uhud, 878 Mecca surrendered to Mahomet, 879.

L

Laborum, or standard of the cross, in the army of Constantine the Great, described, 280, 281.

Labia, the crokin, his diligence in business and composition, 722 His professional character, 723.

Lacina, account of the tunicen of, 952.

Lactantius, difficulties in ascertaining the date of his Divine Institutions, 370, note 1 His flattering prediction of the influence of Christianity among mankind, 378 Indicates the divine right of Constantine to the empire, 379.

Ladislaus, king of Hungary and Poland, leads an army against the Turks, 1162 His breach of faith with them, 1167 His death, ibid.

Ladislaus, king of Naples, harasses Rome during the schism of the papacy, 1372.

Lactantius, the poet, conspires the death of Commodus, and confers the empire on Pertinax, 37.

Lactantius, when first de-naturalised from the clergy, 185.

Lactantius, a Roman satirist, boldly condemns the treaty with Maric the Goth, 473.

- Lance, Holy*, narrative of the miraculous discovery of, 1035.
- Land*, how assessed by the Roman emperors, 240. How divided by the barbarians, 249. Allodial, and Salic, distinguished, ibid. Of Italy, how partitioned by Theodoric the O-goth, 618.
- Landica*, its ancient splendour, 19.
- Lascaris, Theodore*, establishes an empire at Nice, 1077. His character, 1080.
- Lascaris, Theodore II* his character, 1091.
- Lascaris, Janus*, the Greek grammarian, his character, 1156.
- Latin Church*, occasion of its separation from the Greek church, 1057, 1058. Corruption and schism of, 1145, 1147. Re-union of, with the Greek church, 1151. The subsequent Greek schism, 1153.
- Latin Language*, oblivion of, 963.
- Latona*, the right of, explained, 14.
- Lauria*, in monkish history, explained, 578.
- Lave*, review of the profession of, under the emperors, 253.
- Laws of Rome*, review of, 716. Those of the kings, 717. Of the twelve tables, ibid. Of the people, 718. Decrees of the senate, and edicts of the prætors, 719. Constitutions of the emperors, ibid. Their rescripts, 721. The three codes of, ibid. The forms of, 720, 721. Succession of civil lawyers, 721. Reformation of, by Justinian, 723. Abolition and revival of the penal laws, 738.
- Laws of the barbarians*, 560—600. Of the Visigoths in Spain, 604.
- Lave*, the tube of, in Colebos, account of, 683.
- Le Clerc*, character of his ecclesiastical history, 771, note 1.
- Legatus* and inheritances taxed by Augustus, 62. How regulated by the Roman law, 74.
- Legion*, in the Roman army under the emperors, constitution of, 4. Their discipline, ibid. Exercises, 5. Arms, ibid. General distribution of the legions, 7. The size of, reduced by Constantine the Great, 233.
- Ley of Thrace* is made emperor of the East, by his master Aspar, 552. Was the first Christian potentate who was crowned by a priest, ibid. Concede the empire of the West on Antiochus, ibid. His ornament against the Vandals in Africa, 563, 564. Murders Aspar and his sons, 615.
- Leo III*, emperor of Constantinople, 811. His edicts against images in churches, ibid. Revolt of Italy, 820.
- Leo IV*, emperor of Constantinople, 812.
- Leo V*, emperor of Constantinople, 814.
- Leo VI*, the philosopher, emperor of Constantinople, 818. Extra cushions the power of the senate, 978.
- Leo*, Bishop of Rome, his character, and embassy from Valentinian III to Attila king of the Huns, 748. Intercedes with Genseric king of the Vandals for immunity to the city of Rome, 552. Calls the council of Chalcedon, 788.
- Leo III*, pope, his miraculous recovery from the assault of assassins, 547. Crowned Charlemagne emperor of the Romans, 818.
- Leo IV*, pope, his reign, 841. Found the Leonine city, 942.
- Leo IX*, pope, his expedition against the Normans of Apulia, 944. His treaty with them, ibid.
- Leo*, metropolitan of Thessalonica, one of the restorers of Greek learning, 564.
- Leo*, general of the East, under the emperor Arcadius, his character, 368.
- Leo Pilatus*, best Greek professor at Florence, and in the West, his character, 368.
- Leo*, the Jew proselyte, history of his family, 1199.
- Leonas*, the questor, his embassy from Constantius to Julian, 321.
- Leonine city at Rome* founded, 942.
- Leontius* is taken from prison, and chosen emperor of Constantinople, on the deposition of Justinian II, 899.
- Leontius*, Gothic king of Spain, his character, 553, 559. Revolt and death of his son Herminigild, 580.
- Letters*, a knowledge of, the test of civilisation in a people, 82.
- Louis the Pious*, emperor of the Romans, 851.
- Louis II*, emperor of the Romans, 851. His epistle to the Greek emperor, Basil I, 987.
- Libanius*, his account of the private life of the emperor Julian, 325. And of his divine visions, 333. Applauds the disimulation of Julian, 334. His character, 350. His eulogium on the emperor Valens, 410.
- Libertus*, bishop of Rome, is banished by the emperor Constantius, for refusing to concur in deposing Athanasius, 338.
- Liberty*, public, the only sure guardians of, against an aspiring prince, 23.
- Licinius* is invested with the purple by the emperor Galerius, 154. His alliance with Constantine the Great, 161. Defeats Maximian, 161, 162. His cruelty, 162. Is defeated by Constantine at Châlons, 163. And at Mardia, 164. Peace concluded with Constantine, ibid. Second civil war with Constantine, 165, 166. His humiliation, and death, 167. Letter of Constantine to Constantius, 167. His alliance with Licinius, the emperor of the East, 167. Violated this engagement by oppressing the Christians, 279. Cæcilius's account of his vision, 281.
- Lieutenant*, Imperial, his office and rank, 24.
- Lightning*, superstition of the Romans with reference to persons and places struck with, 120.
- Limigantes*, Sarmatian slaves, expel their masters, and usurp possession of their country, 254. Extinction of, by Constantius, 266, 267.
- Literature*, revival of, in Italy, 1153. Ancient, use and abuse of, 1157, 1158.
- Lithuanus*, its late conversion to Christianity, 984.
- Litorus*, count, is defeated and taken captive in Gaul by Theodoric, 339, 340.
- Luitprand*, king of the Lombards, attacks the city of Rome, 841.
- Luitprand*, bishop of Cremona, ambassador to Constantinople, ceremony of his audience with the emperor, 940, 946.
- Logos*, Plato's doctrine of, 254. Is expounded by St John the Evangelist, ibid. Athanasius confesses himself unable to comprehend it, 295. Controversies on the eternity of, 296, 297.
- Logothete*, Great, his office under the Greek emperors, 955.
- Lombardy*, ancient, described, 8. Conquest of, by Charlemagne, 842.
- Lombards*, derivation of their name, and review of their history, 880. Their conversion to Christianity, 587. Are employed by the emperor Justinian to check the Gepids, 680. Actions of their king Alboin, 743. They reduce the Gepids, 744. They overrun that part of Italy now called Lombardy, 745, 746. Extent of their kingdom, 751. Language and manners of the Lombards, ibid. Dress and marriage, 752. Government and laws, 752, 753.
- Longinus*, his representation of the degeneracy of his age, 25. Is put to death by Atrichus, 117. Is sent to supersede Narses, as exarch of Ravenna, 745. Receives Rosamond, the fugitive queen of the Lombards, 747.
- Lothaire I*, emperor of the Romans, 851.
- Lothar VII* of France is rescued from the treachery of the Greeks by Roger, king of Sicily, 1001. Undertakes the second crusade, 1042. His disastrous expedition, 1044.
- Louis IX*, of France, his crusades to the Holy Land, 1055. His captivity in Egypt, and death, 1060. Procured a valuable stock of riches from Constantinople, 1081.
- Lucian*, the severity of his satire against the heathen mythology accounted for, 12.
- Lucian*, count of the East, under the emperor Arcadius, his cruel treatment by the prætor Hætricius, 42.
- Lucian*, presbyter of Jerusalem, his marvellous escape very of the body of St Stephen, the first Christian martyr, 448.
- Lucianus*, governor of Illyria, is surprised, and kindly treated by Jul. ibid. His character, 60.
- Lucinda*, sister of the emperor Commodus, her attempt to get him assassinated, 53.
- Lucius II*, and III, popes, their disastrous reigns, 1188.
- Lucerne Lake* described, with its late destruction, 181, note 40.
- Lutollen villa* in Campania, its description and history, 571.
- Lupercalia*, the feast of, described, and continued under the Christian emperors, 263.
- Lupicinus*, the Roman governor of Thrace, oppresses the Gothic emigrants there, 404. Rashly provokes them to hostilities, 405. Is defeated by them, ibid.
- Lutetia* contribution in the Roman empire, explained, 242.
- Luther, Martin*, his character, as a reformer, 972.
- Lucretius*, the only means of correcting the unequal distribution of property, 21. Its progress in the Roman empire, ibid. Of the Greek emperors, 973.
- Lugians*, a formidable German nation, account of, 125.
- Lyons*, battle of, between the competitors Severus and Albinus, 45.

Macedonia, state of, in the age of the Antonines, 9.

Macdonus, the Arian bishop of Constantinople, his contests with his competitor Paul, 42. Fatal consequences on his removing the body of the emperor Constantine to the church of St Andrew, ibid. His cruel persecutions of the Catholics and Novatians, 415. His exile, 791.

Macrianus, prætorian præfet under the emperor Valerian, his character, 162.

Macrianus, a prince of the Alemanni, his steady alliance with the emperor Valerian, ibid.

Macrianus, his succession to the empire promoted by an Arian, 162.

Macrianus, his character, his death, 162.

Macrianus, his character, his death, 162.

Macrianus, his character, his death, 162.

- Meonius* of Palmyra assassinates his uncle Odenathus, 115.
- Messa*, its situation, 9.
- Magi*, the worship of, in Persia, reformed by Artaxerxes, 57. Abnegation of the Persian theology, ibid. Simplicity of their worship, 76. Ceremonies and moral precepts, ibid. Their power, ibid. Spirit of persecution, 77. Their fall, 924.
- Magic*, severe prosecution of persons for the crime of, at Rome and Antioch, 373.
- Magistrate*, imperial, power of, 25, 26.
- Magnentius* assumes the empire in Gaul, 255. Sends an embassy to Constantius, 256. Makes war against Constantius, 257. Is defeated at the battle of Mursa, ibid. Kills himself, 259.
- Mahmud*, the Gaznevide, his twelve expeditions into Hindostan, 1000. His character, ibid.
- Mahomet*, the prophet, his embassy to Chosroes II. king of Persia, 762. His genealogy, birth, and education, 806. His person and character, 807. Assumes his prophetic mission, 808, 809. Inculcated the unity of God, 808. His reverent mention of Jesus Christ, 809. His Koran, 870. His miracles, 871. His precepts, ibid. His hell, and paradise, 872, 873. The best authorities for his history, 873, note 111. Converts his own family, 874. Preaches publicly at Mecca, 874. Escapes from the Koraishites there, 875. Is received as prince of Meccah, ibid. His regal dignity, and sacerdotal office, 876. Declares war against infidels, ibid. Battle of Beder, 877. Battle of Ohad, 878. Subdues the Jews of Arabia, ibid. Substitution of Mecca to him, 879. He conquers Arabia, 880. First war against the Romans, 881. His sickness and death, 882. His character, 883. His private life, ibid. His wives, 884. His children, 885. His posterity, 889. Remarks on the great spread and permanency of his religion, 890.
- Mahomet*, the son of Bajazet, his reign, 1157.
- Mahomet II.*, sultan of the Turks, his character, 1163. His reign, 1169. Indications of his hostile intentions against the Greeks, ibid. He besieges Constantinople, 1172. 1174. Takes the city by storm, 1179. His entry into the city, 1180. Makes it his capital, 1182. His death, 1183.
- Mahometism*, by what means propagated, 924. Toleration of Christianity under, 925, 924.
- Majorian*, his history, character, and elevation to the Western empire, 556. His epistle to the senate, 556, 557. His salutary laws, 557. His preparations to invade Africa, 559. His fleet destroyed by Genseric, ibid. His death, 561.
- Maluterra*, his character of the Normans, 989.
- Malik Shah*, sultan of the Turks, his prosperous reign, 1013. Reforms the Eastern calendar, ibid. His death, ibid.
- Mallius Theodorus*, the great civil honours to which he attained, 253, note 121.
- Mamluks*, their origin and character, 1055. Their establishment in Egypt, ibid.
- Mamea*, mother of the young emperor Alexander Severus, acts as regent of the empire, 57. Is put to death with him, 15. Her conference with Origen, 210.
- Mango*, an African in nobility, his history, 129.
- Mao*, the only animal that can accommodate himself to all climates, 82, note 11.
- Manumission*, in the Roman law, explained, 772.
- Manicheans* are devoted to death, by the edict of Theodosius against heretics, 425.
- Manuel Comnenus*, emperor of Constantinople, 927, 928. He repulses the Normans, 1002. But fails in his scheme of subduing the Western empire, 1002, 1003. His ill-treatment of the crusaders, 1015, 1014.
- Marogastachia*, a city of Assyria, reduced and destroyed by the emperor Julian, 755.
- Mars*, the four species of, most esteemed by the Romans, 3, note 10.
- Marsden*, count of the sacred largesses under the emperor Constantine in Gaul, assists the migration of Constantius, 253. His embassy to Constantius, 256. Was killed in the battle of Mursa, 259.
- Masceus*, his revolt in Dalmatia, and character, 760. Joins the emperor Anthemius, and expels the Vandals from Sardinia, 564. His death, 565.
- Marcellianus*, son of the prefect Maximian, his treacherous murder of Gaius king of the Quadi, 291.
- Marcellus*, the centurion, martyred for desertion, 213.
- Marcellus*, bishop of Rome, exiled to restore peace to the city, 417.
- Marcellus*, bishop of Apamea in Syria, loses his life in destroying the Pagan temples, 442, 443.
- March*, order of, in the Roman armies, 7.
- Marcia*, the concubine of the emperor Commodus, a patroness of the Christians, 219.
- Marcian*, senator of Constantinople, marries the empress Pulcheria, and is acknowledged emperor, 537. His temperate refusal of the demands of Attila the Hun, 538.
- Marcianopolis*, the city of, taken by the Goths, 43.
- Marcomanni* are subdued and punished by Marcus Antoninus, 80. Alliance made with, by the emperor Gal. Irenus, 98.
- Marcus* elected bishop of the Nazarenes, 171.
- Marcia*, battle of, between Constantine the Great and Licinius, 164.
- Margus*, battle of, between Diocletian and Carinus, 132.
- Margus*, bishop of, betrays his episcopal city into the hands of the Huns, 529.
- Maria*, daughter of Eudamon of Carthage, her remarkable adventures, 525.
- Mariana*, his account of the misfortunes of Spain, by an irruption of the barbarous nations, 499, 500.
- Marmus*, a subaltern officer, chosen emperor by the legions of Mesia, 90.
- Marius* the armourer, a candidate for the purple among the competitors against Gallienus, his character, 104.
- Mari*, bishop of Arethusa, is cruelly treated by the emperor Julian, 342.
- Marianga*, engagement there between the emperor Julian and Sapor king of Persia, 530.
- Marsant*, of the East, character and history of, 800.
- Marcia*, a Roman prostitute, the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother, of three popes, 855.
- Marriage*, regulations of, by the Roman laws, 729. Of Roman citizens with strangers, proscribed by their jurisprudence, 731. Of the Greek emperors, how regulated, 876.
- Martel*, Charles, duke of the Franks, his character, 931. His politic conduct on the Saracen invasion of France, 932. Defeats the Saracens, ibid. Why he was consigned over to hell flames by the clergy, 933.
- Martin*, bishop of Tours, destroys the idols and Pagan temples in Gaul, 442. His monkish institutions there, 574.
- Martia* marries her uncle, the emperor Heracleus, 807. Endeavours to share the imperial dignity with her sons, ibid. Her fate, 808.
- Martianus* receives the title of Caesar from the emperor Licinius, 167.
- Martyrs*, primitive, inconsiderable number of, 205, 220. The several inducements to martyrdom, 207. Three methods of escaping it, 208. Marks by which learned Catholics distinguish the relics of the martyrs, 205, note 73. The worship of, and their relics, introduced, 447, 449.
- Mary*, Virgin, her immaculate conception, borrowed from the Koran, 969.
- Mascezel*, the persecuted brother of Gildo the Moor, takes refuge in the Imperial court of Honorius, 457. Is intrusted with troops to reduce Gildo, ibid. Defeats him, 457, 458. His suspicious death, 458.
- Master* of the offices, under Constantine the Great, his functions, 537.
- Materius*, his revolt and conspiracy against the emperor Commodus, 24.
- Mattheus*, St. his Gospel originally composed in Hebrew, 189, note 152. 778, note 5.
- Maurice*, his birth, character, and promotion to the Eastern empire, 749. Restores Chosroes II. king of Persia, 769, 761. His war against the Avars, 763. State of his armies, 764. His abdication and death, 765, 766.
- Mauritania*, ancient, its situation and extent, 10. Character of the native Moors of, 521.
- Mazentius*, the son of Maximian, declared emperor at Rome, 157. His tyranny in Italy and Africa, 156. The military force he had to oppose Constantine, 157, 158. His defeat and death, 160. His politic humanity to the Christians, 210.
- Mazmanian*, associate in the empire with Diocletian, his character, 157. Triumphs with Diocletian, 143. Holds his court at Milan, ibid. Abolishes the empire along with Diocletian, 144. He resumes the purple, 153. Reduces Severus, and puts him to death, ibid. His second resignation, and unfortunate end, 155. His aversion to the Christians accounted for, 213.
- Maximilianus*, the African, a Christian martyr, 213.
- Maximian*, his birth, torture, and elevation to the empire of Rome, 64, 65. His tyranny and oppression, 65, 66. Events of his reign, 115-50. His murder, and character, 71. Why deemed a persecutor of the Christians, 150.
- Maximian* is declared Cæsar, on the abdication of Diocletian, 150. Obtains the rank of Augustus from Galerius, 151. His defeat and death, 161, 162. Renewed the persecution of the Christians after the toleration granted by Galerius, 219.
- Maximin*, the cruel minister of the emperor Valentinian, promoted to the prelatore of Gaul, 753.
- Maximin*, his embassy from Theodosius the Younger, to Attila king of the Huns, 533.
- Maximus* and Balbinus elected joint emperors by the senate, on the deaths of the two Gordians, 68. Their characters, 69. And massacre, 71, 72.
- Maximus*, his character and revolt in Britain, 419. His treaty with the emperor Theodosius, 420. Persecutes the Priscillianists, 425, 426. His invasion of Italy, 420. His defeat and death, 420.

- Mazinus, the Pagan preceptor of the emperor Julian, initiates him into the Lieu-mian mysteries, 317. Is honourably invited to Constantinople by his Imperial pupil, 337. Is corrupted by his residence at court, ibid.
Maximus, Petronius, his wife ravished by Valentinian III. emperor of the West, 50. His character, and elevation to the empire, 551. Death, 552.
Mehodys, the Persian general, ungratefully treated by Chosroes, 696.
Mecca, its situation and description, 830. The Caaba, or temple of, 865. Its deliverance from Abraham, 867. The doctrine of Mahomet opposed there, 874. His escape from, 875. The city of, surrendered to Mahomet, 879. Is pillaged by Abu Taher, 145.
Medices, Cosmo and Lorenzo de, characters of, 1157.
Medina, reception of Mahomet there, on his flight from Mecca, 875.
Mediterranean Sea, and its islands, notice of, 10, 11.
Megalesia, the festival of, at Rome, described, 34, note 18.
Melietans, an Egyptian sect, persecuted by Athanasius, 104.
Melitene, battle of, between the Eastern emperor Tiberius and Chosroes king of Persia, 757.
Melo, citizen of Bari, invites the Normans into Italy, 989.
Memphis, its situation, and reduction by the Saracens, 949.
Merovingian kings of the Franks in Gaul, origin of, 540. Their domain and benefices, 549.
Mervan, caliph of the Saracens, and the last of the house of Oumiyah, his defeat and death, 944.
Mesopotamia, invasion of, by Sapor, 258. And by the emperor Julian, 352. Described by Xenophon, 563.
Meswala, Valerius, the first praetor of Rome, his high character, 231, note 104.
Messiah, under what character he was expected by the Jews, 170. His birthday, how fixed by the Romans, 321, note 22.
Mitels and money, their operation in improving the human mind, 83.
Mitellus Numicus, the censor, his invective against women, 37, note 64.
Mitius Falconius, his speech to the emperor Tacitus in the senate on his election, 121.
Myrophans of Cyzicus, is made patriarch of Constantinople, 1160.
Mt. Iz, cruel treatment of, by Attila king of the Huns, 542.
Michael I, Rhangabe, emperor of Constantinople, 814.
Michael II, the Stammerer, emperor of Constantinople, 815.
Michael III, emperor of Constantinople, 816. Is defeated by the Paulicans, 960.
Michael IV, the Paphlagonian, emperor of Constantinople, 922.
Michael V, Calaphates, emperor of Constantinople, 923.
Michael VI, Stratioticus, emperor of Constantinople, 923.
Michael VII, Palapinaces, emperor of Constantinople, 924.
Milan, how the Imperial court of the Western empire came to be transferred from Rome to that city, 143. Famous edict of Constantine the Great in favour of the Christians, published there, 257. St Ambrose elected archbishop of that city, 431, 437. Timotheus occasioned by his refusing a church for the Arian worship of the empress Justina and her son, 427. Revolt of, to Justinian, 672. Is taken and destroyed by the Burgundians, 674. Is again destroyed by Frederic I., 856.
Military Force, its strength and efficacy dependent on a due proportion to the number of the people, 29, 40.
Military Establishment of the Roman empire, in the age of the Antonines, 4-7.
Military Officers of the Roman empire at the time of Constantine the Great, a review of, 235, 234.
Millennium, the doctrine of, explained, 176.
Mingrelia. See Colchis.
Minority, two distinctions of, in the Roman law, 454, note 26.
Minacles, those of Christ and his apostles, escaped the notice of the heathen philosophers and historians, 194. Account of those wrought by the body of St. Stephen, 448. Of the monks, 579.
Miraculous powers of the primitive church, an enquiry into, 178, 179.
Misothens, chief minister and father-in-law of the third Gordian, his character, 72.
Misopogon of the emperor Julian, on what occasion written, 350.
Missorium, or great golden dish of Adolphus king of the Visigoths, history of, 426.
Monatagh, assumes the title of caliph, and makes war against Ali, 887. His character and reign, 888. Lays siege to Constantinople, 927.
Modar, prince of the Amali, seduced by the emperor Theodosius, turns his arms against his own countrymen, 415.
Moguls, primitive, their method of treating their conquered enemies, 551. Reign and conquests of Zingis, 1111. Conquests of his successors, 1114-1117. See Tamerlane.
Moguntiacum, the city of, surprised by the Alemanni, 380.
Mokawlas, the Egyptian, his treaty with the Saracen Amrou, 910.
Monachy defined, 23. Hereditary, ridiculous in theory, but salutary in fact, 63, 84. The peculiar objects of cruelty and of avarice under, 29.
Monastic institutions, the seeds of, sown by the primitive Christians, 181. Origin, progress, and consequences of, 572.
Money, the standard and computation of, under Constantine the Great, and his successors, 241, note 180.
Monks have embellished the sufferings of the primitive martyrs by fictions, 204. Character of, by Eusebius, 447. By Rutilius, 457. Origin and history of, 572. Their industry in making proselytes, 57-75. Their obedience, 573. Their dress and habitations, 573, 576. Their diet, 576. Their manual labour, ibid. Their riches, 577. Their solitude, ibid. Their devotion and visions, ibid. Their division into the classes of Cenobites, and Anachorites, 578. Suppression of, at Constantinople, by Constantine V., 837. The sect of, 799.
Military government of the Roman empire, 73. His opinion that the degrees of freedom in a state are measured by taxation, controverted, 270.
Montius, quæstor of the palace, is sent by the emperor Constantius, with Domitian, to correct the administration of Gallus in the East, 261. Is put to death there, 272.
Monuments, splendid, erected by the Romans, 17, 18.
Moors of Barlary, their miserable poverty, 492. Their invasion of the Roman province punished by Solomon the Eunuch, ibid. Adopted by the Arabs, 918.
Morea is reduced by the Turks, 1183.
Morossini, Thomas, elected patriarch of Constantinople by the Venetians, 1075.
Mosedama, an Arabian chief, endeavours to rival Mahomet in his prophetic character, 801, 802.
Moses, the doctrine of the immortality of the soul not mediated in his law, 175. His sanguinary laws compared with those of Mahomet, 849.
Mosheim, character of his work De Rebus Christianis ante Constantinum, 778, note 1.
Moschatus, the Syrian, besieges Constantinople, 929.
Moschus, the last caliph of the Saracens, his wars with the Greek emperor Theophilus, 945. Is killed by the Moguls, 1113.
Mourzougl, usurps the Greek empire, and destroys Isaac Angelus, and his son Alexius, 1071, 1071. Is driven from Constantinople by the Latins, 1071. His death, 1077.
Moua, the son of B. 1141, invested with the kingdom of Anatolia, by Tamerlane, 1177. His ruin, 1094.
Mozarabes, in the history of Spain, explained, 925.
Municipal cities, their advantages, 14.
Mutator, his literary character, 1217, note 98.
Mutah, battle of, between the emperor Constantius, and the usurper Magnentius, 257, 258.
Mu a, the Saracen, his conquest of Spain, 921. His disgrace, 922. His death, 923.
Mutaka, the youngest son of Rainsat, his story, 1136.
M . . . . . of the emperor . . . . . t by Sapor king of Persia, at the siege of Nisibis, 254.

Narbonne is besieged by Theodoric, and relieved by count Litorius, 59.
Nacogani, the Persian general, his defeat by the Romans, and his cruel fate, 185.
Naisas, battle of, between the emperor Claudius and the Goths, 169.
Naples is besieged and taken by Belisarius, 555. Extent of the duchy of, under the exarchs at Ravenna, 740.
Narses, his embassy from Sapor king of Persia to the emperor Constantius, 257.
Narses, the Eunuch, prevails over the pretensions of his brother Hormuz, and expels Tridates king of Armenia, 140. Overthrows Galerius, ibid. Is surprised and routed by Galerius, 141. Articles of peace between him and the Romans, 142.
Narses, the Persian general of the emperor Maurice, restores Chosroes II. king of Persia, 700, 701. His revolt against Phocas, and cruel death, 705.
Narses, the Eunuch, his military promotion, and dissection with Belisarius, 673. His character, and expedition to Italy, 706. Battle of Tenna, 707. Takes Rome, and reduces and kills Teias, the last king of the Goths, 705. Defeats the Franks at Acanthus, 709.

- Governs Italy in the capacity of exarch, 710. His disgrace, and death, 747.
- Navigation* of the Roman empire, state of, 50.
- Nambdrates*, a chief of the Heruli, enters into the Roman service, and is made consul, 101.
- Navy* of the Roman empire described, 7. Of the Greek empire, 959, 960.
- Nazarene* church at Jerusalem, account of, 170, 171.
- Nazarius*, the Pagan orator, his account of miraculous appearances in the sky in favour of Constantine the Great, 182.
- Nephrus*, praetorian prefect in Gaul, is maimed and superseded, by his indiscreet opposition to the troops of Julian, 529, 532.
- Negatives* of America, evidences of their intellectual inferiority to the rest of mankind, 587.
- Nectarius* is chosen archbishop of Constantinople, 427.
- Nemusus*, his account of the arrival of the Saxons in Britain, different from that of Gildas, Bede, and Witi-kind, 605, note 129.
- Nepos*, Julius, is made emperor of the West by Leo the Great, 365.
- Nepotian*, account of his revolt in Italy, 278.
- Nero* persecutes the Christians as the incendiaries of Rome, 149, 150.
- Nerva*, emperor, his character, and prudent adoption of Trajan, 93.
- Nestorius*, archbishop of Constantinople, his character, 783. His heresy concerning the incarnation, ibid. His dispute with Cyril of Alexandria, 784. Is condemned, and degraded from his episcopal dignity, by the council of Ephesus, 784, 785. Is exiled, 785. His death, 787. His opinions still retained in Persia, 796. Missions of his disciples in the East Indies, 797.
- News*, John, count of, disastrous fate of him and his party at the battle of Nicopolis, 1124, 1124.
- Nice*, first council of, 298. Second council of, 846. Becomes the capital residence of sultan Soliman, 1015. Siege of, by the first crusaders, 1041.
- Nicephorus I.*, emperor of Constantinople, 813. His wars with the Saracens, 929. His death, 974.
- Nicephorus II.*, Phocas, emperor of Constantinople, 821. His military enterprises, 947.
- Nicephorus III.*, Botaniates, emperor of Constantinople, 825. Was raised to the throne by sultan Soliman, 1014, 1015.
- Nicetas*, senator of Constantinople, his flight, on the capture of the city by the Latins, 1072. His brief history, ibid. note 87. His account of the statues destroyed at Constantinople, 1073, 1074.
- Nicholas*, patriarch of Constantinople, opposes the fourth marriage of the emperor Leo the philosopher, 819.
- Nicholas V.*, pope, his character, 1157. How interested in the fall of Constantinople, 1172.
- Nicomedia*, the court of Diocletian held there, and the city embellished by him, 143. The church of, demolished by Diocletian, 216. The palace fired, 215.
- Nicopolis*, battle of, between sultan Bajazet, and Sigismund king of Hungary, 1125.
- Niger*. See Pavennius Niger.
- Nika*, the sedition of, at Constantinople, 633, 634.
- Nisabch*, battle of, between the emperor Heraclius, and the Persians, 770.
- Nisibis*, the city of, desert ibid. and its obstinate defence against the Persians, 278, 298. Is yielded to Sapor by treaty, 265, 268.
- Nizam*, the Persian vizir, his illustrious character, and unhappy fate, 1011, 1014.
- Noah*, his ark very convenient for resolving the difficulties of Mosae antiquities, 52.
- Nobilservus*, a title invented by Constantine the Great to distinguish his nephew Hannibalianus, 247.
- Noricum* described, 19.
- Normans*, their settlement in the province of Normandy in France, 987. Their introduction to Italy, 988. They serve in Sicily, ibid. Their conquer Apulia, ibid. Their character, 989. Their treaty with the pope, 989, 990. Their final extinction, 1045.
- Novatians* are exempted by Constantine the Great, in a particular edict, from the general penalties of heresy, 292. Are cruelly persecuted by Macedonius bishop of Constantinople, 314.
- Novels* of Justinian, how formed, and their character, 736.
- Noureddin*, sultan, his exalted character, 1046.
- Nubia*, conversion of, to Christianity, 805.
- Numerian*, the son of Carus, succeeds his father in the empire, in conjunction with his brother Carinus, 129. His death, 132.
- Nunidia*, its extent at different areas of the Roman history, 10.
- Nushirvan*. See Chosroes I.
- O*
- Oasis*, in the deserts of Libya, described, 366, note 14. Three places under this name pointed out, 786, note 54.
- Obedience*, passive, theory and practice of the Christian doctrine of, 279, 280.
- Obelisks*, Egyptian, the purpose of their erection, 266.
- Obligations* to the church, origin of, 187.
- Obligations*, human, the sources of, 755. Laws of the Romans respecting, ibid.
- Od. nathos*, the Palmyrene, his successful opposition to Sapor King of Persia, 105. Is associated in the empire by Gallienus, 107. His death, 115. Character and fate of his queen Zenobia, 114—118.
- Odin*, the long reign of his family in Sweden, 65, note 42. His institutions and death, 71. Hypothesis respecting him, ibid.
- Odovacer*, the first barbarian king of Italy, 569. His character and reign, 571, 572. He drives all the Roman conquests beyond the Alps to Euric king of the Visigoths, 588. Is reduced and killed by Theodorice the Ostrogoth, 617.
- Ohad*, battle of, between Mahomet, and Abu Sophian prince of Mecca, 874.
- Olga*, princess of Russia, her baptism, 983.
- Oliva*, its introduction into the Western world, 20.
- Olybius* is raised to the Western empire by count Ricimer, 357. His death, 748.
- Olympic games* compared with the tournaments of the Greeks, 1157.
- Olympiodorus*, his account of the influence of the city of Rome, 479. His account of the marriage of Adolphus king of the Visigoths with the princess Placidia, 495.
- Olympian*, favourite of the emperor Honorius, alarms him with unfavourable suspicions of the designs of Stilicho, 487. Causes Stilicho to be put to death, 474. His disgrace, and ignominious death, 487.
- Omar*, caliph of the Saracens, 885, 886. His character, 862. His journey to Jerusalem, 905.
- Omurghah*, elevation of the house of, to the office of caliph of the Saracens, 884. Why not the objects of public favour, 923. Destruction of, 924.
- Oracles*, Heathen, are silenced by Constantine the Great, 315.
- Orchan*, emir of the Ottomans, his reign, 1119. Marries the daughter of the Greek emperor Cantacuzene, 1121.
- Ordination* of the clergy in the early ages of the church, an account of, 387.
- Orestes* is sent ambassador from Attila king of the Huns, to the emperor Theodosius the Younger, 333. His history and promotion under the Western emperors, 569. His son Augustulus, the last emperor of the West, ibid.
- Orestis*, praetor of Egypt, is insulted by a monkish mob in Alexandria, 782.
- Origen* declares the number of primitive martyrs to be very inconsiderable, 265. His interference with the empress Marianne, 310. His memory persecuted by the emperor Justinian and his clergy, 794.
- Orleans* besieged by Attila king of the Huns, and relieved by Julius and Theodorice, 342.
- Osus*, bishop of Cordova, his great influence with Constantine the Great, 283. Prevails on Constantine to ratify the Nicene creed, 301. His exile, 368.
- Oshroene*, the small kingdom of, reduced by the Romans, 78.
- Ossian*, his poems, whether to be connected with the invasion of Caledonia by the emperor Severus, 49. Is said to have disputed with a Christian missionary, 152, note 179.
- Ostia*, the port of, described, 489.
- Ostrogoths*, invasion and defeat of, 416.
- Othman*, caliph of the Saracens, 886.
- Othman*, the father of the Ottomans, his reign, 1119.
- Otto I.*, king of Germany, restores and appropriates the Western empire, 832. Claims by treaty the nomination of the pope of Rome, 833. Defeats the Turks, 978.
- Otto II.*, deposes pope John XII. and chastises his party at Rome, 834.
- Oth*, bishop of Frisingen, his character as an historian, 1197, note 55.
- Ottomans*, origin and history of, 1118. They obtain an establishment in Europe, 1111.
- Ovid* is banished to the banks of the Danube, 248.
- Oxyrinchus*, in Egypt, monkish piety of that city, 573.

- senate, 441. Two Pagan sacrifices prohibited, 445. The temples demolished, 445—445. The ruin of, deplored by the sophists, 446. Pagan ceremonies revived in Christian churches, 448, 449.
- Palaeologus*, Constantine, Greek emperor, his reign, 1167. Is killed in the storm of Constantinople by the Turks, 1179.
- Palaeologus*, John, emperor of Constantinople, 1104. Marries the daughter of John Cantacuzene, 1107. Takes up arms against Cantacuzene, and is reduced to flight, 1108. His restoration, ibid. Discord between him and his sons, 1124. His treaty with pope Innocent VI., 1142. His visit to pope Urban V. at Rome, 1143.
- Palaeologus*, John II., Greek emperor, his zeal, 1149. His voyage to Italy, 1158.
- Palaeologus*, Manuel, associated with his father John, in the Greek empire, 1154. Tribute exacted from him by sultan Bayazet, 1157. His treaty with Soliman and Mahomet, the sons of Bayazet VI., 1158. His visits to the courts of Europe, 1147. Private motives of his European negotiations explained, 1146. His death, 1160.
- Palaeologus*, Michael, emperor of Nice, his brief replies to the negotiations of Basil II. emperor of Constantinople, 1084. His family and character, 1091. His elevation to the throne, 1092. His return to Constantinople, 1093. Blinds and banishes his young associate, John Lascaris, 1094. He is excommunicated by the patriarch Arsenius, ibid. Associates his son Andronicus in the empire, 1095. His union with the Latin church, ibid. Instigates the revolt of Sicily, 1098.
- Palatines* and Borderers, origin and nature of these distinctions in the Roman troops, 224.
- Palermo* taken by Belisarius by stratagem, 667.
- Palmyra*, a character of, 10. Conquered by Chosroes II. king of Persia, 768.
- Palladium* of Rome, described, 440, note 4.
- Palladius*, the notary, sent by Valentinian to Africa to enquire into the government of court Romanus, convives with him in expressing the province, 385.
- Palmyra*, description of, and its destruction by the emperor Aurelian, 116, 117.
- Panætius* was the first teacher of the Stoic philosophy at Rome, 722, note 36.
- Pandects* of Justinian, how formed, 724. Remarks on them, 725.
- Panhypocrestes*, import of that title in the Greek empire, 953.
- Pannonia* described, 9. Character of the Pannonians, 42.
- Panthcon* at Rome, by whom erected, 17, note 61. Is converted into a Christian church, 443.
- Pantomimus*, Roman, described, 443.
- Paper*, where and when the manufacture of, was first first found out, 897.
- Papinian*, the celebrated lawyer, chief praetorian practitioner, by the emperor Severus, 47. His death, 51.
- Papirus*, a Latin, reasons for concluding that he could not be the author of the his Iupiterna ann, 717, note 8.
- Papists*, projection their object here to that of the Protestants in England, at the beginning of the last century, 279, note 24.
- Para*, king of Armenia, his history, 381. Is treacherously killed by the Romans, 728, 399.
- Parabolan* of Alexandria, account of, 782, note 44.
- Paradise*, Mahomet's, described, 853.
- Parental* authority, limitation of, by the Roman law, 728. Rights of parents and children, ibid.
- Paris*, description of that city, under the government of Julian, 277, 278. Situation of his palace, 718, note 7.
- Parthia* subdued by Artaxerxes king of Persia, 71. Its constitution of government similar to the feudal system of Europe, ibid. Recapitulation of the war with Rome, 78.
- Paschal* II., pope, his troublesome pontificate, 1188.
- Pastor* of manners, much better adapted to the fierceness of war, than to peaceful innocence, 394.
- Paternal* authority, extent of, by the Roman laws, 728. Successive limitations of, 728, 729.
- Pabaz*, extraordinary deliverance, from the Slavonians and Saracens, 951.
- Patricians*, the order of, under the Roman republic, and under the emperors, compared, 430. Under the Greek empire, their rank explained, 843.
- Patriek*, the titular saint of Ireland, derivation of his name, 570, note 126.
- Pavia*, massacre of the friends of Stilicho there, by the instigations of Olympius, 474. Is taken by Alboin king of the Lombards, who fixes his residence there, 710.
- Paul* of Samosata, bishop of Antioch, his character and history, 211, 212.
- Paul*, archbishop of Constantinople, his fatal contest with his competitor Macedonius, 312.
- Paula*, a Roman widow, her illustrious descent, 478. Was owner of the city of Nicopolis, 479. Her monastic zeal, 575.
- Paulicians*, origin and character of, 966, 967. Their principles, 967, 968. Are persecuted by the Greek emperors, 968. They revolt, 969. They are reduced, and transplanted to Thrace, 970. Their present state, ibid.
- Paulina*, wife of the tyrant Maximin, softens his ferocity by gentle counsels, 161, note 19.
- Paulinus*, master of the offices to Theodosius the Younger, his crime, and execution, 519.
- Paulinus*, bishop of Nola, his history, 493.
- Paulinus*, patriarch of Aquileia, dies from the Lombards with his treasure, into the island of Grado, 746.
- Pegasiani*, the party of, among the Roman civilians, explained, 723.
- Pekin*, the city of, taken by Zingis the Mogul emperor, 1113.
- Pelagian* controversy agitated by the Latin clergy, 470. And in Britain, 503.
- Pella*, the church of the Nazarenes settled there, on the destruction of Jerusalem, 171.
- Peloponnesus*, state of, under the Greek empire, 951, 952.
- Penal* laws of Rome, the abolition and revival of, 728.
- Penance*, public, of the ancient church, 187. Imposed on the emperor Theodosius, 434, 435.
- Pentingsa*, his office and power in Britain, 503.
- Pentecostals* of the Greek and Latin churches, history of, 1021.
- Pepin*, king of France, assists the pope of Rome against the Lombards, 849. Receives the title of king by papal sanction, 843. Grants the exarchate to the pope, 844.
- Pepin*, John, count of Minorbino, reduces the tribune Riccio, and restores aristocracy and church government at Rome, 108.
- Pepper*, its high estimation and price at Rome, 486, note 70.
- Perennis*, minister of the emperor Commodus, his great exaltation, and downfall, 34.
- Perisabor*, a city of Assyria, reduced and burned by the emperor Julian, 374.
- Perizes*, king of Persia, his fatal expedition against the Nephthalites, 617.
- Persecutions*, ten, of the primitive Christians, a review of, 269.
- Perscus*, amount of the treasures taken from that prince, 60.
- Persia*, the monarchy of, restored by Artaxerxes, 75. The religion of the Magi reformed, ibid. Abridgment of the Persian theology, ibid. Simplicity of their worship, 79. Ceremonies a divine mystery, ibid. Extent and population of the country, 75, 78. Every other mode of worship prohibited but that of Zoroaster, 79. Its military power, 80. Account of the audience given by the emperor Crispus to the ambassadors of Varanes, 129. The throne of, disputed by the brothers Narses and Hormuz, 140. Caligula's declaration to the Persians, ibid. Narses overthrown in his battle by Caligula, 145. Articles of peace agreed on between the Persians and the Romans, 142. War between a son king and, and the emperor Constantine, 253. Battle of Sargina, ibid. Sapor invades Mesopotamia, 268. The Persian territories invaded by the emperor Julian, 348, 351, 352. Passage of the Euphrates, 357. Julian banished in his retreat, 360. Treaty of peace between Sapor and the emperor Julian, 363, 364. Reconquest of Armenia, and death of Sapor, 377, 388. The silk trade, how carried on from China through Persia, for the supply of the Roman empire, 636. Death of Perizes, in an expedition against the White Huns, 616. Review of the reigns of Cabades and his son Chosroes, 687, 688. Anarchy of, after the death of Chosroes II., 776. Exhausted history of, 727. Invasion of, by the caliph Abulcas, 894. Battle of Cadesia, 894. Sack of Ctesiphon, 894. Conquest of, by the Saracens, 895. The Magian religion supplanted by Mahometism, 124. The power of the Arabs crushed by the dynasty of the Ebnacids, 946. Persia subdued by the Turks, 1108. Conquest of, by the Moguls, 1115, 1114. By Timur-Lane, 1197.
- Persons*, rights of, according to the Roman law, 777.
- Pertinax*, his character, and exaltation to the imperial throne, 37. Virtues, 38. Administration, ibid. And populists, 39. He is murdered by the praetorian guards, ibid. His funeral and apotheosis, 44.
- Pescennius Niger*, governor of Syria, assumes the imperial dignity on the death of Pertinax, 42. His death, 46.
- Petavius*, character of his Dogmata Theologica, 777, note 1.
- Peter*, brother of the Eastern emperor Maurice, his injurious treatment of the citizens of Azimantium, and flight from thence, 763.
- Peter*, czar of Russia, his conduct towards his son, contrasted with that of Constantine the Great, 116.
- Peter* of Arragon, assumes the kingdom of Sicily, 1198.
- Peter*, Bartholomew, his miraculous discovery of the Holy Lance, 1633. His strange death, 1634.
- Petru* of Carthage, emperor of Constantinople, 1680. His captivity and death, 1681.

- Peter* the Hermit, his character, and scheme to recover the Holy Land from the Infidels, 1018. Leads the first crusaders, 1023. Failure of his zeal, 1033.
- Petra*, the city of, taken by the Persians, 694. Is besieged by the Romans, ibid. Is demolished, ibid.
- Petrarch*, his studies and literary character, 1153, 1154. And history, 1201, 1202. His remark on the ruin of the ancient buildings of Rome, 1223.
- Pfeffel*, character of his history of Germany, 857, note 149.
- Phalanx*, Grecian, compared with the Roman legion, 5, 6.
- Pharamond*, the actions, and foundation of the French monarchy by him, of doubtful authority, 501.
- Pharos* commands the Heruli in the African war, under Belsharius, 653. Pursues Gelimer, 659. His letter to Gelimer, 660.
- Pharisees*, account of that sect among the Jews, 175.
- Phasis*, river, its course described, 611.
- Phœasant*, derivation of the name of that bird, 601.
- Philiphus*, Francis, his character of the Greek language of Constantinople, 1152.
- Philip* 1. of France, his limited dignity and power, 1019, 1020.
- Philip* Augustus, of France, engages in the third crusade, 1051.
- Philip*, prætorian præfect under the third Gordian, raised to the empire on his death, 73. His death, 90. Was a favourite of the Christians, 210.
- Philip*, prætorian præfect of Constantinople, conveys the bishop Paul into banishment clandestinely, 512.
- Philippicus*, emperor of Constantinople, 810.
- Philippopolis* taken and sacked by the Goths, 32.
- Philo*, a character of his works, 294.
- Philosophers*, Grecian, review of the various sects of, 12.
- Phincus*, the situation of his palace, 222.
- Phœcea* is settled by Genoese, who trade in alum, 1127.
- Phœcia*, a centurion, is chosen emperor by the disaffected troops of the Eastern empire, 763. Murders the emperor Maurice, and his children, 765, 766. His character, 765. His fall, and death, 767.
- Phœnicia* described, 10.
- Photus*, the son of Antonina, is exiled, 678. Betrays his mother's vices to Belsharius, ibid. Turns monk, ibid.
- Photius*, the patrician, kills himself to escape the persecution of Justinian, 792.
- Photius*, patriarch of Constantinople, character of his Library, 964. His quarrel with the pope of Rome, 1030.
- Phranza*, George, the Greek historian, some account of, 88, note. His emissaries, 1167. His tale on the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, 1180.
- Picardy*, derivation of the name of that province, 1018, note 1.
- Pilate*, Pontius, his testimony in favour of Jesus Christ, much improved by the primitive fathers, 240.
- Pilgrimages* to Jerusalem, 1016. Increase of, 1017.
- Pilpay's* Fables, history and character of, 688.
- Pinna* marina, a kind of silk manufactured from the threads spun by this fish, by the Romans, 636.
- Pipa*, a princess of the Marcomanni, espoused by the emperor Gallienus, 29.
- Ppo*, Calphurnius, one of the competitors against Gallienus, his illustrious family and character, 104, 105.
- Plytus*, the city of, destroyed by the Goths, 90.
- Placidia*, daughter of Theodosius the Great, her history, and marriage with Aëtoliuphus king of the Goths, 435. Is injuriously treated by the usurper Sanguis, after the death of her husband, 50. Her marriage with Constantius, and retreat to Constantinople, 518. Her administration in the West, as guardian of her son the emperor Valentinian III., 519. History of her daughter Honoria, 541, 542. Her death and burial, 549, note 72.
- Plague*, origin and nature of this disease, 715. Great extent and long duration of that in the reign of Justinian, 715, 716.
- Plato*, his theological system, 293. Is received by the Alexandrian Jews, 294. And expounded by St John the Evangelist, ibid. The theological system of the emperor Julian, 532.
- Platonic* philosophy introduced into Italy, 1176.
- Platonists*, new, an account of, 149. Unite with the heathen priests to oppose the Christians, 213.
- Plantianus*, prætorian præfect under the emperor Severus, his history, 66.
- Plebeians* of Rome, state and character of, 482.
- Pliny* the Younger, examination of his conduct toward the Christians, 205.
- Poet* laureat, a ridiculous appointment, 1201, note 8.
- Pogustus*, his reflections on the ruin of ancient Rome, 1218.
- Potters*, battle of, between Clovis king of the Franks, and Alaric king of the Goths, 505.
- Pollentia*, battle of, between Stilicho the Roman general, and Alaric the Goth, 464.
- Polytheism* of the Romans, its origin and effects, 11. How accounted for by the primitive Christians, 173. Scepticism of the people at the time of the publication of Christianity, 188. The Christians, why more adious to the Pagans than the Jews, 107—107. The ruin of, suspended by the divisions among Christians, 316. Theological system of the emperor Julian, 333. Review of the Pagan ecclesiastical establishment, 429, 440. Revival of, by the Christian monks, 448.
- Pompeianus*, præfect of Rome, proposes to drive Alaric from the walls by snells, 483, 485.
- Pompeianus flavencus*, general under Maxentius, defeated and killed by Constantine the Great, 133.
- Pompey*, his discretionary exercise of power during his command in the East, 24. Increase of the tributes of Asia by his conquests, 61.
- Pontifex*, Pagan, their jurisdiction, 410.
- Pontifex Maximus*, in Pagan Rome, by whom that office was exercised, 286.
- Popes*, of Rome, the growth of their power, 857, 858. Revolt of, from the Greek emperors, 830. Origin of their temporal dominion, 844, 845. Publication of the Decretals, and of the fictitious donation of Constantine the Great, 844. Their final separation from the Eastern empire, 846, 847. Authority of the German emperors in their election, 953. Violent distractions in their election, ibid. Foundation of their authority at Rome, 1187. Their mode of election settled, 1195. Schism in the papacy, 1212. They acquire the absolute dominion of Rome, 1216. Their ecclesiastical government, 1217.
- Population* of the Roman empire, 16. Of Germany, 83, 84. Of Constantinople, 226. Of Rome, a computation of, 484. Of the Greek empire, 951.
- Porcario*, Stephen, his conspiracy at Rome, 1215.
- Posthumus*, the Roman general under the emperor Gallienus, defends Gaul against the incursions of the Franks, 97.
- Posts*, in the Roman empire, notice of, 20.
- Pover*, absolute, the exercise of, how checked, 959.
- Præfect* of the sacred bedchamber, under Constantine the Great, his office, 256.
- Præfects* of Rome and Constantinople, under the emperors, the nature of their offices, 251. The office received at Rome, 1191.
- Prælatatus*, præfect of Rome under Valentinian, his character, 517.
- Prætorian* bands in the Roman army, an account of, 40. Their conspiracy against the emperor Pertinax, 39. They sell the empire of Rome by public auction, 40. Are disgraced by the emperor Severus, 44. A new establishment of them, 47. Authority of the prætorian præfect, ibid. Are reduced, their privileges abolished, and their place supplied, by the Jovians and Herculeans, 144. Their desperate courage under Maxentius, 160. Are totally suppressed by Constantine the Great, 161.
- Prætorian* præfect, revolutions of this office under the emperor, 240. Their functions when it became a civil office, 251.
- Prætors* of Rome, the nature and tendency of their edicts explained, 719.
- Preaching*, a term of devotion unknown in the temples of Paganism, 290. Use and abuse of, 290, 291.
- Predestination*, influence of the doctrine of, on the Saracens and Turks, 877.
- Prerogatives*, Imperial, described, 25.
- Presbyter*s, among the primitive Christians, the office explained, 183.
- Prestor John*, origin of the romantic stories concerning, 797.
- Priestley*, Dr, the ultimate tendency of his opinions pointed out, 373, note 42.
- Prætor*s, no ancient order of men among the ancient Pagans, 188—186.
- Privileges*, the prerogative of, unknown to the Roman law, 753.
- Prince* of the waters, in Persia, his office, 687, note 44.
- Priscillian*, bishop of Avila in Spain, is, with his followers, put to death for heresy, 425, 426.
- Priscus*, the historian, his conversation with a captive Greek, in the camp of Attila, 531. His character, 553, note 41.
- Priscus*, the Greek general, his successes against the Avans, 704.
- Proba*, widow of the præfect Petronius, her flight from the sack of Rome by Alaric, 492.
- Probus* assumes the Imperial dignity in opposition to Florianus, 123. His character, ibid. Respectful conduct towards the senate, 124. Victories over the barbarians, ibid. He delivers Gaul from the invasion of the Germans, 124, 125. Carries his arms into Germany, 125. He builds a wall from the Rhine to the Danube, ibid. His triumph, 127. Discipline, ibid. Death, ibid.
- Probus*, prætorian præfect of Illyricum, preserves Sirmium from the Quadi, 391.
- Probus*, Scimrius, his embassy from the emperor Diocletian, to Narses king of Persia, 142.
- Procession* of the Holy Ghost, controversy concerning, 1038.
- Proceda*, John of, instigates the revolt of Sicily from John of Anjou, 1068.
- Proetus*, story of his extraordinary brazen mirror, 611.

Proclus, the Platonic philosopher of Athens, his superstition, 649, 650.
Proconesus of Asia, Achaia, and Africa, their office, 232.
Procopia, wife of the Greek emperor Michael I, her martial inclinations, 814.
Procopius, his history, and revolt against Valens, emperor of the East, 571. Is reduced, and put to death, 571.
Procopius, the historian, his account of the testament of the emperor Arcadius, 513. His account of Britain, 609, 610. Character of his histories, 628. Accepts the office of secretary under Belisarius, 653. His defence of the Roman archers, 653, 654. His account of the desolation of the African province by war, 689.
Proculians, origin of the sect of, in the Roman civil law, 725.
Proculus, his extraordinary character, and his rebellion against Probus in Gaul, 127.
Prodigies in ancient history, a philosophical resolution of, 281, 282.
Promises, under what circumstances the Roman law enforced the fulfilment of, 755.
Promodus, master-general of the infantry under Theodosius, ruined by the enmity of Rufinus, 450.
Propeity, personal, the origin of, 732. How ascertained by the Roman laws, 732, 733. Testamentary dispositions of, how introduced, 734.
Prophecy, neglected by the Pagan philosophers, 193, 194.
Propontis described, 223.
Proterus, patriarch of Alexandria, his martial episcopacy, and violent death, 789.
Protestants, their resistance of oppression, not consistent with the practice of the primitive Christians, 278, 279. Proportion of their number to that of the Catholics, in France, note 25.
Proteus, note 95.
Proverbs, the book of, why not likely to be the production of King Solomon, 661, note 33.
Provinces of the Roman empire described, 8—11. 14. Distinction between Latin and Greek provinces, 14, 15. Divided between the emperor and the senate, 24, 25. Account of the tributes received from, 61. Their number and government after the seat of empire was removed to Constantinople, 232.
Prusa, conquest of, by the Ottomans, 1119.
Prussians, emigration of the Goths to, 92.
Pulcheria, sister of the emperor Theodosius the Younger, her character and administration, 515. Her lessons to her brother, ibid. Her contests with the empress Eudocia, 516. Is proclaimed empress of the East, on the death of Theodosius, 537. Her death and canonisation, 561, and note 66.
Punishments inflicted by the Roman laws, 737.
Purple, the royal colour of, among the ancients, far surpassed by the modern discovery of cochineal, 635, note 59.
Pygmies of Africa, ancient fabulous account of, 587, and note 120.

Q

Quadi, the inroads of, punished by the emperor Constantius, 266. Revenge the treacherous murder of their king Gabinius, 391.
Questor, historical review of this office, 237.
Question, criminal, how exercised under the Roman emperors, 223.
Quintilian brothers, Maximus and Condianus, their history, 33, 34.
Quintilius, brother of the emperor Claudius, his ineffectual effort to succeed him, 110.
Quintus Curtius, an attempt to decide the age in which he wrote, 72, note 46.
Quirites, the effect of that word when opposed to soldiers, 55, note 77.

R

Radagaisus, king of the Goths, his formidable invasion of Italy, 407. His savage character, 403. Is reduced by Stilicho, and put to death, 403, 409.
Radiger, king of the Yarni, compelled to fulfil his matrimonial obligations by a British heroine, 610.
Ramadan, the month of, how observed by the Turks, 572.
Rando, a chieftain of the Alemanni, his unprovoked attack of Moguntiacum, 380.
Ravenna, extent of the exarchate of, 750. The ancient city of, described, 466. The emperor Honorius fixes his residence there, ibid. Besieged by Belisarius, and taken from the Goths, 675, 676. Invasion of, by a Greek fleet, 840. Is taken by the Lombards, and recovered by the Venetians, 841. Final conquest of, by the Lombards, ibid. The exarchate of, bestowed by Pemm on the pope, 844.

Raymond of Thoulouse, the crusader, his character, 1026. His route to Constantinople, 1028. His bold behaviour there, 1029.
Raymond, count of Tripoli, betrays Jerusalem into the hands of Saladin, 1099.
Royal, Abbé, mistaken in asserting that Constantine the Great suppressed Pagan worship, 14, 316.
Rebels, who the most inveterate of, 969.
Reccared, the first Catholic king of Spain, converts his Gothic subjects, 586.
Reformation from popery, the amount of, estimated, 971. A secret reformation still working in the reformed churches, ibid.
Reginald of Chatillon, treachery and punishment of, 1049, 1050.
Rein-deer, this animal driven northward by the improvement of climate from cultivation, 81.
Relics, the worship of, introduced by the monks, 447, 448. A valuable cargo of, imported from Constantinople by Louis IX. of France, 1183.
Rhemus, bishop of Rheims, converts Clovis, king of the Franks, 591.
Repentance, its high esteem, and extensive operation, note 180.
Reverend, the doctrine of, 877.
Rector, the secutor, in the Roman amphitheatre, 56.
Reveries of the primitive church, how distributed, 186, 289. Of the Roman empire, when removed to Constantinople, a review of, 232—241. Of the emperor Justinian, 638. Of the Greek empire, 953.
Rhatum, city of, its situation, 223.
Rhatum described, 9.
Rhazates, the Persian general, defeated and killed by the emperor Heraclius, 775.
Rhetoric, the study of, congenial to a popular state, 648.
Rhine, the banks of, fortified by the emperor Valentinian, 380.
Rhodes, account of the colossus of, 908. The knights of, 1120.
Richard I. of England, engages in the third crusade, 1052. Bestows the island of Cyprus on the house of Lusignan, 1061. His reply to the exhortations of Fulk of Neuilly, 1062.
Richard, monk of Cirencester, his literary character, 502, note 181.
Reimer, count, his history, 575, 556. Permits Majorian to assume the Imperial dignity in the Western empire, 556. Enjoys supreme power under cover of the name of the emperor Libius Severus, 560. Marries the daughter of the emperor Anthemius, 562. Sacks Rome, and kills Anthemius, 568. His death, ibid.
Rienzi, Nicholas di, his birth, character, and history, 1202—1210.
Rimini, council of, 370.
Roads, Roman, the construction and great extent of, 19, 20.
Robert of Courtenay, emperor of Constantinople, 1061.
Robert, count of Flanders, his character, and engagement in the first crusade, 1025.
R . . . . . his character, and engagement . . . . . Recalled by the censures

Roderic, the Gothic king of Spain, his defeat and death by Tarik the Arab, 919, 920.
Rodugune, probable origin of her character, in Rowe's Royal Convert, 610, note 163.
Roger, count of Sicily, his exploits, and conquest of that island, 993, 994.
Roger, son of the former, the first king of Sicily, 999, 1000. His military achievements in Africa and Greece, 1000, 1001.
Roger de Flor, engages as an auxiliary in the service of the Greek emperor Andronicus, 1099. His assassination, 1104.
Romanus I., Lecepenus, emperor of Constantinople, 819.
Romanus II., emperor of Constantinople, 830.
Romanus III., Argyrus, emperor of Constantinople, 822.
Romanus IV., Diogenes, emperor of Constantinople, 824. Is defeated and taken prisoner by the Turkish sultan Alp Arslan, 1011. His treatment, deliverance, and death, 1011, 1012.
Romanus, count, governor of Africa, his corrupt administration, 384, 385.
Romanus, governor of Bosra, betrays it to the Saracens, 808.
Rome, the three periods of its decline pointed out, Preface. Its prosperous circumstances in the second century, 1. The principal conquests of, achieved under the republic, ibid. Conquests under the emperors, 2. . . . . val force . . . . . empire, . . . . . internal prosperity of the empire, in the age of the Antonines, accounted for, ibid. Treatment of the provinces, 11. Benefits included in the freedom of the city, ibid. Distinction between the Latin and Greek provinces, ibid. Prevalence of the Greek, as a scientific language, 15.

Numbers and condition of the Roman slaves, 15. Populousness of the empire, 16. Unity and power of the government, 17. Monuments of Roman architecture, ibid. The Roman magnificence chiefly displayed in public buildings, ibid. Principal cities in the empire, 19. Public roads, ibid. Great improvements of agriculture in the western countries of the empire, 20. Arts of luxury, 21. Commerce with the East, ibid. Contemporary representation of the prosperity of the empire, 22. Decline of courage and genius, ibid. Review of public affairs after the battle of Actium, 23. The Imperial power and dignity confirmed to Augustus by the senate, ibid. The various characters and powers vested in the emperor, 25. General idea of the Imperial system, 26. Abortive attempt of the senate to resume its rights after the murder of Caligula, 27, 28. The emperors associate their intended successors to power, 28. The most happy period in the Roman history pointed out, 30. Their peculiar misery under their tyrants, ibid. The empire publicly sold by auction by the praetorian guards, 40. Civil wars of the Romans, how generally decided, 43. When the empire first received regular pay, 60. How the citizens were relieved from taxation, ibid. General estimate of the Roman revenue from the provinces, 61. Miseries flowing from the success of the empire, 64. A summary review of the empire, 64. Recapitulation of the empire, 64. The office of censor revived by the emperor Decius, 94. Peace purchased of the Goths, 95. The emperor Valerian taken prisoner by Sapor, king of Persia, 102. The popular conceit of the thirty tyrants of Rome investigated, 104, 105. Famine and pestilence throughout the empire, 106. The city fortified against the inroads of the Alemanni, 113. Remarks on the alleged sedition of the officers of the mint under Aurelian, 119. Observations on the peaceful interregnum after the death of Aurelian, 120. Colonies of barbarians introduced into the provinces by Probus, 126. Exhibition of the public games by Carinus, 130. Treaty of peace between the Persians and the Romans, 142. The last triumph celebrated at Rome, 143. How the Imperial courts come to be transferred to Milan and Nicomedia, ibid. The praetorian bands superseded by the Jovian and Herulean guards, 144. The power of the senate annihilated, ibid. Four divisions of the empire under four conjoint princes, 145. Their expensive establishments call for more burdensome taxes, 146. Diocletian and Maximian abdicate the empire, ibid. Six emperors existing at one time, 155. The senate and people apply to Constantine to deliver them from the tyranny of Maxentius, 157. Constantine enters the city victorious, 160, 161. Laws of Constantine, 164. Constantine remains sole emperor, 167. History of the progress and establishment of Christianity, 168. Pretensions of the bishop of Rome, whence deduced, 183. State of the church at Rome at the time of the persecution by Nero, 197, 200. Narrative of the fire of Rome, in the reign of Nero, ibid. The Christians persecuted as the incendiaries, 200. The memorable edicts of Diocletian and his associates against the Christians, 214. Account of the building and establishment of the rival city of Constantinople, 222—227. New forms of administration established there, 228. Division of the empire among the sons of Constantine, 247. Establishment of Christianity as a national religion, 286. Tumults excited by the rival bishops, Liberius and Felix, 311. Paganism restored by Julian, 335, 336. And Christianity by Jovian, 375, 385. The empire divided into the East and West, by the emperor Valentinian, 374. Civil institutions of Valentinian, 375. The crafty violence of the clergy restrained by Valentinian, 377. Bloody contest of Damasus and Ursinus for the bishopric of Rome, 378. Great earthquake, 383. The emperor Theodosius visits the city, 429, 431. Enquiry into the cause of the corruption of morals in his reign, 438. Review of the Pagan establishment, 439, 440. The Pagan religion renounced by the senate, 441. Sacrifices prohibited, 445. The Pagan religion prohibited, ibid. Triumph of Honorius and Stilicho over Alaric the Goth, 467. Alaric encamps under the walls of the city, 477. Retrospect of the state of the city when besieged by Hannibal, ibid. Wealth of the nobles, and magnificence of the city, 479. Character of the nobles of, by Ammianus Marcellinus, 480—482. State and character of the common people, 482. Public distributions of bread, &c., 483. Public baths, ibid. Games and spectacles, 484. Attempts to ascertain the population of the city, ibid. First siege of, by the Goths, under Alaric, 485. The citizens suffer by famine, ibid. Plague, ibid. The retreat of Alaric purchased by a ransom, 486. Is again besieged by Alaric, 488. The senate unites with him in electing Attalus emperor, 489. The city seized by Alaric, and plundered, 490. Comparison between this event and the sack of Rome by the emperor Charles V., 495. Alaric quits Rome and ravages Italy, 493. Laws passed for the relief of Rome, and Italy, 496. Triumph of Honorius for the reduction of Spain by Wallia, 501. Is preserved from the hands of Attila by a ransom, 548. Indications of the ruin of the empire, at the death of Valentinian III, ibid. Sack of the city by Genseric king of the Vandals, 570. The public buildings, protected from depredation by the laws of Majorian, 558. Is sacked again by the patrician Riemer, 568. Augustulus, the last emperor of the West, 569. The decay of the Roman spirit remarked, 571. History of monastic institutions in, 572, et seq. General observations on the fall of the Roman empire in the West, 609—614. Italy conquered by Theodoric the Ostrogoth, 616. Prosperity of the city under his government, 621. Account of the four factions in the circus, 631, 632. First introduction of silk among the Romans, 653, 658. The office of consul suppressed by Justinian, 650. The city receives Belisarius, 658. Siege of, by the Goths, ibid. Distressful siege of, by Totila, the Goth, 701. Is taken, 702. Is recovered by Belisarius, 703. Is again taken by Totila, 704, 705. Is taken by the eunuch Narses, 707. Extinction of the senate, 708. The city degraded to the second rank under the exarchs of Ravenna, 710. A review of the Roman laws, 716—742. Extent of the duchy of, under the exarchs of Ravenna, 730. Miserable state of the city, 753. Pontificate of Gregory the Great, 755. The government of the city new modelled under the popes, after their revolt from the Greek emperors, 840. Is attacked by the Lombards, and delivered by king Pepin, 841. The office and rank of exarchs and patricians explained, 843. Reception of Charlemagne by pope Adrian I, ibid. Origin of the temporal power of the popes, 844. Mode of electing a pope, 855. Is menaced by the Saracens, 941. Prosperous pontificate of Leo IV, 941, 942. Is besieged and taken by the emperor Henry III, 948. Great part of the city burnt by Robert Guiscard, in the cause of pope Gregory VII, 998. Compared with Constantinople, 1138. The history of, resumed, after the capture of Constantinople by the Turks, 1145. French and German emperors of, ibid. Authority of the popes, 1185. Restoration of the republic, 1190. Office of senator, 1192. Institutes, 1194, 1195. Institution in the city, by the tribune Irenzi, 1202—1210. Calamities flowing from the schism of the papacy, 1212. Statutes and government of the city, 1214. Porcario's conspiracy, 1215. The ecclesiastical government of, 1217. Reflections of Poggini on the ruin of the city, 1218. Four principal causes of its ruin specified, 1219. The colosseum of Titus, 1223. Restoration and ornaments of the city, 1225. Romilda, the betrayer of Friuli to the Avars, her cruel treatment by them, 770. Rosamund, daughter of Cunmund king of the Gepids, her marriage with Alboin king of the Lombards, 744. Conspires his murder, 746. Her flight and death, 747. Roms, the Seljukian kingdom of, torned, 1015. Rudolph, Otho, summary abridgment of the argument in his Atlantic, 82. Rufinus, the confidential minister of the emperor Theodosius the Great, stimulates his cruelty against Theodosian, 433. His character and administration, 450—452. His death, 454, 455. Rugilas, the Hun, his settlement in Hungary, 526. Runic characters, the antiquity of, traced, 85, note 16. Russia, origin of the monarchy of, 978, 979. Geography and trade of, 979, 980. Naval expeditions of the Russians against Constantinople, 980. Reign of the czar Swato-Laus, 982. The Russians converted to Christianity, 983. Is conquered by the Moguls, 1116. Rustan, a Persian nobleman, a saying of his, expressive of the danger of living under despots, 51. Rutidius, his character of the monks of Capraria, 457.

S

Sabellius the heresiarch, his doctrine of the Trinity, 297. His opinions afterward adopted by his antagonists, 298. The Sabellians unite with the Trinitheists at the council of Nice to overpower the Arians, 328. Sabians, their astronomical mythology, 806. Sabrian obtains the command of the Eastern provinces from Constantine, 270. Sabrian, general of the East, is defeated by Theodoric the Ostrogoth, king of Italy, 619. Sabrinians, origin of the sect of, in the Roman civil law, 723. Sadducees, account of that sect among the Jews, 176. Saladin, his birth, promotion, and character, 1048. Conquers the kingdom of Jerusalem, 1049, 1050. His ineffectual siege of Tyre, 1051. Siege of Acre, ibid. His negotiations with Richard I. of England, 1053. His death, ibid. Salerno, account of the medical school of, 992. Satic laws, history of, 526, 527.

- Sallust*, the præfect, and friend of the emperor Julian, declines the offer of the diadem on his death, 362. Declines it again on the death of Julian, 369. Is retained in his employment by the emperor Valentinian, 371.
- Sallust*, the historian, by what funds he raised his palace on the Quirinal hill, 491, note 105.
- Salona*, the retreat of the emperor Diocletian, described, 147, 148.
- Saluran*, his account of the distress and rebellion of the Bagaudæ, 551, note 78.
- Sarmatians*, the Saracen dynasty of, 946.
- Sarmatians*, persecution and extinction of, by the emperor Justinian, 792, 793.
- Samuel* the prophet, his ashes conveyed to Constantinople, 447.
- Sapor*, king of Persia, procures the assassination of Choeros, king of Armenia, and seizes the country, 102. Defeats the emperor Valerian, and takes him prisoner, ibid. Sets up Cyprius as successor to Valerian in the Roman empire, ibid. Over-runs Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, ibid. Boldness and success of Odenathus against him, 103. His death, 116.
- Sapor*, the son of Hormizd, is crowned king of Persia before his birth, 252. His character and early heroism, ibid. Harasses the Eastern provinces of the Roman empire, 253. Battle of Singara against the emperor Constantius, ibid. His son brutally killed by Constantius, ibid. His several attempts on Nisibis, 255, 274. Concludes a truce with Constantius, 254. His haughty propositions to Constantius, 267. Invades Mesopotamia, 268. Reduces Amida, 269. Returns home, ibid. His peaceful overtures to the emperor Julian, 338. His contentment at the successes of Julian, 338. Harasses the retreat of the Romans, 360. His treaty with the emperor Julian, 365, 366. His reconquest of Armenia, and death, 387, 388.
- Saraceni*, various definitions of that appellation, 562, note 30.
- Saucesus*, empire of the caliphs of, 926. Their rapid conquests, 893. Conquest of Persia, 895. Siege of Damascus, 898—901. Battle of Yermuk, and conquest of Syria, 904. Of Egypt, 909. Invasions of Africa, 944—948. Their military character, 961.
- Sarbar*, the Persian general, joins the Avars in besieging Constantinople, 774. Revolts to the emperor Heraclius, ibid.
- Sardina*, expulsion of the Vandals from, by Marcellinus, 564. Is conquered by Zano, the brother of Gelimur, king of the Vandals, 657. Is surrendered to Belisarius, 658, 659.
- Sarmatians*, how distinguished from the Germans, 92, 93. Memorable defeat of, by the emperor Carus, 128. Their manners described, 248. Brief history of, 248, 249. They apply to Constantine the Great for assistance against the Goths, 284. Are expelled their country by the Lomgards, 290. Are restored by Constantius, 297.
- Savage manners*, a brief view of, 85.
- Savi*, the Goths, plunders the camp of Stilicho, and drives him into the hands of the emperor at Rheina, 474. Insults Alaric, and occasions the sacking of Rome, 490. Is killed by Adolphus king of the Visigoths, 198, 490.
- Saturinnus*, one of the competitors for empire against Gallienus, his observation on his investiture, 117.
- Saturinnus*, lieutenant under the emperor Probus in the East, is driven into rebellion by his troops, 17.
- Saxons*, ancient, an account of, 381. Their practical confederations, 382. Their invasions of Gaul checked by the Romans, ibid. How converted to Christianity, 580. Descent of the Saxons on Britain, 605. Establishment of the Heptarchy, ibid. Their brutal desolation of the country, 608.
- Scanderberg*, prince of Albania, his history, 1165, 1166.
- Scavian* law of the Romans, account of, 739.
- Scaurus*, the patrician family of, how reduced under the emperors, 230, note 95.
- Schism* in religion, the origin of, traced, 172.
- Science* reducible to four classes, 197.
- Scythians*, their national character, 681. Their barbarous inroads on the Eastern empire, 682. Of Dalmatia, account of, 973, 974.
- Scots* and Picts, the nations of, how distinguished, 383. Invasions of Britain by, 384.
- Scythians*, this name vaguely applied to mixed tribes of barbarians, 101. Their pastoral manners, 394. Extent and boundaries of Scythia, 397, 398. Revolutions of, 467. Their mode of war, 549.
- Sebastian*, master-general of the infantry under the emperor Valens, his successful expedition against the Goths, 409. Is killed in the battle of Hadrianople, 410.
- Sebastian*, the brother of the usurper Jovinus, is associated with him in his assumed Imperial dignities, 498, 499.
- Sebastocrator*, import of that title in the Greek empire, 955.
- Secular Games*, celebration of, 75.
- Seez*, in Normandy, the bishop and chapter of, all castrated, 1187, note 11.
- Segestan*, the princes of, support their independency obstinately against Artaxerxes, 77, note 34.
- Segna*, emperor of Abyssinia, is with his whole court converted by the Jesuits, 804.
- Selden*, his sententious character of transubstantiation, 855, note 1.
- Seleucia*, the great city of, ruined by the Romans, 78.
- Seleucus Nicator*, number of cities founded by him, 77, note 31.
- Seljuk*, Turkish dynasty of the house of, 1005. Division of their empire, 1068.
- Serjeant*, legal and military import of that term, 1067, note 1.
- Senate* of Rome is reformed by Augustus, 23. Its legislative and judicial power, 26. Abortive attempt of, to resume its rights after the murder of Caligula, 27, 28. Its legal jurisdiction over the emperors, 38. Is subjected to military despotism, by Severus, 47. Women excluded from this assembly by a solemn law, 57. The form of a secret meeting, 67. Measures taken to support the authority of the two Gordians, ibid. The senate elect Maximus and Balbinus emperors on the deaths of the Gordians, 68. They drive the Alemanni out of Italy, 95. The senators forbid to exercise military employments by Gallienus, ibid. Elect Tacitus, the father of the senate, emperor, 121. Prerogatives gained to the senate by this election, 122. Their power and authority annihilated by Diocletian, 144. Amount of the coronary gold, or customary free gift of, to the emperors, 245. The claim of Julian to the empire admitted by the senate, 253. Petitions of, to the emperors, for the restoration of the altar of victory, 441. The Pagan religion renounced, 441. Debates of, on the proposals of Alaric the Goth, 475. Genealogy of the senators, 478. Passes a decree for putting to death Serena, the widow of Stilicho, 485. Under the influence of Alaric, elects Attalus emperor, 489. Trial of Arvandus, a prætorian præfect of Gaul, 508. Surrenders the sovereign power of Italy to the emperor of the East, 570. Extinction of that illustrious assembly, 708, 958. Restoration of, in the twelfth century, 1190. The assembly resolved into single magistrates, 1192.
- Septimius Severus* declared emperor by the Pannonian legions, 43. Marches into Italy, and to Rome, ibid. Is acknowledged emperor by the senate, 44. Disgraces the prætorian guards, ibid. Success against his competitors, ibid. His arts, 44, 45. Animosity against the senate, 46. Character of his reign, 46—48. His death, 50.
- Scraper*, his lamentation for the loss of a personified deity, 740.
- Scraps*, history of his worship, and of his temple at Alexandria, 115. The temple destroyed, 444.
- Serena*, niece of the emperor Theodosius, married to his general Stilicho, 412. Is cruelly strangled by order of the Roman senate, 487.
- Servius*, 87, encourages Odoacer to assume the dominion of Italy, 569. His body, how disposed of, 371, note 132.
- Severus* is declared Cesar on the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian, 120. His defeat and death, 153.
- Shields* and warriors, their respective modes of life compared, 394.
- Shites*, a sect of Mahometans, their distinction from the Sunnites, 886.
- Siberia*, extreme coldness of the climate, and miserable state of the natives of, 398. Is seized and occupied by the Tartars, 1118, 1117.
- Sicily*, reflections on the distractions in that island, 106. Is conquered by the Saracens, 490. Introduction of the silk manufacture there, 972. Exploits of the Normans there, 993. Is conquered by count Roger, 994. Roger, son of the former, made king of, 999. Reign of William the Bail, 1004. Reign of William the Good, 1004. Conquest of, by the emperor Henry VI, ibid. Subdued by Charles of Anjou, 1097. The Sicilian Vespers, 1098.
- Sidonius Apollinaris*, the poet, his humorous treatment of the capitatum tax, 241. His panegyric on the emperor Avitus, 555 and notes 12, 13. His character of Theodoric king of the Visigoths in Gaul, 554. His
- Su*, ibid. orders his son, by an army of Franks, ibid.
- Silentinus*, Paul, his account of the various species of stone and marble employed in the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, 642, note 127.
- Silk*, first manufactured in China, and then in the small Grecian island of Cos, 655. A peculiar kind of silk procured from the pinna marina, 656. The silkworm, how introduced to Greece, 657. Progress of the manufacture of, in the tenth century, 952.
- Simone*, prætor of the Paulians, becomes a proselyte to their opinions, 958.
- Simoon*, king of Bulgaria, his exploits, 974.
- Simoon Stylites*, the hermit, his extraordinary mode of life, 578, 579.

- Sonony*, an early instance of, 211, note 127.
- Simplicius*, one of the last surviving Pagan philosophers of Athens, his writings, and character, 620.
- Sapor*, battle of, between the emperor Constantius, and Sapor king of Persia, 253. The city of, reduced by Sapor, 261. Is yielded to him by Jovian, ibid.
- Singene*, brother of Sarus, is made king of the Goths, 500.
- Singundun* is perfidiously taken by Baian chagan of the Avars, 763.
- Sirmium* is perfidiously taken by Baian chagan of the Avars, 763.
- Siroes* deposes and murders his father Chosroes II. king of Persia, 768. His treaty of peace with the emperor Heraclius, ibid.
- Sisebut*, a Gothic king of Spain, persecutes the Jews there, 587.
- Sixtus V.*, pope, character of his administration, 1217.
- Slave*, strange perversion of the original sense of that word in condition described, 16. Numbers, ibid.
- Slavery*, personal, imposed on captives by the barbarous nations, 600.
- Sleepers*, seven, narrative of the legendary tale of, 525, 526.
- Smyrna*, capture of, by Tamerlane, 1132.
- Society*, philosophical reflections on the revolutions of, 613.
- Saffarides*, the Saracen dynasty of, 945.
- Soldiers*, Roman, their obligations and discipline, 4. When they first received regular pay, 60.
- Soliman*, sultan, conquers Asia Minor, 1014. Fixes his residence at Nice, 1015. Nice taken by the first crusaders, 1061. Battle of Dorylaeum, 1092.
- Soliman*, the son of Bajazet, his character, 1156. His alliance with the Greek emperor Manuel Palaeologus, 1123.
- Solomon*, king of the Jews, not the author of the book which bears the name of his Wisdom, 294, and note 21. Reasons for supposing he did not write either the book of Ecclesiastes or the Proverbs, 661, note 33.
- Solomon* the eunuch relieves the Roman province in Africa from the depredations of the Moors, 662. Revolt of his troops at Carthage, 698. Is defeated and killed by Antalus the Moor, 699.
- Solyman*, caliph of the Saracens, undertakes the siege of Constantinople, 929. His enormous appetite, and death, ibid.
- Sonites*, in the Mahometan religion, their tenets, 886.
- Sopator*, a Syrian philosopher, beheaded by Constantine the Great, on a charge of binding the wind by magic, 305, note 108.
- Sophia*, the widow of Justin II, her conspiracy against the emperor Tiberius, 748.
- Sophia*, St., foundation of the church of, at Constantinople, 611. Its description, 642. Is converted into a mosque, 1181.
- Sophian*, the Arab, commands the first siege of Constantinople, 927.
- Sophronia*, a Roman matron, kills herself to escape the violence of Maximus, 157, note 45.
- Sorley Sanctuaries*, a mode of Christian divination, adopted from the Pagans, 794, note 51.
- Soul*, uncertain opinions of the ancient philosophers as to the immortality of, 174. This doctrine more generally received among the barbarous nations, and for what reason, 175. Was not taught by Moses, ibid. Four different prevailing doctrines as to the origin of, 778, note 8.
- Spectra* destroyed by the Greek emperor Theophilus, 942.
- Syria*, the province of, described, 8. Cities in, 19. Great revenues raised from this province by the Romans, 61. Is ravaged by the Franks, 97. Review of the history of, 490. Is invaded by the barbarous nations, 490, 500. The invaders conquered by Wallia king of the Goths, 500. Successes of the Vandals there, 530. Expedition of Theodoric king of the Vandals into, 557. Conquests of the Visigoths, 655. The Christian religion received there, 585. Revolt and martyrdom of Hermenegild, 586. Persecution of the Jews in, 87. Legislative assemblies of, 909, 908. Acquisitions of Justinian there, 663. State of, under the emperor Charlemagne, 849. First introduction of the Arabs into the country, 949. Defeat and death of Roderic the Gothic king of, 920. Conquest of, by Musa, 921. Its prosperity under the Saracens, 923. The Christian faith there, supplanted by that of Mahomet, 925. The throne of Cordova filled by Abdalrahman, 944.
- Spauride*, or Spaurille, what, 481.
- Stadium*, Olympic, the races of, compared with those in the Roman circus, 631.
- Stauracius*, emperor of Constantinople, 812.
- Stephen*, a freedman of Domitilla, assassinate the emperor Domitian, 902.
- Stephen*, count of Chartres, his character, and engagement in the first crusade, 1025, 1026. Deserts his standard, 1035.
- Stephen*, St., the first Christian martyr, miraculous discovery of his body, and the miracles worked by it, 448.
- St. pheta* the Savage, sent by the Greek emperor Justinian II. to exterminate the Chersontes, 810.
- St. Francis III.*, pope, solicits the aid of Pepin king of France against the Lombards, under the character of St. Peter, 842. Crowns king Pepin, 843.
- Stuicho*, the great general of the Western empire under the emperor Honorius, his character, 453. Causes Rufinus, the tyrannical praetor of the East, to be put to death, 456, 457. His expedition against Alaric in Greece, 460, 461. His diligent endeavours to check his progress in Italy, 464. Defeats Alaric at Pollentia, ibid. Drives him out of Italy, 465. His triumph at Rome, ibid. His preparations to oppose the invasion of Radagaisus, 468. Reduces and puts him to death, 468, 469. Supports the claims of Alaric in the Roman senate, 473. Is put to death at Ravenna, 474. His memory persecuted, ibid.
- Stoza* heads the revolted troops of the emperor Justinian in Africa, 688.
- Strasburg*, battle of, between Julian and the Alemanni, 320.
- Successianus* defends the Roman frontier against the Goths, 99.
- Successus*, hereditary, advantages of, 64. Want of it in the Roman empire productive of the greatest calamities, ibid.
- Succi*, the origin and renown of, 97.
- Suede* applauded and put by the Romans, 741.
- Sulpianus*, Servus, was the highest improver of the Roman jurisprudence, 732.
- Sultan*, origin and import of this title of Eastern sovereignty, 1006, and note 4.
- Symnat*, de-cruption of the Pagoda of, in Guzarat, and its de-struction by sultan Mahmud, 1066.
- Sun*, the worship of, introduced at Rome by the emperor Elagabalus, 55. Was the peculiar object of the devotion of Constantine the Great, before his conversion, 277. And of Julian, after his apostasy, 335.
- Superstition* of the Roman people, 11, 12. Of the Egyptians, prohibited at Rome, 15.
- Susa*, the city of, taken by Constantine the Great, 158.
- Svatostanus*, czar of Russia, his reign, 982.
- Sveas* Cantons, the confederacy of, how far similar to that of the ancient Franks, 97.
- Sword* of Mars, the sacred weapon of the Huns, history of, 527.
- Syagrus*, king of the Franks and Burgundians, his character, 589. Is conquered by Clovis, 590.
- Sylla* the dictator, his legislative character, 738.
- Sylvanus* the consul, his speech to the senate, recommending the election of the two Gordians to their approbation, 67.
- Syleucia*, sister of the praetor Rufinus, her uncommon sanctity, 455, note 32.
- Sylvanus*, general in Gaul under Constantius, is ruined by treachery, 163.
- Sylvester*, pope, is degraded and sent into exile by Belisarius, for an attempt to betray the city of Rome to the Goths, 671. His death, 700, note 7.
- Symmachus*, his account of the Pagan conformity of the emperor Constantius, during his visit to Rome, 315, 316. Pleads in behalf of the ancient Pagan religion of Rome, to the emperor Valentinian, 410, 441.
- Symasius*, bishop of Ptolemais, communicates the president Andronicus, 240. His extraordinary character, ut, note 115. His advice to the Eastern emperor Arcadius, 461.
- Synods*, provincial, in the primitive churches, institution of, 154. Nature of those assemblies, 291. See Concils.
- Syria*, its revolutions and extent, 10. Is invaded by Chosroes I. king of Persia, 689. Is reduced by Chosroes II., 738. General description of, 903. Is conquered by the Saracens, 897, 903. Invasion of, by Tamerlane, 1120.
- Syrac* Language, where spoken in the greatest purity, 796, note 110.
- Synanus*, duke of Egypt, surprises the city of Alexandria, and expels Athanasius the primate of Egypt, 360.

- Tahari*, the Arabian historian, account of his work, 893, note 12.
- Tabeane*, the island of, in Upper Thebais, is settled with monks by Pachomius, 575.
- Table* of emerald, in the Gothic treasury in Spain, account of, 495.
- Tacitus*, emperor, his election and character, 121, 122. His death, 127.
- Tacitus*, the historian, his character of the principles of the Portico, 40, note 46. The intention of his episodes, 74. His character as a historian, 51. His account of the ancient Germans, 82, et seq. His history, how preserved and translated down to us, 143, note 3. His

- account of the persecution of the Christians as the incendiaries of Rome, and remarks thereon, 50, 501.
- Tactics* of Leo and Constantine, character of, 914. Tactics and military character of the Greeks, 501. Of the Saracens, 501. And of the Franks, 502.
- Tagna*, battle of, between the eunuch Narses, and Totila king of the Goths in Italy, 707.
- Tahicites*, the Saracen dynasty of, 945.
- Tamerlane*, his birth, reign, and conquests, 1125—1129. His letter to Bajazet, 1129. His conference with the doctors of the law, at Aleppo, 1130. Defeats and takes Bajazet prisoner, 1132. How kept out of Europe, 1134. His triumph at Samarcand, ibid. Dies on a march to China, 1155. His character, ibid.
- Tamered* the crusader, his character, 1026. His bold behaviour at Constantinople, 1030.
- Tarasius*, secretary to the empress Irene, made patriarch of Constantinople, 845. Presides at, and frames the decrees of, the second council of Nice, 846.
- Tarik*, the Arab, his descent on Spain, 919. Defeats and kills Roderic the Gothic king of, 920. His disgrace, 921—923.
- Tarrogona*, the city of, almost destroyed by the Franks, 97.
- Tartars*. See Scythians.
- Tartary*, Eastern, conquest of, by Tamerlane, 1127.
- Tattian*, and his son Proculus, destroyed by the base arts of Rufinus, the confidential minister of the emperor Theodosius, 430, 431.
- Taurus* the consul, is banished by the tribunal of Chalcedon, 327.
- Taxes*, how the Roman citizens were exonerated from the burden of, 60. Account of those instituted by Augustus, 61. Increase of, by Diocletian, 146. How raised under Constantine the Great, and his successors, 241. Account of those levied by Justinian, 639.
- Tayef*, siege of, by Mahomet, 880.
- Telus*, the last king of the Goths, defeated and killed by the eunuch Narses, 708.
- Telemachus*, an Asiatic monk, loses his life at Rome, in an attempt to prevent the combat of the gladiators, 466.
- Temple* of Jerusalem, burned, 292. History of the emperor Julian's attempt to restore it, 339, 340.
- Timgin*. See Zingis.
- Tephrae* is occupied and fortified by the Paulicians, 909.
- Tertullian*, his pious exultation in the expected damnation of all the Pagan world, 177, 178. Suggests desertion to Christian soldiers, 182, note 102. His suspicious account of two edicts of Theodosius and Marcus Antoninus, in favour of the Christians, 399.
- Testaments*, the Roman laws for regulating, 754. Codicils, 755.
- Tetricus*, assumes the empire in Gaul, at the instigation of Victoria, 114. Betrays his legions into the hands of Aurelian, ibid. Is led in triumph by Aurelian, 116. His subsequent history, ibid.
- Thabor*, Mount, dispute concerning the right of, 1108.
- Thanet*, the island of, granted by Vortigern, as a settlement for his Saxon auxiliaries, 905.
- Theatrical* entertainments of the Romans described, 484.
- Theban* legion, the martyrdom of, apocryphal, 213, note 144.
- Theft*, the Roman laws relating to, 736, 737, 739.
- Themes*, or military governments of the Greek empire, account of, 330.
- Themistius*, the orator, his encomium on religious toleration, 588.
- Theodosius*, his birth and elevation to the throne of Italy, 604. His disgraceful treaties with the emperor Justinian, and revolt against them, 663, 666. His deposition and death, 672.
- Theodebert*, king of the Franks in Austrasia, joins the Goths in the siege and destruction of Milan, 674. Invades Italy, ibid. His death, 672.
- Theodemir*, a Gothic prince of Spain, copy of his treaty of submission to the Saracens, 921, 922.
- Theodora*, empress, her birth, and early history, 659. Her marriage with Justinian, 659. Her tyranny, 631. Her virtues, ibid. Her death, ibid. Her tortitude during the Nika sedition, 634. Account of her palace and gardens of Heraum, 643, 644. Her pious concern for the conversion of Nubia, 892.
- Theodora*, wife of the Greek emperor Theophilus, her history, 816. Restored the worship of images, 846. Provokes the Paulicians to rebellion, 909.
- Theodora*, daughter of the Greek emperor Constantine IX., her history, 823.
- Theodora*, widow of Baldwin III king of Jerusalem, her adventures as the concubine of Andronicus Comnenus, 830.
- Theodore Angelus*, despot of Epirus, seizes Peter of Courtenay, emperor of Constantinople, prisoner, 1061. Possesses himself of Thessalonica, ibid.
- Theodore* acquires the Gothic sceptre by the murder of his brother Forimond, 534. His character by Symeon, ibid. His expedition into Spain, 537.
- Theodoric*, the son of Alari, his prosperous reign in the Visigoths in Gaul, 529. Unhappy fate of his daughter, 540. Is prevailed on by Aetius to join his forces against Attila, 543. Is killed at the battle of Chalons, 544, 545.
- Theodoric* the Ostrogoth, his birth and education, 634. Is forced by his troops into a revolt against the emperor Zeno, 615. He undertakes the conquest of Italy, 616. Reduces and kills Odoacer, 617. Is acknowledged king of Italy, ibid. Review of his administration, 618. His visit to Rome, and care of the public buildings, 621. His religion, ibid. His remorse, and death, 625.
- Theodosopolis*, the city of, in Armenia, built, 517.
- Theodosius* the Great, his distinction between a Roman prince and a Parthian monarch, 243, note 193. Recovers Africa, 285. The province of Masia preserved by his valour, 291. Is associated by Gratian as emperor of the East, 412. His birth and character, 414. His prudent and successful conduct of the Gothic war, 414. Defeats an invasion of the Ostrogoths, 417. His treaty with Maximus, 420. His baptism, and edict to establish orthodox faith, 421. Purges the city of Constantinople from Ananisms, 423. Enforces the Nicene doctrine throughout the East, ibid. Convenes a council at Constantinople, 424. His edicts against heresy, 425. Receives the fugitive family of Valentinian, and marries his sister Galla, 429, 430. Defeats Maximus, and visits Rome, 430. His character, 431. His lenity to the city of Antioch, 433. His cruel treatment of Thessalonica, ibid. Submits to the penance imposed by St. Ambrose, for his severity to Thessalonica, 434. Restores Valentinian, 435. Consults John of Lycopolis, the hermit, on the intended war against Eugenius, 436. Delegates Eugenius, 437, 438. His death, 438. Procures a senatorial remission of the Pagan religion, 441. Abolishes Pagan rites, 442. Prohibits the Pagan religion, 442.
- Theodosius* the Younger, his birth, 442. Is said to be left by his father Arcadius to the care of Jovian, king of Persia, ibid. His education and character, 515. His marriage with Eudocia, ibid. His war with Persia, 516. His peace joy on the death of John, the usurper of the West, 519. His treaty with the Huns, 520. His arms defeated by Attila, 529. Is reduced to accept a peace dictated by Attila, 531, 532. Is oppressed by the embassies of Attila, 533. Embassy of Maximin to Attila, ibid. Is privy to a scheme for the assassination of Attila, 535. Attila's embassy to him on that occasion, 536, 537. His death, 537. His perplexity at the religious feuds between Cyril and Nestorius, 783. Banishes Nestorius, 786.
- Theodosius* 111, emperor of Constantinople, 811.
- Theodosius*, the father of the emperor, his successful expedition to Britain, 584. Suppresses the revolt of Firmus the Moor, in Africa, 585. Is beheaded at Carthage, 586.
- Theodosius*, patriarch of Alexandria, his competition with Gaian, how decided, 801. His negotiations at the court of Byzantium, 802.
- Theodosius*, the deacon, grand-son of the emperor Heraclius, murdered by his brother Constantine 11, 838.
- Theodosius*, the lover of Antonina, detected by Belisarius, 677. Turns monk to escape her, ibid. His death, 678.
- Theodotus*, president of the council of Herapolis under Constantius, his ridiculous flattery to that emperor, 325.
- Theophano*, wife of the Greek emperor Romanus 11, poisons both him and his father, 830. Her connection with Nicephorus Phocas, ibid. His murder, and her exile, 821.
- Theophilus*, emperor of Constantinople, 815. His Amorion war with the caliph Motassem, 842.
- Theophilus*, archbishop of Alexandria, destroys the temple of Serapis, and the Alexandrian library, 443, 444. Assists the persecution of St. Chrysostom, 511. His invective against him, 515.
- ..... from the emperor Constantine 11, 816.
- ..... s unfortunate history, 815, 816.
- Therapeutae*, or Essenes, some account of, 160.
- Thermopylae*, the Straits of, fortified by the emperor Justinian, 679.
- Thessalonica*, sedition and massacre there, 423. Cruel treatment of the citizens, ibid. Penance of Theodosius for this severity, 424.
- Theridinda*, princess of Bavaria, married to Autharis king of the Lombards, 732.
- Thibaut*, count of Champagne, engages in the fourth crusade, 1064.
- Thomas* the Cappadocian, his revolt against the Greek emperor Michael 11, and cruel punishment, 815.
- Thomas* of Damascus, his exploits against the Saracens when besieging that city, 940.
- Thomas*, St., account of the Christians of, in India, 748. Persecution of, by the Portuguese, ibid.
- Tharac*, state of, in the age of the Antonines, 9. Is invaded by the Barmas, in the reign of Probus, 156. The fugitive Goths permitted to settle there by the emperor Valens, 367. Is ravaged by them, 407. The Goths settled there by Theodosius, 416, 417. The Paulicians transplanted there, 579.

Thrasimund, king of the Vandals, his character, 582.
Three Chapters, the famous dispute concerning, 794.
Thundering Legion, the story concerning, at auspicious veracity, 1146.
Tiberius is adopted by Augustus, 28. Reduces the Pan-noniens, 42. Reduces Cappadocia, 62, note 101. Suspicious of his edict in favour of the Christians, 290.
Tiberius II. is invested by Justin II. as his successor in the empire of the East, 748. His character and death, 749.
Timachus, master-general of the army under the emperor Theodosius, is disgraced and exiled under Arcadius, 506.
Timothy the Cat, conspires the murder of Proterius, arch-bishop of Alexandria, and succeeds him, 789, 790.
Tropas, miraculous gift of speech bestowed on the Catho-lics, whose tongues had been cut out there, 583.
Tridates, king of Armenia, his character, and history, 139. Is restored to his kingdom by Diocletian, ibid. Is expelled by the Persians, 141. Is restored again by treaty between the Romans and Persians, 142. His conversion to Christianity, and death, 252.
Titus admitted to share the Imperial dignity with his father Vespasian, 28. Amphitheatre of, 1223.
Togrud Beg, sultan of the Turks, his reign and character, 1008. He rescues the caliph of Bagdad from his ene-mies, 1009.
Toledo taken by the Arabs under Tarik, 930.
Toleration, universal, its happy effects in the Roman empire, 11. What sets the most intolerant, 77, note 24. Toleration of the Arians, 592. Of Theodoric, 622.
Tollus, objections to his account of the vision of Anti-gonus, 281, note 42.
Totismond, son of Theodoric king of the Visigoths, attends his father against Attila king of the Huns, 543. Battle of Chalons, 544, 545. Is acknowledged king on the death of his father in the field, 545. Is killed by his brother Theodoric, 554.
Torture, how admitted in the criminal law of the Romans under the emperors, 270.
Totila is elected king of Italy by the Goths, 609. His justice and moderation, 700. Besieges and takes the city of Rome, 701, 702. Is induced to spare Rome from destruction, at the instance of Belisarius, 703. Takes Rome again, 704. Plunders Sicily, 705. Battle of Tagina, 707. His death, ibid.
Toulundes, the Saracen dynasty of, 946.
Tournaments preferable exhibitions to the Olympic games, 1157.
Tours, battle of, between Charles Martel and the Saracens, 932.
Toxandria, in Germany, is over-run and occupied by the Franks, 270.
Trade, foreign, state of, 21, 22. Tax on, 242.
Traditors, in the primitive church, who, 216.
Trajan, emperor, his conquest of Dacia, 2. His con-quests in the East, 3. Contrast between the characters of him and Hadrian, ibid. His pillar described, 18. Why adopted by the emperor Nerva, 29. His instruc-tions to Pliny the Younger for his conduct towards the Christians, 203. Description of his famous bridge over the Danube, 44, note 112.
Trajan, count, his treacherous murder of Pera king of Armenia, 289.
Trani, siege of, 993.
Transoxiana, conquest of, by the Mahometans, 896, 897.
Transubstantiation, the doctrine of, when established, 1034.
Trézond, the city of, taken and plundered by the Goths, 99, 100. The dukes of, become independent on the Greek empire, 1077. Is yielded to the Turks, 1184.
Tribes, German, distinction of, 89.
Tribigild the Ostrogoth, his rebellion in Phrygia against the emperor Arcadius, 307, 308.
Tribonian, his genius and character, 721. Is employed by Justinian to reform the code of Roman laws, ibid.
Tribune, the office of, explained, 25.
Tribute on Roman citizens, abolished, 60. Tributes of the provinces, 61, 61. How collected under the empire, 240, 241.
Trinity, the mysterious doctrine of, 295. Is violently agitated in the schools of Alexandria, 296. Three sys-tems of, 297. Decisions of the council of Nice concern-ing, 298. Different forms of the doxology, 311. Frauds used to support the doctrine of, 384.
Tripoli, the confederacy of, cruelly oppressed under the 790.

Turin, battle of, between Constantine the Great and the lieutenants of Maxentius, 138.
Turismud, king of the Gepidae, his honourable reception of Alboin the Lombard, who had slain his son in battle, 747.
Turks, their origin, 682. Their primitive institutions, 683. Their conquests, 684. Their alliance with the emperor Justinian, 684, 685. Send auxiliaries to Hera-clius, 774. Grow powerful and licentious under the Saracens, 943. Their military character, 976. Ter-ror excited by their menacing Europe, 977. They extend themselves over Asia, 1005. Reign of Mahmud the Gaznevide, 1005—1007. Their man-ners and emigration, 1007. They subdue Persia, 1008. Dynasty of the Seljukians, ibid. They invade the pro-vinces of the Greek empire, 1009. Reformation of the Eastern calendar, 1013. They conquer Asia Minor 1014. Their capital city, Nice, taken by the crusaders, 1031. The seat of government removed to Iconium, 1042. Valour and conquests of Zenghi, 1046. Char-acter of sultan Nouredin, ibid. Conquest of Egypt, 1047. Origin and history of the Ottomans, 1118. Their first passage into Europe, 1121. Their education and discipline, 1139. Embassy from, to the emperor Sigis-mund, 1147. Take the city of Constantinople, 1179, 1180.
Turpin, the romance of, by whom, and when written, 1019, note 10.
Tusculum, battle of, 1195.
Twelve Tables, review of the laws of, 717. Their severity, 737. How the criminal code of, sunk into disuse, 738.
Tyrants of Rome, the popular conceit of the thirty, in-vestigated, 104. Their real number, ibid. Character and merits, 103. Causes of their rebellion, ibid. Their violent deaths, ibid.
Tyre is besieged by Saladin, 1051.
Tythes assigned to the clergy as well by Zoroaster as by Moses, 77, and note 19. Were first granted to the church by Charlemagne, 849.

V, U

Udomair, prince of the Alemanni, is sent prisoner to Spain by the emperor Julian, 320. His son murdered by the Romans, 280.
Valens, general of the Illyrian frontier, receives the title of Cæsar from Licinius, 164. Loses his new title and his life, ibid.
Valens, the brother of the emperor Valentinian, is asso-ciated with him in the empire, 370. Obtains from his brother the Eastern portion of the empire, 371. His timidity on the revolt of Procopius, 372. His character, 374. Is baptized by Eudoxius, and patronises the Arians, 376. Is vindicated from the charge of persecu-tion, 377. His edict against the Egyptian monks, 377. His war with the Goths, 380, 390. Rescues the suppliant Goths into the Roman territories, 403. His war with them, 406. Is defeated and killed at the battle of Hadrianople, 409, 410. His eulogium by Libanius, 410.
Valens, the Arian bishop of Mursa, his crafty pretension to divine revelation, 362.
Valentia, a new province in Britain, settled by Theodo-sius, 384.
Valentinian I., his election to the empire, and character, 369. Associates his brother Valens with him, 370. Divides the empire into the East and West, and retains the latter, 371. His cruelty, 374. His civil institutions, 375. His edicts to restrain the avarice of the clergy, 377. Chastises the Alemanni, and fortifies the Rhine, 380. His expedition to Illyricum, and death, 391, 392. Is vindicated from the charge of polygamy, 392.
Valentinian II., is invested with the Imperial ornaments in his mother's arms, on the death of his father, 393. Is retained by St. Ambrose the privilege of a church for him and his mother Justina, on account of their Arian principles, 428. His flight from the invasion of Maxi-mus, 429. Is restored by the emperor Theodosius, 435. His character, 435, 436. His death, 436.
Valentinian III. is established emperor of the West, by his cousin Theodosius the Younger, 519. Is committed to the guardianship of his mother Placidia, ibid. Flies, on the invasion of Italy by Attila, 547. Sends an em-bassy to Attila to purchase his retreat, ibid. Murders the patrician Etrius, 549. Ravishes the wife of Petronius Maximus, 550. His death, and character, ibid.
Valentinianus, their confused ideas of the divinity of Jesus Christ, 780, note 13.
Valeria, empress, widow of Galerius, the unfortunate fate of, and her mother, 167, 167.
Valerian is elected censor under the emperor Decius, 94. His elevation to the empire, and his character, 96. Is defeated and taken prisoner by Sapor king of Persia, 102. His treatment, 103. His inconsistent behaviour toward the Christians, 211.
Vandalis. See Goths. Their successes in Spain, 520.

Their expedition into Africa under Genserich, 521. Their progress in Africa, 523, 524. They surprise Carthage, 524. They raise a naval force and invade Italy, 531. Sack of Rome, 532. Their naval depredations on the coast of the Mediterranean, 539. Their conversion to the Christian religion, 550, 586. Persecution of the Catholics, 582. Expedition of Belisarius against Gelimer, 633, 634. Conquest of, 656, 657. Their name and distinction lost in Africa, 661. Remains of their nation still found in Germany, ibid.

Varanes. See Bahram.

Varangians of the North, origin and history of, 979.

Varouian, the infant son of the emperor Jovian, his history, 339.

Vataces, John Ducas, his long and prosperous reign at Nice, 1081. His character, 1090.

Vegetius, his remarks on the degeneracy of the Roman discipline at the time of Theodosius the Great, 420.

Veu, the siege of that city, the æra of the Roman army first receiving regular pay, 60.

Venice, foundation of that republic, 546, 547. Its infant state under the exarchs of Ravenna, 750. Its growth and prosperity at the time of the fourth crusade, 1063. Alliance with France, 1063, 1064. Divides the Greek empire with the French, 1076.

Veratus, his mode of obeying the law of the twelve tables respecting personal insults, 737.

Verna, empress, the widow of Leo, deposes Zeno, 615. Her turbulent life, ibid.

Vérona, siege of, by Constantine the Great, 159. Battle of, between Stilicho the Roman general, and Alaric the Goth, 465.

Vettes, why his punishment was inadequate to his offences, 738.

Vespasian, his prudence in sharing the Imperial dignity with his son Titus, 28. His character, 29, 29.

Vestals, Roman, their number and peculiar office, 439.

Vetrasus, the Roman general in Illyricum, assumes the purple and enters into an alliance with the Gaulish usurper Magnentius, 255. Is reduced to abdicate his new dignity, 256.

Victoria exercises the government over the legions and province of Gaul, 114.

Victory, her statue and altar, in the senate-house at Rome, described, 440. The senate petitions the Christian emperors to have it restored, ibid.

Vigilius, the presbyter, is abused by Jerom for opposing from Theodosius the scheme for the assassination of Attala, ibid.

of Belisarius and his or Justinian to resume the time of Homer, 20.

Is the most ancient writer who mentions the manufacture of silk, 635.

Vingoths embrace Christianity, 580. Their code of laws, 634.

Vitalian, the Gothic chief, is treacherously murdered at Constantinople, 627.

Vitalianus, prætorian præfect under the emperor Maximian, put to death by order of the senate, 68.

Vitellius, emperor, his character, 30.

Viterbo, battle of, 1195.

Vitiges, general of the barbarians under Theodatus king of Italy, is by his troops declared king of Italy, 667. He besieges Belisarius in Rome, 668. Is forced to raise the siege, 672. He is besieged by Belisarius in Ravenna, 675. Is taken prisoner in Ravenna, 676. Conforms to the Athanasian faith, and is honourably settled in Asia, ibid. His embassy to Chosroes king of Persia, 688.

Vitarinus, the architect, his remarks on the buildings of Rome, 484.

Vizir, derivation of that appellation, 874, note 113.

Vlavian, description of that country, 95.

Uldin, king of the Huns, reduces and kills Gainas the Goth, 510. Is driven back by the vigilance of the Imperial ministers, 514.

Uphilas, the apostle of the Goths, his pious labours, 579. Propagated Arianism, 581.

Ulpian, the lawyer, placed at the head of the council of state, under the emperor Alexander Severus, 57. Is murdered by the prætorian guards, 59.

Vocuman law abolished the right of female inheritance, 733, 734. How evaded, 735.

Voltare prefers the labarum of Constantine to the angel of Licinius, 283, note 54. His reflections on the expenses of a siege, 613, note 9.

Vortigern, king of South Britain, his invitation of the Saxons for assistance against his enemies, 1075.

Vouti, emperor of China, his exploits against the Huns, 399.

Usat, anciently famous for its Gothic temple, 61.

Urban 11., pope, patronises Peter the Hermit in his project for recovering the Holy Land, 1018. Exhorts the people to a crusade, at the council of Clermont, 1020.

Urban V., pope, removes the papal court from Avignon to Rome, 1211.

Urban VI., pope, his disputed election, 1211.

Ursacius, master of the offices under the emperor Valentinian, occasions a revolt of the Alemanni by his parsimony, 379.

Ursinus, a Roman general, his treacherous conduct to Sylvanus in Gaul, 265. Is superseded in his command over the Eastern provinces, 269, 270. Is sent back again to conduct the war with Persia under Sabimian, 270. Is again disgraced, ibid.

Ursini, history of the Roman family of, 1200.

Ursulus, treasurer of the empire under Constantius, unjustly put to death by the tribunal of Chalcedon, 327.

Usury. See Interest of money.

W

Walachians, the present, descendants from the Roman settlers in ancient Dacia, 111, note 24.

Wales is settled by British refugees from Saxon tyranny, 607, 609. The bards of, 609.

Waltha is chosen king of the Goths, 500. He reduces the barbarous invaders of Spain, ibid. Is settled in Aquitaine, 501.

War and robbery, their difference, 862. Evolutions and military exercise of the Greeks, 960. Military character of the Saracens, 961. Of the Franks and Latins, 962.

Warburton, bishop of Gloucester, his literary character, 339, note 71. His labours to establish the miraculous interruption to Julian's building the temple of Jerusalem, 340, notes 78 and 79.

Wards, Roman law concerning, 732.

Warsa, battle of, between the sultan Amurath II. and Ladislaus, king of Hungary and Poland, 1163.

Werdan, the Greek general, defeated by the Saracens at Azazulin, 899.

Wheat, the average price, under the successors of Constantine the Great, 349, note 15.

Whitaker, Mr., remarks on his account of the Irish descent of the Scottish nation, 383, note 111.

White, Mr., Arabic professor at Oxford, character of his sermons at Bampton's lecture, 932, note 30.

Wifrid, the apostle of Sussex, his benevolent establishment at Selsey, 608.

William I., the Bad, king of Sicily, 1003.

William II., the Good, king of Sicily, 1004.

Windmills, the use of, from whence derived, 1086, and note 65.

Wine, the use of, expressly prohibited by Mahomet, 873.

Wisdom of Solomon, when, and by whom that book was written, 294, and note 21.

Wolodimir, great prince of Russia, marries Anne, daughter of the emperor Romanus, 958. His conversion to Christianity, 984.

Women, in hereditary monarchies, allowed to exercise sovereignty, though incapable of subordinate state offices, 57. How treated by the Roman civil laws, 729. The Vocoman law, how evaded, 735. Are not excluded from Paradise by Mahomet, 873.

Worship of images, when introduced, 634. Opposition to it, 835. Justified by pope Gregory II., 838. Sanctioned by the second council of Nice, 845, 846.

X

Xenophon, his description of the desert of Mesopotamia, 353.

Xerxes, the situation of his bridge of boats for passing over to Europe, pointed out, 923.

Y

Yermak, battle of, between the Greeks and the Saracens, 904.

Yezdegerd, king of Persia, his reign the æra of the fall of the Sassanian dynasty, and of the religion of Zoroaster, 896.

Yezid, caliph of the Saracens, 888.

Z

Zabergan invades the Eastern empire with an army of Bulgarians, 711. Is repulsed by Belisarius, ibid.

Zachary, pope, pronounces the deposition of Childeric king of France, and the appointment of Pepin to succeed him, 842.

Zane, brother of Gelimer the Vandal usurper, conquers Sardinia, 67. Is recalled to assist his brother, ibid. Is killed, 138.

Zerza, a city on the Slavonian coast, reduced by the crusaders for the republic of Venice, 1063.

Zenghi, sultan, his valour and conquests, 1043.

Zeno, emperor of the East, receives a surrender of the Western empire, from the vicissitudes of his life and , 790.

Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, her character and history, 114—118.

Zingis, first emperor of the Moguls and Tartars, parallel between him and Attila, king of the Huns, 527. His proposal for improving his conquests in China, 530.

His birth and early military exploits, 1112. His laws, ibid. His invasion of China, 1113. Of Carisme, Transoxiana, and Persia, ibid. His death, 1114.

Zoroas, a noble Sarmatian, is made king of that nation by the emperor Constantius, 267.

Zobetr, the Saracen, his bravery in the invasion of Africa, 914.

Zoe, first the concubine, becomes the fourth wife of the emperor Leo the philosopher, 819.

Zoe, wife of Romanus III. and Michael IV. emperor, s. 822, 823.

Zoroaster, the Persian prophet, his high antiquity, 73, note 7. Abridgment of his theology, 75. Provides for the encouragement of agriculture, 76. Assigns tithes to the priests, 77, note 19.

Zosimus, his representation of the oppression of the laical contribution, 242.

Zuinglius, the Reformer, his conceptions of the Eucharist, 971.

Zurich, brief history of that city, 1189.

THE END.

LONDON

PRINTED BY SPOTTISWOODE AND CO.

NEW-STREET SQUARE

CATALOGUED.

N.C

"A book that is shut is but a block"

CENTRAL ARCHAEOLOGICAL LIBRARY

GOVT. OF INDIA
Department of Archaeology
NEW DELHI

Please help us to keep the book clean and moving.

L. S. 146.10.52.72